This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

PREFACE.

THIS miscellany was first formed, many years ago, when two of my friends were occupied in those anecdotal labours, which have proved so entertaining to themselves, and their readers.* I conceived that a collection of a different complexion, though much less amusing, might prove somewhat more instructive; and that literary history afforded an almost unexplored source of interesting facts. The work itself has been well enough received by the public to justify its design.

Every class of readers requires a book adapted to itself and that book which interests, and perhaps brings much new information to a multitude of readers, is not to be contemned, even by the learned. More might be alleged in favour of works like the present than can be urged against them. They are of a class which was well known to the ancients. The Greeks were not without them; the Romans loved them under the title of Varia Eruditio; and the Orientalists, more than either, were passionately fond of these agreeable collections. The fanciful titles, with which they decorated their variegated miscellanies, sufficiently express their delight.

The design of this work is to stimulate the literary curiosity of those, who, with a taste for its tranquil pursuits, are impeded in their acquirements. The characters, the events, and the singularities of modern literature, are not always familiar even to those who excel in classical studies. But a more numerous part of mankind, by their occupations, or their indolence, both unfavourable causes to literary improvement, require to obtain the materials for thinking, by the easiest and readiest means. This work has proved useful: it has been reprinted abroad, and it has been translated; and the honour which many writers at home have conferred on it, by referring to it, has exhilarated the zealous labour which seven editions have necessarily exacted.

CURIOSITIES OF LITERATURE

LIBRARIES.

THE passion for forming vast collections of books has necessarily existed in all periods of human curiosity; but long it required royal munificence to found a national library. It is only since the art of multiplying the productions of the mind has been discovered, that men of letters have been enabled to rival this imperial and patriotic honour. The taste for books, so rare before the fifteenth century, has gradually become general only within these four hundred years; in that small space of time the public mind of Europe has been created.

OF LIBRARIES, the following anecdotes seem most interesting, as they mark either the affection, or the veneration, which civilized men have ever felt for these perennial repositories of their minds. The first national library founded in Egypt seemed to have been placed under the protection of the divinities, for their statues magnificently adorned this temple, dedicated at once to religion and to literature. It was still farther embellished by a well known inscription, for ever grateful to the votary of literature; on the front was engraven, 'The nourishment of the soul; or, according to Diodorus, 'The medicine of the mind.'

The Egyptian Ptolemies founded the vast library of Alexandria, which was afterwards the emulative labour of royal monarchs; the founder infused a soul into the vast body he was creating, by his choice of the librarian Demetrius Phalereus, whose skillful industry amassed from all nations their choicest productions. Without such a librarian, a national library would be little more than a library chaos. His well exercised memory and critical judgment are its best catalogue. One of the Ptolemies refused supplying the famished Athenians with wheat, until they presented him with the original manuscripts of Æschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides; and in returning copies of these originals, he allowed them to retain the fifteen talents which he had pledged with them as a princely security.

Even when tyrants, or usurpers, possessed sense as well as courage, they have proved the most ardent patrons of literature: they know it is their interest to turn aside the public mind from political speculations, and to afford their subjects the inexhaustible occupations of curiosity, and the soothing pleasures of the imagination. Thus Ptolemy is said to have been among the earliest of the Greeks, who projected an immense collection of the works of the learned, and is believed to have been the collector of the scattered works, which passed under the name of Homer.

The Romans, after six centuries of gradual dominion, must have possessed the vast and diversified collections of the writings of the nations they conquered; among the most valued spoils of their victories, we know that manuscripts were considered as more precious than vases of gold. Paulus Æmilius, after the defeat of Perseus, king of Macedonia, brought to Rome a great number which he had amassed in Greece, and which he now distributed among his sons, or presented to the Roman people. Sylla followed his example. After the siege of Athens, he discovered an entire library in the temple of Apollo, which having carried to Rome he appears to have been the founder of the first Roman public library. After the taking of Carthage, the Roman senate rewarded the family of Regulus with the books found in the city. A library was a national gift, and the most honourable they could bestow. From the intercourse of the Romans with the Greeks, the passion for forming libraries rapidly increased, and individuals began to pride themselves on their private collections.

Cæsar, and Cicero, have, among others, been celebrated for their literary splendour. Lucullus, whose incredible opulence exhausted itself on more than imperial luxuries, more honourably distinguished himself by his vast collections of books, and the happy use he made of them by the liberal access he allowed the learned. 'It was a library,' says Plutarch, 'whose walks, galleries, and cabinets, were open to all visitors; and the ingenious Greeks, when at leisure, resorted to this abode of the Muses to hold literary conversations, in which Lucullus himself loved to join.' This library, enlarged by others, Julius Cæsar once proposed to open for the public, having chosen the erudite Varro for its librarian; but the daggers of Brutus and his party prevented the meditated projects of Cæsar. In this museum, Cicero frequently pursued his studies, during the time his friend Faustus had the charge of it, which he describes to Atticus in his 4th Book, Epist. 9. Amidst his public occupations and his private studies, either of them sufficient to have immortalized one man, we are astonished at the minute attention Cicero paid to the formation of his libraries, and his cabinets of antiquities.

The emperors were ambitious at length to give their names to the libraries they founded; they did not consider the purple as their chief ornament. Augustus was himself an author, and in one of those sumptuous buildings called Thermae, ornamented with porticoes, galleries, and statues, with shady walks, and refreshing baths, testified his love of literature by adding a magnificent library, one of these libraries he fondly called by the name of his sister Octavia; and the other, the temple of Apollo, became the haunt of the poets, as Horace, Juvenal, and Persius have commemorated. The successors of Augustus imitated his example, and even Tiberius had an imperial library chiefly consisting of works concerning the empire and the acts of its sovereigns. These Trajan augmented by the Ulpian library, so denominated from the family name of this prince.

In a word we have accounts of the rich ornaments the ancients bestowed on their libraries; of their floors paved with marble, their walls covered with glass and ivory, and their shelves and desks of ebony and cedar.

The first public library in Italy, says Tiraboschi, was founded by a person of no considerable fortune: his credit, his frugality, and fortitude, were indeed equal to a treasury. This extraordinary man was Nicholas Niccoli, the son of a merchant, and in his youth himself a merchant; but after the death of his father he relinquished the beaten roads of gain, and devoted his soul to study, and his fortune to assist students. At his death he left his library to the public, but his debts being greater than his effects, the princely generosity of Cosmo de Medici realized the intention of its former possessor, and afterwards enriched it, by the addition of an apartment, in which he placed the Greek, Hebrew, Arabic, Chaldaic, and Indian MSS. The intrepid resolution of Nicholas V. laid the foundations of the Vatican; the affection of Cardinal Bessarion for his country, first gave Venice the rudiments of a public library; and to Sir T. Bodley we owe the invaluable one of Oxford. Sir Robert Cotton, Sir H. Sloane, Dr Birch, Mr Cracherode, and others of this race of lovers of books, have all contributed to form these literary treasures, which our nation owes to the enthusiasm of individuals, who have found such pleasure in consecrating their fortunes and their days to this great public object; or, which in the result produces the same public good, the collections of such men have been frequently purchased on their deaths, by government, and thus have entered whole and entire into the great national collections.

Literature, like virtue, is its own reward, and the enthusiasm some experience in the permanent enjoyment of a vast library, have far outweighed the neglect or the calamity of the world, which some of its votaries have received. From the time that Cicero poured forth his feelings in his oration for the poet Archias, innumerable are the testimonies of men of letters of the pleasurable delirium of their researches; that delicious beverage which they have swallowed, so thirstily, from the magical cup of literature. Richard de Bury, Bishop of Durham, Chancellor and high treasurer of England so early as 1341, perhaps raised the first private library in our country. He purchased thirty or forty volumes of the abbot of St. Albans for fifty pounds weight of silver. He was so enamoured of his large collection, that he expressly composed a treatise on his loves of books, under the title of 'Philobiblion,' an honourable tribute paid to literature, in an age not literary.

To pass much of our time amid such vast resources, that man must indeed be more animated than a leaden Mercury, who does not aspire to make some small addition to his library, were it only by a critical catalogue! He must be as indolent as that animal called the sloth, who perishes on the tree he climbs, after he has eaten all its leaves.

Henry Rantzau, a Danish gentleman, the founder of the great library at Copenhagen, whose days were dissolved in the pleasures of reading, discovers his taste and ardour in the following elegant effusion:

Salvete aureoli mei libelli,
Mœm delitæ, mei lepores.
Quam vos æspe oculis juvat videre,
Et tritæ manibus tenere nostris!
Tot vos æstim, tot eruditi,
Fricæ lumina sæculi et recentis,
Confedere viri, suasque vobis
Ausi credere lucubrations:
Et sperare decus perenne scriptis;
Neque hæc irrita spes fœlisset illis.

IMITATED.

Golden volumes! richest treasures
Objects of delicious pleasures!
You my eyes rejoicing please,
You my hands in rapture seize!
Brilliant wits and musing sages,
Lights who beam'd through many ages!
Left to your conscious leaves their story,
And dared to trust you with their glory;
And now their hope of fame achiev'd,
Dear volumes!—you have not deceived!

This passion for the acquisition and enjoyment of books, has been the occasion of their lovers embellishing their out-sides with costly ornaments; a rage which ostentation may have abused; but when these volumes belong to the real man of letters, the most fanciful bindings are often the emblems of his taste and feelings. The great Thuanus was eager to purchase the finest copies for his library, and his volumes are still eagerly purchased, bearing his autograph on the last page. A celebrated amateur was Grollier, whose library was opulent in these luxuries; the Muses themselves could not more ingeniously have ornamented their favourite works. I have seen several in the libraries of our own curious collectors. He embellished their outside with taste and ingenuity. They are gilded and stamped with peculiar neatness, the compartments on the binding are drawn, and painted, with different inventions of subjects, analogous to the works themselves; and they are farther adorned by that amiable inscription, Jo Grollieri et amicorum, purporting that these literary treasures were collected for himself and for his friends!

The family of the Fuggers had long felt an hereditary passion for the accumulation of literary treasures; and their portraits, with others in their picture gallery, form a curious quarto volume of 127 portraits, excessively rare even in Germany, entitled 'Fuggerorum Pinacotheca.' Wolfius, who daily haunted their celebrated library, pours out his gratitude in some Greek verses, and describes this Bibliothéque as a literary heaven, furnished with as many books as there were stars in the firmament; or as a literary garden, in which he passed entire days in gathering fruit and flowers, delighting and instructing himself by perpetual occupation.

In 1364 the royal library of France did not exceed twenty volumes. Shortly after Charles V increased it to nine hundred, which by the fate of war, as much at least as that of money, the Duke of Bedford afterwards purchased and transported to London, where libraries were smaller than on the continent, about 1440. It is a circumstance worthy observation, that the French sovereign, Charles V, surnamed the Wise, ordered that thirty portable lights, with a silver lamp suspended from the centre, should be illuminated at night, that students might not find their pursuits interrupted at any hour. Many among us, at this moment whose professional avocations admit not of morning studies find that the resources of a public library are not accessible to them from the omission of the regulation of the zealous Charles V of France. An alarming objection to night studies in public libraries is the danger of fire, and in our own British Museum not a light is permitted to be carried about on any pretence whatever. The history of the 'Bibliothèque du Roi' is a curious incident in literature and the progress of the human mind and public opinion might be traced by its gradual accessions, noting the changeable qualities of its literary stores chiefly from theology, law and medicine, to philosophy, and elegant literature. In 1789 Neckar reckoned the literary treasures to amount to 225,000 printed books, 70,000 manuscripts, and 15,000 collections of prints. By a curious little volume published by M. Le Prince in 1782, it appears that it was first under Louis XIV that the productions of the art of engraving were collected and arranged; the great minister Colbert purchased the extensive collections of the Abbé de Marolles, who may be ranked among the fathers of our print-collectors. Two hundred and sixty-four ample portfolios laid the foundations, and the catalogues of his collections, printed by Marolles himself, are rare, curious, and high-priced. Our own national print-gallery is yet an infant establishment.

Mr Hallam has observed, that in 1440, England had made comparatively but little progress in learning—and Germany was probably still less advanced. However there was in Germany a celebrated collector of books in the person of Trithemius, the celebrated abbot of Spanheim, who died in 1516; he had amassed about two thousand manuscripts, a literary treasure which excited such general attention, that princes and eminent men of that day travelled to visit Trithemius and his library. About this time six or eight hundred volumes formed a royal collection, and their high value in price could only be furnished by a prince. This was indeed a great advancement in libraries, when at the beginning of the fourteenth century the library of Louis IX contained only four classical authors, and that of Oxford, in 1300, consisted of 'a few tracts kept in chest.'

The pleasures of study are classed by Burton among those exercises or recreations of the mind which pass within doors. Looking about this 'world of books' he exclaims, 'I could even live and die with such meditations, and take more delight and true content of mind in them, than in all thy wealth and sport! there is a sweetness, which, as Circe's cup, bewitcheth a student, he cannot leave off, as well may witness those many laborious hours, days and nights, spent in their voluminous treatises. So sweet is the delight of study. The last day is prioris discipulus.' 'Heinsius was mewed up in the library of Leyden all the year long, and that which to my thinking should have bred a loathing, caused in him a greater liking. I no sooner, saith he, come into the library, but I bolt the door to me, excluding Lust, Ambition, Avarice, and all such vices, whose nurse is Idleness, the mother of Ignorance and Melancholy. In the very lap of eternity amongst so many divine souls, I take my seat with so lofty a spirit, and sweet content, that I pity all our great ones and rich men, that know not this happiness.' Such is the incense of a votary who scatters it on the altar ~~less~~ for the ceremony than from the devotion.

There is, however, an intemperance in study, incompatible often with our social or more active duties. The illustrious Grotius exposed himself to the reproaches of some of his contemporaries for having too warmly pursued his studies, to the detriment of his public station. It was the boast of Cicero, that his philosophical studies had never interfered with the services he owed the republic, and that he had only dedicated to them the hours which others gave to their walks, their repasts, and their pleasures. Looking on his voluminous labours, we are surprised at this observation: how honourable is it to him, that his various philosophical works bear the titles of the different villas he possessed; which shows that they were composed in their respective retirements. Cicero must have been an early riser; and practised that magic art of employing his time, as to have multiplied his days.

THE BIBLIOMANIA.

The preceding article is honourable to literature, yet impartial truth must show that even a passion for collecting books is not always a passion for literature.

The 'Bibliomania,' or the collecting an enormous heap of books without intelligent curiosity, has, since libraries have existed, infected weak minds, who imagine that they themselves acquire knowledge when they keep it on their shelves. Their motley libraries have been called the mad houses of the human mind; and again, the tomb of books, when the possessor will not communicate them, and confines them up in the cases of his library—and as it was facetiously observed, these collections are not without a lack on the human Understanding.*

The Bibliomania has never raged more violently than in the present day. It is fortunate that literature is in no ways injured by the follies of collectors, since though they preserve the worthless, they necessarily defend the good.

Some collectors place all their fame on the view of a splendid library, where volumes arrayed in all the pomp of lettering, silk linings, triple gold bands and tinted leather, are locked up in wire cases, and secured from the vulgar hands of the mere reader, dazzling our eyes like eastern beauties peering through their jealousies!

Bruyere has touched on this mania with humour: 'Of such a collector,' says he, 'as soon as I enter his house, I am ready to faint on the staircase, from a strong smell of Morocco leather: in vain he shows me fine editions, gold leaves, Etruscan bindings, &c., naming them one after another, as if he were showing a gallery of pictures! a gallery by the by which he seldom traverses when alone, for he rarely reads, but me he offers to conduct through it! I thank him for his politeness, and, as little as myself, care to visit the tan-house, which he calls his library.'

Lucian has composed a biting invective against an ignorant possessor of a vast library. Like him, who in the present day, after turning over the pages of an old book, chiefly admires the date. Lucian compares him to a pilot, who was never taught the science of navigation; to a rider who cannot keep his seat on a spirited horse; to a man who not having the use of his feet, wishes to conceal the defect by wearing embroidered shoes; but, alas! he cannot stand in them! He ludicrously compares him to Thersites wearing the armour of Achilles, tottering at every step; leering with his little eyes under his enormous helmet, and his hunch-back raising the cuirass above his shoulders. Why do you buy so many books? he says:—you have no hair, and you purchase a comb; you are blind, and you will have a grand mirror; you are deaf, and you will have fine musical instruments! Your costly bindings are only a source of vexation, and you are continually discharging your librarians for not preserving them from the silent invasion of the worms, and the nibbling triumphs of the rats!

Such collectors will contemptuously smile at the collection of the amiable Melancthon. He possessed in his library only four authors, Plato, Pliny, Plutarch, and Ptolemy the geographer.

Ancillon was a great collector of curious books, and dexterously defended himself when accused of the Bibliomania. He gave a good reason for buying the most elegant editions; which he did not consider merely as a literary luxury. He said the less the eyes are fatigued in reading a work, the more liberty the mind feels to judge of it; and as we perceive more clearly the excellencies and defects of a printed book than when in MS; so we see them more plainly in good paper and clear type than when the impression and paper are both bad. He always purchased first editions, and never waited for second ones; though it is the opinion of some that a first edition is generally the least valuable, and only to be considered as an imperfect essay, which the author proposes to finish after he has tried the sentiments of the literary world. Bayle approves of Ancillon's plan. Those who wait calmly for a book, says he, till it is reprinted, show plainly that they are resigned to their ignorance, and prefer the saving of a pistole to the acquisition of useful knowledge. With one of these persons, who waited for a second edition, which never appeared, a literary man argued, that it was much better to have two editions of a book than to deprive himself of the advantage which the reading of the first might procure him; and it was a bad economy to prefer a few crowns to that advantage. It has frequently happened, besides, that in second editions, the author omits, as well as adds, or makes alterations from prudential reasons; the displeasing truths which he corrects, as he might call them, are so many losses incurred by Truth itself. There is an advantage in comparing the first with subsequent editions; for among other things, we feel great satisfaction in tracing the variations of a work, when a man of genius has revised it. There are also other secrets, well known to the intelligent curious, who are versed in affairs relating to books. Many first editions are not to be purchased for the treble value of later ones. Let no lover of books be too hastily censured for his passion, which, if he indulges with judgment, is useful. The collector we have noticed frequently said, as is related of Virgil, 'I collect gold from Ennius's dung.' I find, added he, in some neglected authors, particular things, not elsewhere to be found. He read them, indeed, not with equal attention, but many, 'Sicut canis ad Nilum bibens ad fugiens,' like a dog at the Nile, drinking and running.

Fortunate are those who only consider a book for the utility and pleasure they may derive from its possession. Those students, who, though they know much, still thirst to know more, may require this vast sea of books; yet in that sea they may suffer many shipwrecks. Great collections of books are subject to certain accidents besides the damp, the worms, and the rats; one not less common is that of the borrowers, not to say a word of the purloiners.

LITERARY JOURNALS.

When writers were not numerous, and readers rare, the unsuccessful author fell insensibly into oblivion; he dissolved away in his own weakness; if he committed the private folly of printing what no one would purchase, he was not arraigned at the public tribunal—and the awful terrors of his day of judgment consisted only in the retributions of his publisher's final accounts. At length, a taste for literature spread through the body of the people, vanity induced the inexperienced and the ignorant to aspire to literary honours. To oppose these forcible entries into the haunts of the Muses, periodical criticism brandished its formidable weapon; and the fall of many, taught some of our greatest geniuses to rise. Multifarious writings produced multifarious strictures, and public criticism reached to such perfection, that taste was generally diffused, enlightening those whose occupations had otherwise never permitted them to judge of literary compositions.

The invention of Reviews, in the form which they have at length gradually assumed, could not have existed but in the most polished ages of literature; for without a constant supply of authors, and a refined spirit of criticism, they could not excite a perpetual interest among the lovers of literature. These publications are the chronicles of taste and science, and present the existing state of the public mind, while they form a ready resource for those idle hours, which men of letters do not choose to pass idly.

Their multiplicity has undoubtedly produced much evil; puerile critics, and venal drudges, manufacture reviews; hence that shameful discordance of opinion, which is the scorn and scandal of criticism. Passions hostile to the peaceful truths of literature have likewise made tremendous inroads in the republic, and every literary virtue has been lost! In 'Calamities of Authors,' I have given the history of a literary conspiracy, conducted by a solitary critic Gilbert Stuart, against the historian Henry.

These works may disgust by vapid panegyric, or gross invective; weary by uniform dullness, or tantalize by superficial knowledge. Sometimes merely written to catch the public attention, a malignity is indulged against authors, to season the caustic leaves. A reviewer has admired those works in private, which he has condemned in his official capacity. But good sense, good temper, and good taste, will ever form an estimable journalist, who will inspire confidence, and give stability to his decisions.

To the lovers of literature these volumes when they have outlived their year, are not unimportant. They constitute a great portion of literary history, and are indeed the annals of the republic.

To our own reviews, we must add the old foreign journals, which are perhaps even more valuable to the man of letters. Of these the variety is considerable; and many of their writers are now known. They delight our curiosity by opening new views, and light up in observing minds many projects of works, wanted in our own literature. Gibbon feasted on them; and while he turned them over with constant pleasure, derived accurate notions of works, which no student can himself have verified: of many works a notion is sufficient, but this notion is necessary.

The origin of so many literary journals was the happy project of Denis de Sallo, a counsellor in the parliament of Paris. In 1665 appeared his Journal des Savans. He published his essay in the name of the Sieur de Hedouville, his footman! Was this a mere stroke of humour, or designed to insinuate that the freedom of his criticism could only be allowed to his footman? The work, however, met with so favourable a reception, that Sallo had the satisfaction of seeing it, the following year, imitated throughout Europe, and his journal, at the same time, translated into various languages. But as most authors say themselves open to an acute critic, the animadversions of Sallo were given with such asperity of criticism, and such malignity of wit, that this new journal excited loud murmurs, and the most heart-moving complaints. The learned had their plagiarisms detected, and the wit had his claims disputed. Sarasin called the gazettes of this new Aristarchus, Hebdomadary Flams! Billevesees hebdomadaries! and Menage, having published a law-book, which Sallo had treated with severe railery, he entered into a long argument to prove, according to Justinian, that a lawyer is not allowed to defame another lawyer, &c. Senatori maledicere non licet, remaledicere jus fasque est. Others loudly declaimed against this new species of imperial tyranny, and this attempt to regulate the public opinion by that of an individual. Sallo, after having published only his third volume, felt the irritated wasps of literature thronging so thick about him, that he very gladly abdicated the throne of criticism. The journal is said to have suffered a short interruption by a remonstrance from the nuncio of the pope, for the energy with which Sallo had defended the liberties of the Gallican church.

Intimidated by the fate of Sallo, his successor, Abbé Gaillois, flourished in a milder reign. He contented himself with giving the titles of books, accompanied with extracts; and he was more useful than interesting. The public, who had been so much amused by the railery and severity of the founder of this dynasty of new critics, now murmured at the want of that salt and acidity by which they had relished the fugitive collation. They were not satisfied in having the most beautiful, or the most curious parts of a new work brought together; they wished for the unreasonable entertainment of railing and railery. At length another objection was conjured up against the review; mathematicians complained they were neglected to make room for experiments in natural philosophy; the historian sickened over the works of natural history; the antiquaries would have nothing but discoveries of seas, or fragments of antiquity. Medical works were called for by one party and reprobated by another. In a word, each reader wished only to have accounts of books which were interesting to his profession or his taste. But a review is a work presented to the public at large, and written for more than one country. In spite of all these difficulties, this work was carried to a vast extent. An index to the Journal des Savans has been arranged on a critical plan, occupying ten volumes in quarto, which may be considered as a most useful instrument to obtain the science and literature of the entire century.

The next celebrated reviewer is Bayle, who undertook, in 1684, his Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres. He possessed the art, acquired by habit, of reading a book by his fingers, as it has been happily expressed; and of comprising, in concise extracts, a just notion of a book, without the addition of irrelevant matter. He had for his day sufficient playfulness to breathe the rod of criticism with roses; and, for the first time, the ladies and all the bona monde took an interest in the labours of the critic. Yet even Bayle, who declared himself a reporter and not a judge, Bayle the discreet sceptic, could not long satisfy his readers. His panegyric was thought somewhat prodigal; his fluency of style somewhat too familiar; and others affected not to relish his gayety. In his latter volumes, to still the clamour, he assumed the cold sobriety of an historian; and has bequeathed no mean legacy to the literary world, in thirty-six small volumes of criticism, closed in 1687. These were continued by Bernard, with inferior skill: and by Barnage more successfully in his Histoire des Ouvrages des Savans.

The contemporary and the antagonist of Bayle was Le Clerc. His firm industry has produced three Bibliothèques — Universelle et Historique — Choisie — and Ancienne et Moderne, forming in all 82 volumes, which, complete, bear a very high price. Inferior to Bayle in the more pleasing talents, he is perhaps superior in erudition, and shows great skill in analysis: but his hand drops no flowers! Apostolo Zeno's Giornale de' Letterati d'Italia, from 1710 to 1733, is valuable. Gibbon resorted to Le Clerc's volumes at his leisure, 'as an inexhaustible source of amusement and instruction.'

Beausobre and L'Enfant, two learned Protestants, wrote a Bibliothèque Germanique, from 1730 to 1740, in 50 vols.; our own literature is interested by the Bibliothèque Britannique; written by some literary Frenchmen, noticed by La Croze in his 'Voyage Littéraire,' who designates the writers in this most tantalizing manner: 'Les auteurs sont gens de mérite et que entendent tous parfaitement l'Anglois; Messrs S. B. le M. D. et le savant Mr D.' Posterity has been partly let into the secret; De Missy was one of the contributors, and Warburton communicated his project of an edition of Gellius Paterculus. This useful account of only English books begins in 1733, and closes at 1747, Hague, 23 vols.; to this we must add the Journal Britannique, in 18 volumes, by Dr Maty, a foreign physician residing in London; this journal exhibits a view of the state of English literature from 1750 to 1758. Gibbon bestows a high character on the journalist, who sometimes 'aspires to the character of a poet and a philosopher; one of the last disciples of the school of Fontenelle.'

Maty's son produced here a review known to the curious; his style and decisions often discover haste and heat, with some striking observations: alluding to his father, Maty, in his motto, applies Virgil's description of the young Ascanius, 'Sequitur patrem non passibus æquis.' He says he only holds a monthly conversation with the public; but criticism demands more maturity of reflection and more terseness of style. In his obstinate resolution of carrying on this review without an associate, he has shown its folly and its danger; for a fatal illness produced a cessation, at once, of his periodical labours and his life.

Other reviews, are the Mémoires de Trevoux, written by the Jesuits. Their caustic censure and vivacity of style made them redoubtable in their day; they did not even spare their brothers. The Journal Littéraire, printed at the Hague, and chiefly composed by Prosper Marchand, Sallengre, Van Effen, who were then young writers. This list may be augmented by other journals, which sometimes merit preservation in the history of modern literature.

Our early English journals notice only a few publications, with but little acumen. Of these, the 'Memoirs of Literature,' and the 'Present State of the Republic of Letters,' are the best. The Monthly Review, the venerable mother of our journals, commenced in 1749.

It is impossible to form a literary journal in a manner such as might be wished; it must be the work of many of different tempers and talents. An individual, however versatile and extensive his genius, would soon be exhausted. Such a regular labour occasioned Bayle a dangerous illness, and Maty fell a victim to his review. A prospect always extending as we proceed, the frequent novelty of the matter, the pride of considering one's self as the arbiter of literature, animate a journalist at the commencement of his career; but the literary Hercules becomes fatigued; and to supply his craving pages he gives copious extracts, till the journal becomes tedious, or fails in variety. Abbé Gaillois was frequently diverted from continuing his journal, and Fontenelle remarks, that this occupation was too restrictive for a mind so extensive as his; the Abbé could no resist the charms of revelling in a new work, and gratifying any sudden curiosity which seized him; which interrupted perpetually that regularity the public expects from a journalist.

To describe the character of a perfect journalist, would be only an ideal portrait! There are however some acquirements which are indispensable. He must be tolerably acquainted with the subjects he treats on; no common acquirement! He must possess the literary history of his own times! a science which Fontenelle observes, is almost distinct from any other. It is the result of an active curiosity, which leads us to take a lively interest in the tastes and pursuits of the age, while it saves the journalist from some ridiculous blunders. We often see the mind of a reviewer half a century remote from the work reviewed. A fine feeling, of the various manners of writers, with a style, adapted to fix the attention of the indolent, and to win the untractable; but candour is the brightest gem of criticism! He ought not to throw every thing into the crucible, nor should he suffer the whole to pass as if he trembled to touch it. Lampoons, and satires, in time will see their effect, as well as panegyrics. He must learn to resist the seductions of his own pen; the pretensions of composing a treatise on the subject, rather than on the best he criticises, proud of insinuating that he gives in a keen page, what the author himself has not been able to perform in his volumes. Should he gain confidence by a popular delusion and by unworthy conduct, he may chance to be mortified by the pardon or the chastisement of insulted genius. The most noble criticism is that, in which the critic is not the antagonist so much as the rival of the author.

RECOVERY OF MANUSCRIPTS.

Our ancient classics had a very narrow escape from total annihilation. Many, we know, have perished: many we possess are but fragments; and chance, blind arbiter of the works of genius, has given us some, not of the highest value: which, however, have proved very useful, serving as a test to show the pendency of those who adore antiquity not from true feeling but from traditional prejudice.

One reason, writes the learned compiler L'Esprit des Cviudes, why we have lost a great number of ancient authors, was the conquest of Egypt by the Saracens, which deprived Europe of the use of the papyrus. The ignorance of that age could find no substitute; they knew no other expedient but writing on parchment, which became every day more scarce and costly. Ignorance and barbarism unfortunately seized on Roman manuscripts, and industriously defaced pages once imagined to have been immortal! The most elegant compositions of classic Rome were converted into the psalms of a breviary, or the prayers of a missal. Livy and Tacitus 'hide their diminished heads' to preserve the legend of a saint, and immortal truths were converted into clumsy fictions. It happened that the most voluminous authors were the greatest sufferers; these were preferred, because their volume being the greatest, it most profitably repaid their destroying industry, and furnished ample scope for future transcription. A Livy or a Diodorus was preferred to the smaller works of Cicero or Horace; and it is to this circumstance that Juvenal, Persius, and Martial have come down to us entire, rather probably than to these pious personages preferring their obscurities, as some have accused them. Not long ago at Rome, a part of a book of Livy was found, between the leaves of a parchment but half effaced, on which they substituted a book of the Bible.

That, however, the monks had not in high veneration the profane authors, appears by a facetious anecdote. To read the classics was considered as a very idle recreation, and some held them in great horror. To distinguish them from other books, they invented a disgraceful sign: when a monk asked for a pagan author, after making the general sign they used in their manual and silent language when they wanted a book, he added a particular one which consisted in scratching under his ear, as a dog, which feels an itching, scratches himself in that place with his paw—because, said they, an unbeliever is compared to a dog! In this manner they expressed an itching for those dogs, Virgil or Horace!

There have been ages when for the possession of a manuscript, some would transfer an estate; or leave in pawn for its loan hundreds of golden crowns; and when even the sale or loan of a manuscript was considered of such importance as to have been solemnly registered in public acts. Absolute as was Louis XI, he could not obtain the use of Rasis, an Arabian writer, to make a copy, from the library of the faculty of Paris, without pledging a hundred golden crowns; and the president of his treasury, charged with this commission, sold part of his plate to make the deposit. For the loan of a volume of Avicenna, a loan offered a pledge of ten marks of silver, which was refused: because it was not considered equal to the risk incurred of losing a volume of Avicenna! These events occurred in 1471. One cannot but smile at an anterior period, when a countess of Anjou bought a favorite book of homilies, for two hundred sheep, some skins of martins, and bushels of wheat and rye.

In these times, manuscripts were important articles of commerce; they were excessively scarce, and preserved with the utmost care. Usurers themselves considered them as precious objects for pawn; a student of Paris, who was reduced by his debaucheries, raised a new fortune by leaving in pawn a manuscript of a body of law; and a grammarian, who was ruined by a fire, rebuilt his house with two small volumes of Cicero.

At the restoration of letters, the researches of literary men were chiefly directed to this point; every part of Europe and Greece was ransacked, and the glorious end considered, there was something sublime in this humble industry, which often produced a lost author of antiquity, and gave one more classic to the world. This occupation was carried on with enthusiasm, and a kind of mania possessed many who exhausted their fortunes in distant voyages, and profuse prices. In reading the correspondence of the learned Italians of these times, much of which has descended to us, their adventures of manuscript-hunting are very amusing, and their raptures, their congratulations, or at times their condolence, and even their censures, are all immoderate and excessive. The acquisition of a province would not have given so much satisfaction as the discovery of an author little known, or not known at all. 'Oh, great gain! Oh, unexpected felicity! I treat you my Poggio, send me the manuscript as soon as possible, that I may see it before I die!' exclaims Arretino, in a letter overflowing with enthusiasm, on Poggio's discovery of a copy of Quintilian. Some of the half-witted, who joined in this great hunt, were often thrown out, and some paid high for manuscripts not authentic; the knave played on the bungling amateur of manuscripts, whose credulity was greater than his purse. But even among the learned, much ill blood was inflamed: he who had been most successful in acquiring manuscripts was envied by the less fortunate, and the glory of possessing a manuscript of Cicero, seemed to approximate to that of being its author. It is curious to observe that in these vast importations into Italy of manuscripts from Asia, John Aurispa, who brought many hundreds of Greek manuscripts, laments that he had chosen more profane than sacred writers; which circumstance he tells us was owing to the Greeks, who would not so easily part with theological works, but they did not highly value profane writers!

These manuscripts were discovered in the obscurest recesses of monasteries; they were not always imprisoned in libraries, but rotting in oblivion: in dark unfrequented corners with rubbish. It required no less ingenuity to find out places where to examine, than to understand the value of the acquisition, when obtained. An universal ignorance then prevailed in the knowledge of ancient writers. A scholar of those times gave the first rank among the Latin writers to one Valerius, whether he meant Marial or Maximus is uncertain; he placed Plato and Tully among the poets, and imagined that Ennius and Statius were contemporaries. A library of six hundred volumes was then considered as an extraordinary collection.

Among those whose lives were devoted to this purpose, Poggio the Florentine stands distinguished; but he complains that his zeal was not assisted by the great. He found under a heap of rubbish in a decayed coffer, in a tower belonging to the monastery of St Gallo, the work of Quintilian. He is indignant at its forlorn situation; at least, he cries, it should have been preserved in the library of the monks; but I found it in testerrimo quodam obsecrare carcere—and to his great joy drew it out of its grave! The monks have been complimented as the preservers of literature, but by facts like the present, their real affection may be doubted.

The most valuable copy of Tacitus, of whom so much is wanting, was likewise discovered in a monastery of Westphalia. It is a curious circumstance in literary history, that we should owe Tacitus to this single copy; for the Roman emperor of that name had copies of the works of his illustrious ancestor placed in all the libraries of the empire, and every year had ten copies transcribed; but the Roman libraries seem to have been all destroyed, and the imperial protection availed nothing against the teeth of time.

The original manuscript of Justinian's code was discovered by the Pisane, accidentally, when they took a city in Calabria; that vast code of laws had been in a manner unknown from the time of that emperor. This curious book was brought to Pisa, and when Pisa was taken by the Florentines, was transferred to Florence, where it is still preserved.

It sometimes happened that manuscripts were discovered in the last agonies of existence. Papius Masson found, in the house of a book-binder of Lyons, the works of Agobart; the mechanic was on the point of using the manuscripts to line the covers of his books. A page of the second decade of Livy it is said was found by a man of letters in the parchment of his battledore, while he was amusing himself in the country. He hastened to the maker of the battledore—but arrived too late! The man had finished the last page of Livy—about a week before!

Many works have undoubtedly perished in this manuscript state. By a petition of Dr Dee to Queen Mary, in the Cotton library, it appears that Cicero's treatise de Re publica was once extant in this country. Huet observes that Petronius was probably entire in the days of John of Salisbury, who quotes fragments, not now to be found in the remains of the Roman bard. Raimond Soranzo, a lawyer in the papal court, possessed two books of Cicero on Glory, which he presented to Petrarch, who lent them to a poor aged man of letters, formerly his preceptor. Urged by extreme want, the old man pawned them, and returning home died suddenly without having revealed where he had left them. They have never been recovered. Petrarch speaks of them with ecstacy, and tells us that he had studied them perpetually. Two centuries afterwards this treatise on Glory by Cicero was mentioned in a catalogue of books bequeathed to a monastery of nuns, but when inquired after was missing; it was supposed that Petrus Alcyonius, physician to that household, purloined it, and after transcribing as much of it as he could into his own writings, had destroyed the original. Alcyonius in his book de Exilio, the critics observed, had many splendid passages which stood isolated in his work, and were quite above his genius. The beggar, or in this case the thief, was detected by mending his rags with patches of purple and gold.

In this age of manuscript, there is reason to believe, that when a man of letters accidentally obtained an unknown work, he did not make the fairest use of it, and cautiously concealed it from his contemporaries. Leonard Aretino, a distinguished scholar at the dawn of modern literature, having found a Greek manuscript of Procopius de Bello Gothico, translated it into Latin, and published the work, but concealing the author's name, it passed as his own, till another manuscript of the same work being dug out of its grave, the fraud of Aretino was apparent. Barbosa, a bishop of Ugento, in 1649, has printed among his works a treatise, which, it is said, he obtained by having perceived one of his domestics bringing in a fish rolled in a leaf of written paper, which his curiosity led him to examine. He was sufficiently interested to run out and search the fish market, till he found the manuscript out of which it had been torn. He published it under the title de Officio Episcoporum. Machiavelli acted more adroitly in a similar case; a manuscript of the Apophthegms of the ancients by Plutarch having fallen into his hands, he selected those which pleased him the best, and put them into the mouth of his hero Castruccio Castracani.

In more recent times, we might collect many curious anecdotes concerning manuscripts. Sir Robert Cotton one day at his tailor's, discovered that the man was holding in his hand, ready to cut up for measures—an original Magna Charta, with all its appendages of seals and vignettes. He bought the singular curiosity for a trifle, and recovered in this manner what had long been given over for lost! This anecdote is told by Colomien, who long resided, and died in this country. An original Magna Charta is preserved in the Cottonian library; it exhibits marks of dilapidation, but whether from the invisible scythe of time, or the humble scissors of a tailor, I leave to archaeological inquiry.

Cardinal Granvelle carefully preserved all his letters; he left behind him several chests filled with a prodigious quantity, written in different languages, commented, noted, and under-lined by his own hand. These curious manuscripts, after his death, were left in a garret to the mercy of the rain and the rats. Five or six of these chests the steward sold to the grocers. It was then that a discovery was made of this treasure. Several learned men occupied themselves in collecting as many of these literary relics as they possibly could. What were saved formed eighty thick folios. Among these original letters, are found great numbers written by almost all the crowned heads in Europe, with instructions for ambassadors, and many other state-papers.

Recently a valuable secret history by Sir George Mackenzie, the king's advocate in Scotland, has been rescued from a mass of waste paper sold to a grocer, who had the good sense to discriminate it, and communicate this curious memorial to Dr M'Crie; the original, in the hand-writing of its author, has been deposited in the advocate's library. There is an hiatus, which contained the history of six years. This work excited inquiry after the rest of the mass, which were found to be nothing more than the sweepings of an attorney's office.

Montaigne's journal of his travels into Italy have been but recently published. A prebendary of Perigord, travelling through this province to make researches relative to its history, arrived at the ancient chateaux of Montaigne, in possession of a descendant of this great man. He inquired for the archives, if there had been any. He was shown an old worm-eaten coffer, which had long held papers untouched by the incurious generations of Montaigne. The prebendary, with philosophical intrepidity, stifled himself in clouds of dust, and at length drew out the original manuscript of the travels of Montaigne. Two thirds of the work are in the hand-writing of Montaigne, and the rest is written by a servant who served as his secretary, and who always speaks of his master in the third person. But he must have written what Montaigne dictated, as the expressions and the egotisms are all Montaigne's. The bad writing and orthography made it almost unintelligible. It proves also, says the editor, how true is Montaigne's observation, that he was very negligent in the correction of his works.

Our ancestors were great hidiers of manuscripts; Dr Dee's singular mass were found in the secret drawer of a chest, which had passed through many hands undiscovered; and that vast collection of state-papers of Thurlow's the secretary of Cromwell, which formed about seventy volumes in the original manuscripts, accidentally fell out of the false ceiling of some chambers in Lincoln's-Inn.

A considerable portion of Lady Mary Wortley Montagu's letters I discovered in the hands of an attorney. There are now many valuable manuscripts in the family papers of the descendants of celebrated persons; but posthumous publications of this kind are usually made from the most sordid motives: discernment, and taste, would only be detrimental to the views of bulky publishers.

SKETCHES OF CRITICISM.

It may perhaps be some satisfaction to show the young writer, that the most celebrated ancients have been as rudely subjected to the tyranny of criticism as the moderns. Detraction has ever poured the 'waters of bitterness.'

It was given out, that Homer had stolen from anterior poets whatever was most remarkable in the Iliad and Odyssey. Naucrates even points out the source in the library at Memphis in a temple of Vulcan, which according to him the blind bard completely pillaged. Undoubtedly there were good poets before Homer; how absurd to conceive that a finished and elaborate poem could be the first! We have indeed accounts of anterior poets, and apparently of epics, before Homer; their names have come down to us. Aelian notices Syagrus, who composed a poem on the Siege of Troy; and Suidas the poem of Corinnus, from which it is said Homer greatly borrowed. Why did Plato so severely condemn the great bard, and imitate him?

Sophocles was brought to trial by his children as a heretic; and some, who censured the inequalities of this poet, have also condemned the vanity of Pindar; the rough verses of Æschylus; and Euripides, for the conduct of his plots.

Socrates, considered as the wisest and the most moral of men, Cicero treated as an usurer, and the pedant Athenus as illiterate; the latter points out as a Socratic folly, our philosopher disserting on the nature of justice before his judges, who were so many thieves. The malignant buffoonery of Aristophanes, who, as Jortin says, was a great wit, but a great rascal, treats him much worse; but though some would revive this calumny, such modern weaknesses may have their evidence impeached in the awful court of history.

Plato, who has been called, by Clement of Alexandria, the Moses of Athens; the philosopher of the Christians by Arnobius; and the god of philosophers, by Cicero Athenus accuses of envy; Theopompus, of Lying; Sæof avarice; Aulus Gellius, of robbery; Porphyry, of penitence; and Aristophanes, of impiety.

Aristotle, whose industry composed more than four hundred volumes, has not been less spared by the critics; Lucius Laetius, Cicero, and Plutarch, have forgotten that which can tend to show his ignorance, his ambition, and his vanity.

It has been said, that Plato was so envious of the celebrity of Democritus, that he proposed burning all his books; but that Amyndis and Clinias prevented it, by representing that there were copies of them every where; and Aristotle was agitated by the same passion against all philosophers his predecessors!

Virgil is destitute of invention, if we are to give credit to Flaccus, Carilius, and Seneca. Calpurnia has absolutely said him even mediocrity; Herennius has marked his faults; and Pervilius Faustinus has furnished a thick volume with plagiarisms. Even the author of his apology has confessed that he has stolen from Homer his greatest beauties; from Apollonius Rhodius, many of his pathetic passages; from Nicander, hints from his Georgics; and this does not terminate the catalogue.

Horace censures the coarse humour of Plautus; and Horace, in his turn, has been blamed for the free use he made of the Greek minor poets.

The majority of the critics regard Pliny's Natural History only as a heap of fables; and seem to have quite as little respect for Quintus Curtius, who indeed seems to me composed little more than an elegant romance.

Pliny cannot bear Diodorus and Vopiscus; and in one unimpressive criticism, treats all the historians as narrators of fables.

Livy has been reproached for his aversion to the Gauls; Seneca, for his hatred of the republic; Velleius Paterculus, in speaking too kindly of the vices of Tiberius; and Herodotus and Plutarch, for their excessive partiality to their own country; while the latter has written an entire treatise on the malignity of Herodotus. Xenophon and Quintus Curtius have been considered rather as novelists than historians; and Tacitus has been censured for his seductiveness in pretending to discover the political springs and secret causes of events. Dionysius of Halicarnassus has made an elaborate attack on Thucydides for the unskillful choice of his subjects and his manner of treating it. Dionysius would have nothing written but what tended to the glory of his country and the pleasure of the reader; as if history were a song! adds Hobbes: while he also shows that there was a personal motive in this attack. The same Dionysius severely criticises the style of Xenophon, who, he says, whenever he attempts to elevate his style shows he is incapable of supporting it. Polybius has been blamed for his frequent introduction of moral reflections, which interrupt the thread of his narrative: and Sallust has been blamed by Cato for indulging his own private passions, and studiously concealing many of the glorious actions of Cicero. The Jewish historian Josephus is accused of not having assigned his history for his own people so much as for the Greeks and Romans, whom he takes the utmost care never to offend. Josephus assumes a Roman name, Flavius; and considering his nation as entirely subjugated, he only varies his story to make them appear venerable and dignified to their conquerors, and for this purpose, alters what he himself calls the Holy books. It is well known how widely he differs from the scriptural accounts. Some have said of Cicero, that there is no connexion, and, to adopt their own figures, no blood and nerves, in what his pleaders so warmly extol. Cold in his extemporaneous discourses, artificial in his exordiums, trifling in his strained allusions, and tiresome in his digressions. This is saying a good deal about Cicero!

Quintilian does not spare Seneca; and Demosthenes rebuked by Cicero the prince of orators, has, according to Strabo, more of art than of nature. To Demades, his exordium appears too much laboured; others have thought him too dry; and, if we may trust Æschines, his language is by no means pure.

The Attic Nights of Aulus Gellius and the Deipnosophists of Athenæus, while they have been extolled by one party, have been degraded by another. They have been considered as botchers of rage and remnants; their diligence has not been accompanied by judgment; and their taste inclined more to the frivolous than to the useful. Compilers, indeed, are liable to a bad fate, for little distinction is made in their ranks; a disagreeable situation, in which almost Burton seems to have been placed; for he says of his work, that some will cry out, 'This is a thing of mere industry: a collection without wit or invention; a very toy! So men are valued! their labours vilified by fellows of no worth themselves, as things of naught; who could not have done as much. Some understand too little, and some too much.'

Should we proceed with the list to our own country, and to our own times, it might be currently augmented, and show the world what men the critics are! but, perhaps, enough has been said to soothe irritated genius, and to abate fastidious criticism. 'I would beg the critics to remember,' the Earl of Roscommon writes, in his preface to Horace's Art of Poetry, 'that Horace owed his favour and his fortune to the character given of him by Virgil and Varus; that Fundanius and Pollio, are still valued by what Horace says of them; and that in their golden age, there was a good understanding among the ingenious, and those who were the most esteemed were the best natured.'

THE PERSECUTED LEARNED.

Those who have laboured most zealously to instruct mankind, have been those who have suffered most from ignorance; and the discoverers of new arts and sciences have hardly ever lived to see them accepted by the world. With a noble perception of his own genius, Lord Bacon, in his prophetic will, thus expresses himself. 'For my name and memory, I leave it to men's charitable speeches, and to foreign nations, and the next ages.' Before the times of Galileo and Harvey, the world believed in the stagnation of the blood, and the diurnal immovability of the earth; and for denying these the one was persecuted and the other ridiculed.

The intelligence and the virtue of Socrates were punished with death. Anaxagoras, when he attempted to propagate a just notion of the Supreme Being, was dragged to prison. Aristotle, after a long series of persecution, swallowed poison. Heraclitus, tormented by his countrymen, broke off all intercourse with men. The great geometricians and chemists, as Gerbert, Roger Bacon, and others, were abhorred as magicians. Pope Gerbert, as Bishop Otho gravely relates, obtained the pontificate by having given himself up entirely to the devil: others suspected him too of holding an intercourse with demons; but this was indeed a devilish age.

Virgilius, Bishop of Salzburg, having asserted that there existed antipodes, the archbishop of Mentz declared him a heretic, and consigned him to the flames; and the Abbot Trithemius, who was fond of improving steganography, or the art of secret writing, having published several curious works on this subject, they were condemned, as works full of diabolical mysteries; and Frederick II, Elector Palatine, ordered Trithemius's original work, which was in his library, to be publicly burnt.

Galileo was condemned at Rome publicly to disavow sentiments, the truth of which must have been to him abundantly manifest. 'Are these then my judges?' he exclaimed in retiring from the inquisitors, whose ignorance astonished him. He was imprisoned, and visited by Milton, who tells us he was then poor and old. The confessor of his widow, taking advantage of her piety, perused the mass of this great philosopher, and destroyed such as in his judgment, were not fit to be known to the world!

Gabriel Naude, in his apology for those great men who have been accused of magic, has recorded a melancholy number of the most eminent scholars, who have found, that to have been successful in their studies was a success which harassed them with continued persecution, a prison, or a grave.

Cornelius Agrippa was compelled to fly his country, and the enjoyment of a large income, merely for having displayed a few philosophical experiments, which now every school-boy can perform; but more particularly having attacked the then prevailing opinion, that St. Anne had three husbands, he was so violently persecuted, that he was obliged to fly from place to place. The people beheld him as an object of horror; and not unfrequently, when he walked, he found the streets empty at his approach. He died in an hospital.

In these times, it was a common opinion to suspect every great man of an intercourse with some familiar spirit. The favourite black dog of Agrippa was supposed to be a demon. When Urban Grandier, another victim to the age, was led to the stake, a large fly settled on his head: a monk, who had heard that Beelzebub signifies in Hebrew, the God of Flies, reported that he saw this spirit come to take possession of him. Mr De Langle, a French minister, who employed many spies, was frequently accused of diabolical communication. Sixtus the Fifth, Marshal Faber, Roger Bacon, Cesar Borgia, his son Alexander VI, and others, like Socrates, had their diabolical attendant.

Cardan was believed to be a magician. The fact is, that he was for his time a very able naturalist; and he who happened to know something of the arcana of nature was immediately suspected of magic. Even the learned themselves, who had not applied to natural philosophy, seem to have acted with the same feelings as the most ignorant; for when Albert, usually called the Great, an epithet he owed to his name De Groot, constructed a curious piece of mechanism, which sent forth distinct vocal sounds, Thomas Aquinas was so much terrified at it, that he struck it with his staff, and to the mortification of Albert annihilated the curious labour of thirty years!

Petrarch was less desirous of the laurel for the honour, than for the hope of being sheltered by it from the thunder of the priests, by whom both he and his brother poets were continually threatened. They could not imagine a poet, without supposing him to hold an intercourse with some demon. This was, as Abbé Rensel observes, having a most exalted idea of poetry, though a very bad one of poets. An antipoeitic Dominican was notorious for persecuting all verse makers; the power of which he attributed to the effects of heresy and magic. The lights of philosophy have dispersed all these accusations of magic, and have shown a dreadful chain of perjuries and conspiracies.

Descartes was horribly persecuted in Holland, when he first published his opinions. Voetius, a bigot of great influence at Utrecht, accused him of atheism, and had even projected in his mind to have this philosopher burned at Utrecht in an extraordinary fire, which, kindled on an eminence, might be observed by the seven provinces. Mr Hallam has observed, that 'the ordeal of fire was the great purifier of books and men.' This persecution of science and genius lasted till the close of the seventeenth century.

If the metaphysician stood a chance of being burned as a heretic, the natural philosopher was not in less jeopardy as a magician, is an observation of the same writer which sums up the whole.

POVERTY OF THE LEARNED.

Fortune has rarely condescended to be the companion of genius: others find a hundred by roads to her palace; there is but one open, and that a very indifferent one, for men of letters. Were we to erect an asylum for venerable genius, as we do for the brave and the helpless part of our citizens, it might be inscribed a Hospital for Incurables! When even Fame will not protect the man of genius from famine, Charity ought. No: should such an act be considered as a debt incurred by the helpless member, but a just tribute we pay in his person to Genius itself. Even in these enlightened times such have lived in obscurity while their reputation was widely spread; and have perished in poverty, while their works were enriching the booksellers.

Of the heroes of modern literature the accounts are as copious as they are melancholy.

Xylander sold his notes on Dion Cassius for a dinner. He tells us, that at the age of eighteen he studied to acquire glory, but at twenty-five he studied to get bread.

Cervantes, the immortal genius of Spain, is supposed to have wanted bread; Camoens, the solitary pride of Portugal, deprived of the necessities of life, perished in an hospital at Lisbon. This fact has been accidentally preserved in an entry in a copy of the first edition of the Lusiad, in the possession of Lord Holland. In a note written by a friar, who must have been a witness of the dying scene of the poet, and probably received the volume which now preserves the sad memorial, and which recalled it to his mind, from the hands of the unhappy poet. 'What a lamentable thing to see so great a genius so ill rewarded! I saw him die in an hospital in Lisbon, without having a sheet or shroud, sua cama, to cover him, after having triumphed in the East Indies, and sailed 8500 leagues! What good advice for those who weary themselves night and day in study without profit! Camoens, when some hidalgo complained that he had not performed his promise in writing some verses for him, replied, When I wrote verses I was young, had sufficient food, was a lover, and beloved by many friends, and by the ladies; then I felt poetical ardour; now I have no spirits, no peace of mind. See there my Javanese who asks me for two pieces to purchase firing, and I have them not to give him.' The Portuguese, after his death, bestowed on the man of genius they had starved the appellation of Great! Vondel, the Dutch Shakspeare, after composing a number of popular tragedies, lived in great poverty, and died at nine years of age; then he had his coffin carried by four poets, who without his genius probably partook of his wretchedness.

The great Tasso was reduced to such a dilemma, that he was obliged to borrow a crown from a friend to subsist through the week. He alludes to his dress in a poem, which he addresses to his cat, entreating her to assist him, during the night, with the lustre of her eyes: 'Non avendo candele per iscrivere i suoi versi' having no candle to see to write his verses!

When the liberality of Alphonso enabled Ariosto to build a small house, it seems that it was but ill furnished. When told that such a building was not fit for one who had raised so many fine palaces in his writings, he answered, that the structure of words and that of stones was the same thing. 'Che porvile pietra, e porvile parole, se e il medesimo' At Ferrara this house is still shown. 'Po ve ad apta' he calls it, but exults that it was paid with his own money. This was in a moment of good-humour which he did not always enjoy; for in his Satires he bitterly complains of the bondage of dependence and poverty. Little thought the poet the commune would order this small house to be purchased with their own funds, that it might be dedicated to his immortal memory!

The illustrious Cardinal Bentivoglio, the ornament of Italy and of literature, languished, in his old age, in the most distressful poverty; and having sold his palace to satisfy his creditors, left nothing behind him but his reputation. The learned Pomponius Lætus lived in such a state of poverty, that his friend Platina who wrote the life of the popes, and also a book of cookery, introduces him into the cookery book by a facetious observation, that Pomponius Lætus should be robbed of a couple of eggs he would not have wherewithal to purchase two other eggs. The history of Aldrovandus is noble and pathetic; having expended a large fortune in forming his collections of natural history, and employing the first artists in Europe, he was suffered to die in the hospital of that city, to what fame he had eminently contributed.

Du Ryer, a celebrated French poet, was constrained to labour with rapidity, and to live in the cottage of an obscure village. His booksellers bought his heroic verses for one hundred sols the hundred lines, and the smaller ones for fifty sols. What an interesting picture has a contemporary given of his reception by a poor and ingenious author in a visit he paid to Du Ryer! 'On a fine summer day I went to him, at some distance from town. He received me with joy, talked to us of his numerous projects, and showed us several of his works. But what more interested me was, that though dreading to show us his poverty, he contrived to give us some refreshments. We seated ourselves under a wide oak, the tablecloth was spread on the grass his wife brought us some milk, with fresh water and brown bread, and he picked a basket of cherries. He welcomed us with gaiety, but we could not take leave of this amiable man, now grown old, without tears, to see him so ill treated by fortune, and to have nothing left but literary honour!'

Vaugelas, the most polished writer of the French language, who devoted 30 years to his translation of Quintus Curtius (a circumstance which modern translators could have no conception of), died possessed of nothing valuable but his precious manuscripts. This ingenious scholar left his corpse to the surgeons for the benefit of his creditors.

Louis the Fourteenth honoured Racine and Boileau with a private monthly audience. One day the king asked what there was new in the literary world? Racine answered, that he had seen a melancholy spectacle in the house of Corneille, whom he found dying, deprived even of a little broth! The king preserved a profound silence and sent the dying poet a sum of money.

Dryden, for less than three hundred pounds, sold Ten thousand verses, as may be seen by the agreement which has been published.

Purchas, who, in the reign of our First James, had spent his life in travels and study to form his Relation of the World, when he gave it to the public, for the reward of his labours was thrown into prison, at the suit of his printer. Yet this was the book which, he informs us, he dedicated to Charles the First, his father read every night with great profit and satisfaction.

The Marquis of Worcester, in a petition to parliament, the reign of Charles II, offered to publish the hundred secrets and machines, enumerated in his very curious Comptium of Inventions, on condition that money should be granted to extricate him from the difficulties in which he involved himself, by the prosecution of useful discoveries. The petition does not appear to have been attended to! Many of these admirable inventions were lost. The steam engine and the telegraph may be traced among them.

It appears by the Harleian mss, 1624, that Rushworth, is author of 'Historical Collections,' passed the last year of his life in jail, where indeed he died. After the restoration, when he presented to the king several of the city council's books, which he had preserved from ruin, he received for his only reward, the thanks of his majesty. Rymer, the collector of the Fœdera, must have been very reduced, by the following letter, I found addressed by Sir H. Nere, Norroy, to the Earl of Oxford:

'I am desired by Mr Rymer, historiographer, to lay before your lordship the circumstances of his affairs. He has forced some years back to part with all his choice stated books to subsist himself; and now, he says, he must be forced, for subsistence, to sell all his mss collections to the best bidder, without your lordship will be pleased to buy them for the queen's library. They are fifty vols. of public affairs, which he hath collected, but not printed. The price he asks is five hundred pounds.'

Samuel Ockley, a learned student in Oriental literature, addresses a letter to the same earl, in which he paints his labours in glowing colours. After having devoted his life to Asiatic researches, then very uncommon, he had the satisfaction of dating his preface to his great work from Cambridge Castle, where he was confined for debt; and, like an air of triumph, feels a martyr's enthusiasm in the time in which he perishes.

He published his first volume of the History of the Sarracens, in 1708; and ardently pursuing his oriental studies, published his second volume ten years afterwards without patronage. Alluding to the encouragement necessary to youth, to remove the obstacles to such studies, he observes, that 'young men will hardly come in on the prospect of finding leisure, in a prison, to transcribe those papers for the press, which they have collected with indefatigable labour, and oftentimes at the expense of their life, and all the other conveniences of life, for the service of the public. No, though I were to assure them from my own experience, that I have enjoyed more true liberty, more happy leisure, and more solid repose, in six months in prison, than in twice the same number of years before. Evil is the condition of that historian who undertakes to write the life of others, before he knows how to live himself! Not I speak thus as if I thought I had any just cause to be angry with the world—I did always in my judgment give the preference of wisdom the preference to that of riches! I remember, the child of Fancy, languished out his life in prison. 'Lord Barleigh,' says Granger, 'who it is said cost the queen giving him a hundred pounds, seems to have thought the lowest clerk in his office a more desirable person.' Mr Malone attempts to show that Spenser had a small pension; but the poet's querulous verses are not to be forgotten—

'Full Hail knowest thou, that hast not try'd

'What Hell it is, in suing long to bide.'

To lose good days—to waste long nights—and as he sighs exclaims,

'To fawn, to crouch, to wait, to ride, to run,

'To speed, to give, to want, to be undone!'

Now affecting is the death of Sydenham, who had devoted his life to a laborious version of Plato. He died in his study-house, and it was his death which appears to have given rise to the Literary Fund 'for the relief of learned authors.'

How shall pursue important labours when they read to amuse? Dr Edmund Castell spent a great part of his life in compiling his Lexicon Heptaglotton, on which he suffered incredible pains, and expended on it no less than 12,000*l*, and broke his constitution, and exhausted himself. At length it was printed, but the copies remained in his hands. He exhibits a curious picture of literary labour in his preface. 'As for myself, I have been incessantly occupied for such a number of years in this work, Melancholus he calls them, that that day, as it were, a holiday in which I have not laboured so much as sixteen or eighteen hours in these enlarging lexicons and Polyglot Bibles.'

Le Sage resided in a little cottage while he supplied the world with their most agreeable novels, and appears to have derived the sources of his existence in his old age from the filial exertions of an excellent son, who was an actor of some genius. I wish, however, that every man of letters could apply to himself the epitaph of this delightful writer:

Sous ce tombeau git Le Sage abattu,
Par le ciseau de la Parque infortuné;
S'il ne fut pas ami de la fortune,
Il fut toujours ami de la vertu.

Many years after this article had been written, I published 'Calamities of Authors,' confining myself to those of our own country; the catalogue is very incomplete, but far too numerous.

IMPRISONMENT OF THE LEARNED.

Imprisonment has not always disturbed the man of letters in the progress of his studies, but often unquestionably has greatly promoted them.

In prison Boethius composed his work on the Consolations of Philosophy; and Grotius wrote his Commentary on Saint Matthew, with other works: the detail of his allotment of time to different studies, during his confinement, is very instructive.

Buchanan in the dungeon of a monastery in Portugal, composed his excellent Paraphrases of the Psalms of David.

Cervantes composed the most agreeable book in the Spanish language during his captivity in Barbary.

Fleta, a well known law production, was written by a person confined in the Fleet for debt; the name of the place, though not that of the author, has thus been preserved; and another work, 'Fleta Minor, or the Laws of Art and Nature in knowing the Bodies of Metals, &c.,' by Sir John Pettus, 1688; who gave it this title from the circumstance of his having translated it from the German during his confinement in this prison.

Louis the Twelfth, when the Duke of Orleans, was long imprisoned in the Tower of Bourges, applying himself to his studies, which he had hitherto neglected; he became, in consequence, an enlightened monarch.

Margaret, queen of Henry the Fourth, king of France, confined in the Louvre, pursued very warmly the studies of elegant literature, and composed a very skilful apology for the irregularities of her conduct.

Charles the First, during his cruel confinement at Holmby, wrote the Eikon Basilike, 'the Royal Image,' addressed to his son; this work has, however, been attributed by his enemies to Dr Gauden, who was incapable of writing the book, though not of disowning it.

Queen Elizabeth, while confined by her sister Mary, wrote several poems, which we do not find she ever could equal after her enlargement; and it is said Mary Queen of Scots, during her long imprisonment by Elizabeth, produced many pleasing poetic compositions.

Sir Walter Rawleigh's unfinished History of the World, which leaves us to regret that later ages had not been celebrated by his sublime eloquence, was the fruits of eleven years of imprisonment. It was written for the use of Prince Henry, as he and Dallington, who also wrote 'Aphorisms' for the same prince, have told us; the prince looked over the manuscript. Of Rawleigh it is observed, to employ the language of Hume, 'They were struck with the extensive genius of the man, who, being educated amidst naval and military enterprises, had surpassed, in the pursuits of literature, even those of the most recluse and sedentary lives; and they admired his unbroken magnanimity which at his age, and under his circumstances, could engage him to undertake and execute so great a work as his History of the World. He was, however, assisted in this great work by the learning of several eminent persons; a circumstance which has not been noticed.

The plan of the Henriade was sketched, and the greater part composed, by Voltaire, during his imprisonment in the Bastille; and 'the Pilgrim's Progress' of Bunyan was produced in a similar situation.

Howel, the author of 'Familiar Letters,' wrote the chief part of them, and almost all his other works, during his long confinement in the Fleet-prison; he employed his fertile pen for subsistence; and in all his books we find much entertainment.

Lydiat, while confined in the King's Bench, for debt, wrote his Annotations on the Parian Chronicle, which were first published by Prideaux. This was that learned scholar whom Johnson alludes to; an allusion not known to Boswell and others.

The learned Selden, committed to prison for his attacks on the divine right of kings and the king's prerogative, prepared during his confinement, his history of Eadmer, enriched by his notes.

Cardinal Polignac formed the design of refuting the arguments of the sceptics which Bayle had been renewing in his dictionary; but his public occupations hindered him. Two exiles at length fortunately gave him the leisure; and the Anti-Lucretius is the fruit of the court disgraces of its author.

Freret, when imprisoned in the Bastille, was permitted only to have Bayle for his companion. His dictionary was always before him, and his principles were got by heart. To this circumstance we owe his works, animated by all the powers of scepticism.

Sir William Davenant finished his poem of Gondibert during his confinement by the rebels in Carisbrooke Castle.

De Foe, when imprisoned in Newgate for a political pamphlet, began his Review; a periodical paper, which has extended to nine thick volumes in quarto, and it has been supposed served as the model of the celebrated papers of Steele. There he also composed his Jure Divino.

Wicquefort's curious work on 'Ambassadors' is dated from his prison, where he had been confined for state affairs. He softened the rigour of those heavy hours by several historical works.

One of the most interesting facts of this kind is the fate of an Italian scholar, of the name of Maggi. Early addicted to the study of the sciences, and particularly to the mathematics and military architecture, he defended Famagusta, besieged by the Turks, by inventing machines which destroyed their works. When that city was taken in 1571, they pillaged his library, and carried him away in chains. Now a slave, after his daily labours he amused a great part of his nights by literary compositions; 'De Tintinnabulis,' on Bells, a treatise still read by the curious, was actually composed by him when a slave in Turkey, without any other resource than the erudition of his own memory, and the genius of which adversity could not deprive him.

AMUSEMENTS OF THE LEARNED.

Among the Jesuits it was a standing rule of the order, that after an application to study for two hours, the mind of the student should be unbent by some relaxation however trifling. When Petavius was employed in his Dogmata Theologica, a work of the most profound and extensive erudition, the great recreation of the learned father was at the end of every second hour to twirl his chair for five minutes. After protracted studies Spinoza would mix with the family-party where he lodged, and join in the most trivial conversations, or unbend his mind by setting spiders to fight each other; he observed their combats with so much interest that he was often seized with immoderate fits of laughter. A continuity of labour deadens the soul, observes Seneca, in closing his treatise on 'The Tranquillity of the Soul,' and the mind must unbind itself by certain amusements. Socrates did not blush to play with children; Cato, over his bottle, found an alleviation from the fatigues of government; a circumstance, he says in his manner, which rather gives honour to this defect, than the defect dishonours Cato. Some men of letters portioned out their day between repose and labour. Asinius Pollio would not suffer any business to occupy him beyond a stated hour; after that time he would not allow any letter to be opened during his hours of relaxation, that they might not be interrupted by unforeseen labours. In the senate, after the tenth hour, it was not allowed to make any new motion.

Tycho Brahe diverted himself with polishing glasses for all kinds of spectacles, and making mathematical instruments; an amusement too closely connected with his studies to be deemed as one.

D'Andilly, the translator of Josephus, after seven or eight hours of study every day, amused himself in cultivating trees; Barclay, the author of the Argenis, in his leisure hours was a skilful; Balaac amused himself with a collection of crayon portraits; Peiresc found his amusement amongst his medals and antiquarian curiosities; the Abbé de Maroles with his prints; and Politian in singing airs to his lute. Descartes passed his afternoons in the conversation of a few friends, and in cultivating a little garden in the morning, occupied by the system of the world he relaxed his profound speculations by rearing delicate flowers.

Conrad ad Uffenbach, a learned German, recreated his mind, after severe studies, with a collection of prints of eminent persons, methodically arranged; he retained the ardour of the Grangerie to his last days.

Rohault wandered from shop to shop to observe the mechanics labour; Count Caylus passed his mornings in the studies of art and science, and his evenings in writing his numerous works on art. This was the true life of an amateur.

Granville Sharp, amidst the severities of his studies, found a social relaxation in the amusement of a barge on the Thames, which was well known to the circle of his friends; there, was festive hospitality with musical delight. It was resorted to by men of the most eminent talent and rank. His little voyages to Putney, to Kew, and to Richmond, and the literary intercourse they produced were singularly happy ones. 'The history of his amusements cannot be told without adding to the dignity of his character,' observes Mr Prince Hoare, in the very curious life of this great philanthropist.

Some have found amusement in composing treatises on odd subjects. Seneca wrote a burlesque narrative of Claudian's death. Pierius Valerianus has written a eulogium on beards; and we have had a learned one recently, with due gravity and pleasantry, entitled 'Eloge de Perruques.'

Holstein has written an eulogium on the North Wind Heinsius, on 'the Ass'; Menage, 'the Transmigration of the Parasitical Pedant to a Parrot'; and also the 'Politics of the Dictionaries.'

Erasmus composed, to amuse himself when travelling in a post-chaise, his panegyric on Moria, or Folly; which authorized by the pun, he dedicated to Sir Thomas More.

Sallengre, who would amuse himself like Erasmus wrote, in imitation of his work, a panegyric on Ebrietas. He says, that he is willing to be thought as drunken as Erasmus was a foolish one. Synesius composed Greek panegyric on Baldness; these burlesques were brought into great vogue by Erasmus's Mores Encomiastici. It seems, Johnson observes in his life of Sir Thomas Browne, to have been in all ages the pride of art to show how it could exalt the low and amplify the little. To this ambition perhaps we owe the frogs of Homer; the grass and the bees of Virgil; the butterfly of Spenser; the clouds of Wovewius; and the quincunx of Browne.

Cardinal de Richelieu, amongst all his great occupations found a recreation in violent exercises; and he was as discovered jumping with his servant, to try who could reach the highest side of a wall. De Grammont, observing a cardinal to be jealous of his powers, offered to jump with him; and in the true spirit of a courtier, having made some efforts which nearly reached the cardinal's, confessed the cardinal surpassed him. This was jumping like a politician; and by this means he is said to have ingratiated himself with the minister.

The great Samuel Clarke was fond of robust exercises and this profound logician has been found leaping on tables and chairs: once perceiving a pedantic fellow, said, 'Now we must desist, for a fool is coming in.'

What ridiculous amusements passed between Dr Swift and his friends, in Ireland, some of his profane editors have revealed to the public. He seems to be outlived the relish of fame, when he could level his nose to such perpetual trifles.

An eminent French lawyer, confined by his business to a Parisian life, amused himself with collecting from the classics all the passages which relate to a country life. His collection was published after his death.

Contemplative men seem to be fond of amusement which accord with their habits. The thoughtful gamester, and the tranquil delight of angling, have been found in his recreations with the studious. Paley had himself amused with a rod and line in his hand; a strange characteristic for the author of 'Natural Theology.' Sir H. Wotton called angling 'idle time not idle spent;' we suppose that his meditations and his amusements were carried on at the same moment.

The amusements of the great Daguesseau, chancellor of France, consisted in an interchange of studies: his relaxations were all the varieties of literature. 'Le plaisir de l'étude est mon seul délassement,' said this man; and Thomas observes, 'that in the age of the ancients, his only passion was study.'

Seneca has observed on amusements proper for his

in, in regard to robust exercises, that these are a folly, and indocency to see a man of letters exult in the strength of his arm, or the breadth of his back! such amusements diminish the activity of the mind. Too much fatigue exhausts animal spirits, as too much food blunts the finer faculties; but elsewhere he allows his philosopher an occasional libidination; an amusement which was very prevalent among our poets formerly, when they exclaimed,

Fetch me Ben Jonson's skull, and flit with sack,
Rich as the same he drank, when the whole peck
Of jolly sisters pledged, and did agree
It was no sin to be as drunk as he!

Seneca concludes admirably, 'whatever be the amusements you choose, return not slowly from those of the body to the mind; exercise the latter night and day. The mind nourished at a cheap rate; neither cold nor heat, nor pain itself can interrupt this exercise; give therefore all your cares to a possession which ameliorates even in its ill age!

An ingenious writer has observed, that 'a garden just accommodates itself to the perambulations of a scholar, he would perhaps rather wish his walks abridged than extended.' There is a good characteristic account of the hole in which the literati take exercise in Pope's letters. I, like a poor squirrel, am continually in motion indeed, but it is about a cage of three foot; my little excursions are like those of a shopkeeper, who walks every day a mile or so before his own door, but minds his business all the while.' A turn or two in a garden will often very happily lose a fine period, mature an unripened thought, and raise free associations, when the mind like the body becomes rigid by preserving the same posture. Buffon occupied the apartment he studied in, which was placed in the midst of his garden, for a walk in it; Evelyn loved walks and a garden.

PORTRAITS OF AUTHORS.

With the ancients, it was undoubtedly a custom to place the portraits of authors before their works. Martial's 168th epigram of his fourteenth book in a mere play of words, concerning a little volume containing the works of Virgil, and which had his portrait prefixed to it. The theme and the characters must have been very diminutive.

'Quam brevis immensum cepit membrana Maronem!
'Ipsum Votus prima tabella gerit.'

Martial is not the only writer who takes notice of the poets prefixing portraits to the works of authors. Seneca, in his ninth chapter on the Tranquillity of the Soul, complains of many of the luxurious great, who, like so many of our own collectors, possessed libraries as they called their estate and equipages. 'It is melancholy to observe how the portraits of men of genius, and the works of their divine intelligence, are used only as the luxury and ornaments of walls.'

Pliny has nearly the same observation, Lib. xxiv. cap. 1. He remarks, that the custom was rather modern in his time; and attributes to Asinius Pollio the honour of having introduced it into Rome. 'In consecrating a library with portraits of our illustrious authors, he has formed, if I may so express myself, a republic of the intellectual powers of men.' To the richness of book-treasures, Asinius Pollio had associated a new source of pleasure, in placing the statues of their authors amidst them, inspiring the minds of the spectators even by their eyes.

A taste for collecting portraits, or busts, was warmly pursued in the happier periods of Rome; for the celebrated Atticus, in a work he published of illustrious Romans, made it more delightful, by ornamenting it with the portraits of those great men; and the learned Varro, in his biography of Seven Hundred celebrated Men, by giving to world their true features and their physiognomy, in the manner, atque modo imaginibus is Pliny's expression, showed that even their persons should not entirely be obliterated, they indeed adds Pliny, form a spectacle which the gods themselves might contemplate; for if the gods sent us heroes to the earth, it is Varro who secured their mortality, and has so multiplied and distributed them in places, that we may carry them about us, place them wherever we choose, and fix our eyes on them with perpetual admiration. A spectacle that every day becomes more varied and interesting, as new heroes appear, and as parts of this kind are spread abroad.

stamping an impression was daily practised, and in fact, they possessed the art of printing without being aware of it) how were these portraits of Varro so easily propagated? If copied with a pen, their correctness was in some danger, and their diffusion must have been very confined and slow; perhaps they were outlines. This passage of Pliny's excites curiosity, which it may be difficult to satisfy.

Amongst the various advantages which attend a collection of portraits of illustrious characters, Oldys observes, that they not only serve as matters of entertainment and curiosity, and preserve the different modes or habits of the fashions of the time, but become of infinite importance, by settling our floating ideas upon the true features of famous persons; they fix the chronological particulars of their birth age, death, sometimes with short characters of them, besides the names of painter, designer, and engraver. It is thus a single print, by the hand of a skilful artist, may become a varied banquet. To this Granger adds, that in a collection of engraved portraits, the contents of many galleries are reduced into the narrow compass of a few volumes; and the portraits of eminent persons, who distinguished themselves for a long succession of ages, may be turned over in a few hours.

'Another advantage,' Granger continues, 'attending such an assemblage is, that the methodical arrangement has a surprising effect upon the memory. We see the celebrated contemporaries of every age almost at one view; and the mind is insensibly led to the history of that period. I may add to these, an important circumstance, which is the power that such a collection will have in awakening genius. A skilful preceptor will presently perceive the true bent of the temper of his pupil, by his being struck with a Blake or a Boyle, a Hyde or a Milton.'

A circumstance in the life of Cicero confirms this observation. Atticus had a gallery adorned with the images of portraits of the great men of Rome, under each of which Cornelius Nepos says, he had severally described their principal acts and honours in a few concise verses of his own composition. It was by the contemplation of two of these portraits (Old Brutus and a venerable relative in one picture) that Cicero seems to have incited Brutus by the example of these his great ancestors, to dissolve the tyranny of Caesar. Fairfax made a collection of engraved portraits of warriors. A story much in favour of portrait-collectors is that of the Athenian courtesan, who, in the midst of a riotous banquet with her lovers, accidentally casting her eye on the portrait of a philosopher that hung opposite to her seat, the happy character of temperance and virtue struck her with so lively an image of her own unworthiness, that she instantly quitted the room, and retired for ever from the scene of debauchery. The orientalists have felt the same charm in their pictured memorial; for 'the imperial Akber,' says Mr Forbes, in his Oriental Memoirs, 'employed artists to make portraits of all the principal emirs and officers in his court; they were bound together in a thick volume, wherein, as the Aven Akbery or the Institutes of Akber express it, 'The Past are kept in lively remembrance: and the Present are insured immortality.'

Leonard Aretin, when young and in prison, found a portrait of Petrarch, on which his eyes were perpetually fixed; and this sort of contemplation inflamed the desire of imitating this great man: Buffon hung the portrait of Newton before his writing-table.

On this subject, how sublimely Tacitus expresses himself at the close of his admired biography of Agricola. 'I do not mean to censure the custom of preserving in brass or marble, the shape and stature of eminent men; but busts and statues, like their originals, are frail and perishable. The soul is formed of finer elements, its inward form is not to be expressed by the hand of an artist with unconscious matter; our manners and our morals may in some degree trace the resemblance. All of Agricola that gained our love and raised our admiration still subsists, and ever will subsist, preserved in the minds of men, the register of ages and the records of fame.'

What is more agreeable to the curiosity of the mind and the eye than portraits of great characters? An old philosopher whom Marville invited to see a collection of landscapes by a celebrated artist, replied, 'landscapes I prefer seeing in the country itself, but I am fond of contemplating the pictures of illustrious men.' This opinion has some truth: Lord Orford preferring an interesting portrait, to either landscape or historical painting. 'A landscape, said he, 'however excellent in its distributions of wood, and water, and buildings, leaves not one tract in the memory; historical painting is perpetually false in a variety of ways, in the costume, the grouping, the portraits, and is nothing more than fabulous painting; but the real portrait is truth itself; and calls up so many collateral ideas as to fill an intelligent mind more than any other species.

Marville justly reprehends the fastidious feelings of those ingenious men who have resisted the solicitations of the artist, to sit for their portraits. In them it is sometimes as much pride as it is vanity in those who are less difficult in this respect. Of Gray, Shenstone, Fielding and Akenside, we have no heads for which they sat; a circumstance regretted by their admirers, and by physiognomists.

To an arranged collection of Portraits, we owe several interesting works. Granger's justly esteemed volumes originated in such a collection. Perrault's Eloges of 'the illustrious men of the seventeenth century,' were drawn up to accompany the engraved portraits of the most celebrated characters of the age, which a fervent lover of the fine arts and literature had had engraved as an elegant tribute to the fame of those great men. They are confined to his nation, as Granger's to ours. The parent of this race of books may perhaps be the Eulogiums of Paulus Jovius, which originated in a beautiful Cabinet, whose situation he has described with all its amenity.

Paulus Jovius had a country house, in an insular situation of a most romantic aspect. It was built on the ruins of the villa of Pliny; and in his time the foundations were still to be traced. When the surrounding lake was calm, in its lucid bosom were still viewed sculptured marbles, the trunks of columns, and the fragments of those pyramids which had once adorned the residence of the friend of Trajan. Jovius was an enthusiast of literary leisure; an historian, with the imagination of a poet; a bishop nourished on the sweet fictions of pagan mythology. His pen colours like a pencil. He paints rapturously, his gardens bathed by the waters of the lake, the shade and freshness of his woods, his green hills, his sparkling fountains, the deep silence, and the calm of solitude. He describes a statue raised in his gardens to Nature; in his hall an Apollo presided with his lyre, and the Muses with their attributes; his library was guarded by Mercury, and an apartment devoted to the three Graces was embellished by Doric columns, and paintings of the most pleasing kind. Such was the interior! Without, the pure and transparent lake spread its broad mirror, rolled its voluminous windings, while the banks were richly covered with olives and laurels, and in the distance, towns, promontories, hills rising in an amphitheatre blushing with vines, and the elevations of the Alps covered with woods and pasturage, and sprinkled with herds and flocks.

In the centre of this enchanting habitation stood the Cabinet, where Paulus Jovius had collected, at great cost, the Portraits of the celebrated men of the fourteenth and two succeeding centuries. The daily view of them animated his mind to compose their eulogiums. These are still curious; both for the facts they preserve, and the happy consciousness with which Jovius delineates a character. He had collected these portraits as others from a collection of natural history; and he pursued in their characters what others do in their experiments.

One caution in collecting portraits must not be forgotten: it respects their authenticity. We have too many supposititious heads, and ideal personages. Conrade ad Uffenbach, who seems to have been the first collector who projected a methodical arrangement, condemned those portraits which were not genuine, as fit only for the amusements of children. The painter does not always give a correct likeness, or the engraver misses it in his copy. The faithful Vertue refused to engrave for Houbraken's set, because they did not authenticate their originals; and some of these are spurious. Busts are not so liable to these accidents. It is to be regretted that men of genius have not been careful to transmit their own portraits to their admirers; it forms a part of their character: a false delicacy has interfered. Erasmus did not like to have his own diminutive person sent down to posterity, but Holbein was always affectionately painting his friends; Bayle and others have refused; but Montesquieu once sat to Dacier after repeating denials, won over by the ingenious argument of the artist; 'Do you not think,' said Dacier, 'that there is as much pride in refusing my offer as in accepting it?'

DESTRUCTION OF BOOKS.

The literary treasures of antiquity have suffered from the malice of men, as well as that of time. It is remarkable that conquerors, in the moment of victory, or in the unsparing devastations of their rage, have not been satisfied with destroying men; but have even carried their vengeance to books.

Ancient history records how the Persians, from hatred of the religion of the Phœnicians and the Egyptians, destroyed their books, of which Eusebius notices they possessed a great number. A remarkable anecdote is recorded of the Grecian libraries; one at Gnidus was burnt by the sect of Hippocrates, because the Gnidians refused to follow the doctrines of their master. If the followers of Hippocrates formed the majority, was it not very unorthodox in the Gnidians to prefer taking physic their own way? The anecdote may be suspicious, but factious has often annihilated books.

The Romans burnt the books of the Jews, of the Christians, and the philosophers; the Jews burnt the books of the Christians and the Pagans; and the Christians burnt the books of the Pagans and the Jews. The greater part of the books of Origen and other heretics were continually burnt by the orthodox party. Gibbon pathetically describes the empty library of Alexandria after the Christians had destroyed it. 'The valuable library of Alexandria was pillaged or destroyed; and near twenty years afterwards the appearance of the empty shelves excited the regret and indignation of every spectator, whose mind was not totally darkened by religious prejudice. The compositions of ancient genius, so many of which have irretrievably perished, might surely have been excepted from the wreck of idolatry, for the amusement and instruction of succeeding ages and either the seal or avarice of the archbishop might have been satisfied with the richest spoils which were the rewards of his victory.'

The curious narrative of Nicetas Choniates of the ravages committed by the Christians of the thirteenth century in Constantinople, was fraudulently suppressed in the printed editions; it has been preserved by Dr Clarke. We cannot follow this painful history, step by step, of the pathos Nicetas, without indignant feelings. Dr Clarke observes, that the Turks have committed fewer injuries to the works of art than the barbarous Christians of that age.

The reading of the Jewish Talmud has been forbidden by various edicts, of the Emperor Justinian, of many of the French and Spanish kings, and numbers of popes. All the copies were ordered to be burnt; the intrepid perseverance of the Jews themselves preserved that work from annihilation. In 1566 twelve thousand copies were thrown into the flames at Cremona. John Reuchlin interfered to stop this universal destruction of Talmuds; for which he became hated by the monks, and condemned by the Elector of Mentz, but appealing to Rome, the prosecution was stopped; and the traditions of the Jews were considered as not necessary to be destroyed.

Conquerors at first destroy with the rankest zeal the national records of the conquered people; hence it is that the Irish deplore the irreparable losses of their most ancient national memorials, which their invaders have been too successful in annihilating. The same event occurred in the conquest of Mexico; and the interesting history of the New World must ever remain imperfect in consequence of the unfortunate success of the first missionaries; who too late became sensible of their error. Olavigerio, the most authentic historian of Mexico, continually laments this affecting loss. Every thing in that country had been painted, and painters abounded there, as scribes in Europe. The first missionaries, suspicious that superstition was mixed with all their paintings, attacked the chief school of these artists, and collecting, in the market-place, a little mountain of these precious records, they set fire to it; and buried in the ashes the memory of many most interesting events. Afterwards sensible of their error, they tried to collect information from the mouths of the Indians; but the Indians were indignantly silent; when they attempted to collect the remains of these painted histories, the patriotic Mexican usually buried in concealment the remaining records of his country.

The story of the Caliph Omar proclaiming throughout the Kingdom, at the taking of Alexandria, that the Koran contained every thing which was useful to believe and to know, and he therefore, ordered all the books in the Alexandrian library to be distributed to the masters of the baths amounting to 4000, to be used in heating their stoves during a period of six months, modern paradox would attempt deny. But the tale would not be singular even were it true; it perfectly suits the character of a bigot; a barbarian, and a blockhead. A similar event happened in Persia. When Abdoolah, who in the third century of the Mohammedan era governed Khorasan, was presented at Shapoor with a missal, which was shown as a literary curiosity, he asked the title of it, and was told it was the tale of Wamick and Oomra; composed by the great poet, Nozwan. On this Abdoolah observed, that those of his country and faith had nothing to do with any other book than the Koran; and that the composition of an idolator must be detestable! Not only he declined accepting it, but ordered it to be burnt in his presence; and further issued a proclamation commanding all Persian missals, which should be found within the circle of his government to be burned! Each of the most ancient poetry of the Persians perished by this fanatical edict.

Cardinal Ximenes seems to have retaliated a little on the Saracens; for at the taking of Granada he condemned the flames five thousand Korans.

The following anecdotes respecting a Spanish missal, called St Isidore's, is not incurious; hard fighting saved it from destruction. In the Moorish wars, all these missals had been destroyed excepting those in the city of Toledo. There in six churches the Christians were allowed the free exercise of their religion. When the Moors were expelled several centuries afterwards from Toledo, Alphonsus the VI altered the Roman missal to be used in those churches; and the people of Toledo insisted on having their own preserved, as being drawn up by the most ancient bishops, and signed by St Isidore. It had been used by a great number of saints, and having been preserved pure during Moorish times, it seemed to them that Alphonsus was more tyrannical than the Turks. The contest between the Roman and the Toletan missals came to that height, that at length was determined to decide their fate by single combat; the champion of the Toletan missal felled by one blow the right of the Roman missal. Alphonsus still considered in battle as merely the effect of the heavy arm of the mighty Toletan, and ordered a fast to be proclaimed, and great fire to be prepared, into which, after his majesty and the people had joined in prayer for heavenly assistance, the ordeal, both the rivals (not the men, but the missals) were thrown into the flames—again St Isidore's missal triumphed, and this iron book was then allowed to be ordered by Alphonsus, and the good people of Toledo were ordered to say their prayers as they had long been used to. However, the copies of this missal at length became very scarce; for now when no one opposed the reading of St Isidore's missal, none cared to use it. Cardinal Ximenes found it so difficult to obtain a copy, that he made a large impression, and built a chapel, consecrated to St Isidore, that this service might be daily chanted as had been by the ancient Christians.

The works of the ancients were frequently destroyed at the instigation of the monks. They appear sometimes to be mutilated them, for passages have not come down to us which once evidently existed; and occasionally their suppositions and other forgeries formed a destruction in a new shape, by additions to the originals. They were incapable in erasing the best works of the most eminent Greek and Latin authors, in order to transcribe their ridiculous lives of saints on the obliterated vellum. One of the lives of Livy is in the Vatican most painfully defaced by the pious father for the purpose of writing on it some other or psalter, and there have been recently others destroyed in the same state. Inflamed with the blindest zeal against every thing pagan, Pope Gregory VII ordered that the library of the Palatine Apollo, a treasury of literature gathered by successive emperors, should be committed to flames! He issued this order under the notion of conveying the attention of the clergy to the holy scriptures! At that time all ancient learning which was not sanctioned by the authority of the church, has been emphatically distinguished as profane—in opposition to sacred. Pope Sixtus is said to have burnt the works of Varro, the great Roman, that St Austin should escape from the charge of plagiarism, being deeply indebted to Varro for the great work the 'City of God.' The emperor sent by the Emperor Ferdinand to proscribe the heretics from Bohemia, converted that flourishing country comparatively into a desert, from which it never seemed convinced that an enlightened people could never be long subservient to a tyrant, they struck one fatal blow at the national literature: every book they condemned was destroyed, even those of antiquity: the annals of the nation were forbidden to be read, and writers were not permitted even to compose on subjects of Bohemian literature. The mother tongue was held out as a mark of vulgar obscurity, and domiciliary visits were made for the purpose of inspecting books and the libraries of the Bohemians. With their books and their language they lost their national character and their independence.

The destruction of libraries in the reign of Henry VIII, at the dissolution of the monasteries is swept over by John Bale; those who purchased the religious houses took the libraries as part of the booty, with which they scoured their furniture, or sold the books as waste paper, or sent them abroad in ship-loads to foreign bookbinders.

The fear of destruction induced many to hide manuscripts under ground, and in old walls. At the Reformation popular rage exhausted itself on illuminated books, or missals that had red letters in the title-page; any work which was decorated was sure to be thrown into the flames as a superstitious one. Red letters and embellished figures were such marks of being papistical and diabolical. We still find such volumes mutilated of the gilt letters and elegant flourishes, but the greater number were annihilated. Many have been found under ground, being forgotten: what escaped the flames were obliterated by the damp; such is the deplorable fate of books during a persecution!

The puritans burnt every thing they found which bore the vestige of popish origin. We have on record many curious accounts of their pious depredations of their maiming images and erasing pictures. The heroic expeditions of one Downing are journalised by himself; a fanatical Quixotte, to whose intrepid arm many of our noseless saints sculptured on our cathedrals owe their misfortunes.

The following are some details from the diary of this redoubtable Goth, during his rage for reformation. His entries are expressed with a laconic conciseness, and it would seem with a little dry humour. 'At Sunbury, we brake down ten mighty great angels in glass. At Barham, brake down the twelve apostles in the chancel, and six superstitious pictures more there; and eight in the church, one a lamb with a cross (!) on the back; and digged down the steps and took up four superstitious inscriptions in brass, &c. 'At Lady Bruce's house, the chapel, a picture of God the Father, of the Trinity, of Christ, of the Holy Ghost, and the cloven tongues, which we gave orders to take down, and the lady promised to do it.' At another place they 'brake six hundred superstitious pictures, eight Holy Ghosts, and three of the Son.' And in this manner he and his deputies scoured one hundred and fifty parishes! It has been humourously conjectured, that from this ruthless devastator originated the phrase to give a Downing. Bishop Hall saved the windows of his chapel at Norwich from destruction, by taking out the heads of the figures, and this accounts for the many faces in church windows which we see supplied in white glass.

In the various civil wars in our country, numerous libraries have suffered both in missals and printed books. 'I dare maintain,' says Fuller, 'that the wars betwixt York and Lancaster, which lasted sixty years, were not so destructive as our modern wars in six years.' He alludes to the parliamentary feuds in the reign of Charles I. 'For during the former their differences agreed in the same religion, impressing them with reverence to all sacred monuments; whilst our civil wars, founded in faction and variety of pretended religions, exposed all naked church records a prey to armed violence; a sad vacuum, which will be sensible in our English history.'

The scarcity of books concerning the catholics in this country is owing to two circumstances; the destruction of catholic books, and documents by the pursuivants in the reign of Charles I, and the destruction of them by the catholics themselves, from the dread of the heavy penalties in which their mere possession involved their owners.

When it was proposed to the Great Gustavus of Sweden to destroy the palace of the Dukes of Bavaria, that hero nobly refused, observing, 'Let us not copy the example of our unlettered ancestors, who by waging war against every production of genius, have rendered the name of Goth universally proverbial of the rudest state of barbarity.'

Even the civilization of the eighteenth century could not preserve from the savage and destructive fury of a disorderly mob, the most polished city of Europe, the valuable ness of the great Earl Mansfield, which were madly consigned to the flames during the riots of 1780.

In the year 1599, the hall of the stationers underwent as great a purgation as was carried on in Don Quixote's library. Warton gives a list of the best writers who were ordered for immediate conflagration by the prelates Whitgift and Bancroft, urged by the puritanic and calvinistic factions. Like thieves and outlaws, they were ordered to be taken whenever they may be found.—It was also decreed that no satires or epigrams should be printed for the future. No plays were to be printed without the inspection and permission of the archbishop of Canterbury and the bishop of London; nor any English histories, I suppose novels and romances, without the sanction of the privy council. Any pieces of this nature, unlicensed, or now at large and wandering abroad, were to be diligently sought, recalled, and delivered over to the ecclesiastical arm at London-house.

At a later period, and by an opposite party, among other extravagant motions made in the parliament, one was to destroy all the records in the tower, and to settle the nation on a new foundation. The very same principle was attempted to be acted on in the French revolution by the true sans-culottes. With us Sir Matthew Hale showed the weakness of the proposal, and while he drew on his side 'all sober persons, stopped even the mouths of the frantic people themselves.'

To descend to the losses incurred by individuals, whose names ought to have served as an amulet to charm away the demons of literary destruction. One of the most interesting is the fate of Aristotle's library; he who by a Greek term was first saluted as a collector of books; his works have come down to us accidentally, but not without irreparable injuries, and with no slight suspicion respecting their authenticity. The story is told by Strabo in his thirteenth book. The books of Aristotle came from his scholar Theophrastus to Nelsus, whose posterity, an illiterate race, kept them locked up without using them, buried in the earth! One Apellion, a curious collector, purchased them, but finding the mass injured by age and moisture, conjecturally supplied their deficiencies. It is impossible to know how far Apellion has corrupted and obscured the text. But the mischief did not end here; when Sylla at the taking of Athens brought them to Rome, he consigned them to the care of one Tyrannio, a grammarian, who employed scribes to copy them; he suffered them to pass through his hands without corrections, and took great freedoms with them; the words of Strabo are strong. 'Ibique, Tyrannionem grammaticum iis vsum atque (ut fama est) interdiscisse, aut invertisse.' He gives it indeed as a report; but the fact seems confirmed by the state in which we find these works; Averroes declared that he read Aristotle forty times over before he succeeded in perfectly understanding him; he pretends he did at the one and fortieth time! And to prove this has published five folios of commentary.

We have lost much valuable literature by the illiterate or malignant descendants of learned and ingenious persons. Many of Lady Mary Wortley Montagu's letters have been destroyed, I am informed, by her mother, who did not approve that she should disgrace her family by adding to it literary honours; and a few of her best letters, recently published, were found buried in an old family chest. It would have mortified her ladyship's mother, to have heard that her daughter was the Sevigné of Britain.

At the death of the learned Peiresc, a chamber in his house filled with letters from the most eminent scholars of the age was discovered: the learned in Europe had addressed Peiresc in their difficulties, who was hence called 'The Avocat general' of the republic of letters. Such was the disposition of his niece, that although repeatedly entreated to permit them to be published, she preferred to regale herself occasionally with burning these learned epistles to save the expense of fire-wood!

The mass of Leonardo da Vinci have equally suffered from his relatives. When a curious collector discovered some, he generously brought them to a descendant of the great painter, who coldly observed, that 'he had a great deal more in the garret, which had lain there for many years, if the rats had not destroyed them.' Nothing which this great artist wrote but showed an inventive genius.

Ménage observes on a friend having had his library destroyed by fire, in which several valuable mass had perished, that such a loss is one of the greatest misfortunes that can happen to a man of letters. This gentleman afterwards consoled himself with composing a little treatise Bibliotheca incendie. I must have been sufficiently curious. Even in the present day, men of letters are subject to similar misfortunes; for though the fire-offices of insure books, they will not allow authors to value their own manuscripts!

A fire in the Cottonian library shrivelled and destroyed many Anglo-Saxon mass, a loss now irreparable. The antiquary is doomed to spell hard and hardly at the balance fragments that crumble in his hand.

Méninsky's famous Persian dictionary met with a similar fate. Its excessive rarity is owing to the siege of Vienna by the Turks; a bomb fell on the solitary author's house, and consumed the principal part of his indefatigable labours. There are few sets of this high-priced work which do not bear evident proofs of the bomb; while many parts are stained with the water sent to quench the flames.

The sufferings of an author for the loss of his manuscripts is nowhere more strongly described than in the case of Anthony Urceus, one of the most unfortunate scholars of the fifteenth century. The loss of his papers seemed immediately to have been followed by madness. At Forlì he had an apartment in the palace, and had prepared an important work for publication. His room was dark, and he generally wrote by lamp-light. Having gone out, he left the lamp burning; the papers soon kindled, and his library was reduced to ashes. As soon as he heard the news, he ran furiously to the palace, and knocking his head violently against the door, uttered this blasphemous language; 'Jesus Christ, what great crime have I done! what of those who believed in you have I ever treated so cruelly? Hear what I am saying, for I am in earnest, and am resolved: if by chance I should be so weak as to address myself to you at the point of death, don't hear me, for I will not be with you, but prefer hell and its eternity of torments.' To which, by the by, he gave little credit. Those who heard these ravings tried to console him, but they could not. He quitted the town, and lived frantically, wandering about the woods!

Ben Jonson's Exercitation on Vulcan was composed on like occasion; the fruits of twenty years' study were consumed in one short hour; our literature suffered, for among some works of imagination there were many philosophical collections, a commentary on the poetics, a complete critical grammar, a life of Henry V, his journey into Scotland with all his adventures in that poetical pilgrimage, and a poem on the ladies of Great Britain. What a catalogue of losses!

Castelvetro, the Italian commentator on Aristotle, having heard that his house was on fire, ran through the streets exclaiming to the people, alla Poetica! alla Poetica! To the Poetic! To the Poetic! He was then writing his commentary on the Poetic of Aristotle.

Several men of letters have been known to have risen from their death-bed, to destroy their mass. So solicitous have they been not to venture their posthumous reputations in the hands of undiscerning friends. Marmontel relates a pleasing anecdote of Colardeau, the elegant versifier of Pope's epistle of Eloisa to Abeldard.

This writer had not yet destroyed what he had written of a translation of Tasso. At the approach of death, he recollected this unfinished labour; he knew that his friends would not have courage to annihilate one of his works; that was reserved for him. Dying, he raised himself, and, if animated by an honourable action, he dragged himself along, and, with trembling hands, seized his papers, and consumed them in one sacrifice. I recollect another instance of a man of letters, of our own country, who acted the same part. He had passed his life in constant study, and it was observed that he had written several folio volumes, which his modest fears would not permit him to expose to the eye even of his critical friends. He promised to leave his labours to posterity; and he seemed sometimes, with glow on his countenance, to exult that they would not be unworthy of their acceptance. At his death his sensibility took the alarm; he had the folios brought to his bed; and one could open them, for they were closely locked. At the sight of his favourite and mysterious labours, he panicked; he seemed disturbed in his mind, while he felt at that moment his strength decaying; suddenly he raised his feeble hands by an effort of firm resolve, burnt his papers, and smiled as the greedy Vulcan licked up every page. The task exhausted his remaining strength, and he soon afterwards expired. The late Mrs Inchbald had written her life in several volumes; on her death-bed, from a susto perhaps of too much delicacy to admit of any argument, the requested a friend to cut them into pieces before his eyes—not having sufficient strength herself to perform the funeral office. These are instances of what may be called the heroism of authors.

The republic of letters has suffered irreparable losses by typhrecks. Guarino Veronesi, one of those learned men who travelled through Greece for the recovery of his, had his perseverance repaid by the acquisition of any valuable works. On his return to Italy he was typhrecked, and unfortunately for himself and the world, his Mr Roscoe, he lost his treasures! So pungent was his grief on this occasion that, according to the relation of one of his countrymen, his hair became suddenly white.

About the year 1700, Hudde, an opulent burghmaster of Middleburgh, animated solely by literary curiosity, devoted himself and his fortune. He went to China to instruct himself in the language, and in whatever was remarkable in this singular people. He acquired the skill of mandarin in that difficult language; nor did the form of his Dutch face deceive the physiognomists of China. He succeeded to the dignity of a mandarin; he travelled through the provinces under this character, and returned to Europe with a collection of observations, the cherished hour of thirty years; and all these were sunk in the bottomless sea!

The great Pinellian library after the death of its illustrious possessor, filled three vessels to be conveyed to Naples. Pursued by corsairs, one of the vessels was taken; but the pirates finding nothing on board but books, they threw them all into the sea; such was the fate of a great portion of this famous library. National libraries are often perished at sea, from the circumstance of commanders transporting them into their own kingdoms.

SOME NOTICES OF LOST WORKS.

Although it is the opinion of some critics that our literary losses do not amount to the extent which others imagine, they are however much greater than they allow. Our greatest losses are felt in the historical province, and particularly in the earliest records, which might not have been the least interesting to philosophical curiosity.

The history of Phœnicia by Sanchoniathian, supposed to be a contemporary with Solomon is only known to us by a few valuable fragments preserved by Eusebius. The same ill fortune attends Manetho's history of Egypt, and Berossus's history of Chaldaea. The researches of the philosopher are therefore limited: and it cannot be doubted that the histories of these most ancient nations, however veiled in fables, or clouded by remoteness, would have presented to the philosopher singular objects of contemplation.

Of the history of Polybius, which once contained forty books, we have now only five; of the historical library of Asinius Siculo, fifteen books only remain out of forty; and half the Roman antiquities of Dionysius Halicarnassensis has perished. Of the eighty books of the history of Dion Cassius, twenty-five only remain. The present opening books of Ammianus Marcellinus is entitled the peritome. Livy's history consisted of one hundred and forty books, and we only possess thirty-five of that pleasing historian. What a treasure has been lost in the thirty books of Tacitus; little more than four remain. Murphree justly observes, that 'the reign of Titus, the delight of human kind; is totally lost, and Domitian has escaped the vengeance of the historian's pen.' Yet Tacitus in fragments is still the colossal torso of history. It is curious to observe that Velleius Paterculus, of whom a fragment only has reached us, we owe to a single copy: no other having ever been discovered, and which occasions the text of this historian to remain incurably corrupt. Taste and criticism have certainly incurred an irreparable loss in that Treatise on the causes of the Corruption of Eloquence, by Quintilian; which he has himself noticed with so much satisfaction in his Institutes. Pottarch declares, that in his youth he has seen the works of Varro, and the second Decade of Livy; but all his endeavours to recover them were fruitless.

These are only some of the most known losses which have occurred in the republic of letters; but in reading contemporary writers we are perpetually discovering new and important ones. We have lost two precious works in ancient biography; Varro wrote the lives of seven hundred illustrious Romans, and Atticus, the friend of Cicero, composed another on the actions of the great men among the Romans; these works were enriched with portraits. When we consider that these writers lived familiarly with the finest geniuses of their times, and were opulent, hospitable, and lovers of the fine arts, their biography and their portraits are felt as an irreparable loss to literature. I suspect likewise we have had great losses of which we are not always aware; for in that curious letter in which the younger Pliny describes in so interesting a manner the sublime industry, for it seems sublime by its greatness, of his uncle (Book III, Letter V, of Melmouthe's translation) it appears that his Natural History, that vast register of the wisdom and folly of the ancients, was not his most extraordinary labour. Among his other works we find a history in twenty books, which has entirely perished. We discover also the works of writers, which by the accounts of them, appear to have equalled in genius those which have descended to us. I refer the curious reader to such a poet whom Pliny, in Book I, Letter XVI, has feelingly described. He tells us that 'his works are never out of my hands; and whether I sit down to write any thing myself, or to revise what I have already wrote, or am in a disposition to amuse myself, I constantly take up this agreeable author; and as often as I do so, he is still new.' He had before compared this poet to Catullus; and in a critic of so fine a taste as Pliny, to have cherished so constant an intercourse with the writings of this author, indicates high powers. Instances of this kind frequently occur.

The losses which the poetical world has sustained are sufficiently known by those who are conversant with the few invaluable fragments of Menander, who would have interested us much more than Homer: for he was evidently the domestic poet, and the lyre he touched was formed of the strings of the human heart. He was the painter of manners, and the historian of the passions. The opinion of Quintilian is confirmed by the golden fragments preserved for the English reader in the elegant versions of Cumberland. Even of Æschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides, who each wrote about one hundred dramas, seven only have been preserved, and nineteen of Euripides. Of the one hundred and thirty comedies of Plautus, we only inherit twenty imperfect ones.

I believe that a philosopher would consent to lose any poet to regain an historian; nor is this unjust, for some future poet may rise to supply the vacant place of a lost poet, but it is not so with the historian. Fancy may be supplied; but Truth once lost, in the annals of mankind, leaves a chasm never to be filled!

QUODLIBETS, OR SCHOLASTIC DISQUISITIONS.

Ménage observes that the scholastic questions were called Questiones Quodlibeticæ; and they were generally so ridiculous that we have retained the word Quodlibet in our vernacular language, to express any thing ridiculously subtle; something which comes at length to be distinguished into nothingness.

'With all the rash dexterity of wit'

The history of the scholastic philosophy might furnish a philosophical writer with an instructive theme; it would enter into the history of the human mind, and fill a niche in our literary annals; the works of the scholastics, with the debates of these Quodlibetarians, would at once show the greatness and the littleness of the human intellect, for though they often degenerated into incredible absurdities, those who have examined the works of Thomas Aquinas and Duns Scotus have confessed their admiration of that Herculean texture of brain which they exhausted in demolishing their serial fabrics.

The following is a slight sketch of the school divinity.

The Christian doctrines in the primitive ages of the gospel were adapted to the simple comprehension of the multitude; metaphysical subtleties were not even employed by the fathers, of whom several are eloquent. Even the Homilies explained by an obvious interpretation some scriptural point, or inferred by artless illustration some moral doctrine. When the Arabians became the only learned people, and their empire extended over the greatest part of the known world, they impressed their own genius on those nations with whom they were allied as friends, or revered as masters. The Arabian genius was fond of abstruse studies, it was highly metaphysical and mathematical, for the fine arts their religion did not admit them to cultivate; and it appears that the first knowledge which modern Europe obtained of Euclid and Aristotle was through the medium of Latin translations after Arabic versions. The Christians in the west received their first lessons from the Arabians in the east; and Aristotle, with his Arabic commentaries, was enthroned in the schools of Christendom.

Then burst into birth from the dark cave of metaphysics a numerous and ugly spawn of monstrous sects; unnatural children of the same foul mother, who never met but to destroy each other. Religion became what is called the study of divinity; and they all attempted to reduce the worship of God into a system; the creed into a thesis! and every point relating to religion was debated through an endless chain of infinite questions, incomprehensible distinctions, with differences mediate and immediate, the concrete and the abstract, a perpetual civil war was carried on against common sense in all the Aristotelian severity. There existed a rage for Aristotle; and Melancthon complains that in sacred assemblies the ethics of Aristotle were read to the people instead of the gospel. Aristotle was placed ahead of St Paul; and St Thomas Aquinas in his works distinguishes him by the title of 'The Philosopher'; inferring doubtless that no other man could possibly be a philosopher who disagreed with Aristotle. Of the blind rites paid to Aristotle, the anecdotes of the Nominalists and Realists are noticed in the article 'Literary Controversy' in this work.

Had their subtle questions and perpetual wranglings only been addressed to the metaphysician in his closet, and had nothing but strokes of the pen occurred, the scholastic divinity would only have formed an episode in the calm narrative of literary history but it has claims to be registered in political annals, from the numerous persecutions and tragical events with which they too long puzzled their followers, and disturbed the repose of Europe. The Thomists, and the Scotists, the Occamites, and many others, soared into the regions of mysticism.

Peter Lombard had laboriously compiled after the celebrated Abelard's 'Introduction to Divinity,' his four books of 'Sentences,' from the writings of the Fathers; and for this he is called 'The Master of Sentences.' These sentences, on which we have so many commentaries are a collection of passages from the Fathers, the real or apparent contradictions of whom he endeavours to reconcile. But his successors were not satisfied to be mere commentators on these 'Sentences,' which they now only made use of as a row of pegs to hang on their fine-spun metaphysical cobwebs. They at length collected all these quodlibetical questions into enormous volumes, under the terrifying form, for those who have seen them, of Summaries of Divinity. They contrived by their chimerical speculations against their modern adversary Grimaldi, to question the plainest truths, to wrest the simple meaning of the Holy Scriptures, and give some appearance of truth to the most ridiculous and monstrous opinions.

One of the subtle questions which agitated the world in the tenth century, relating to dialectics, was concerning universals, (as for example, man, horse, dog, &c.) signifying not this or that in particular, but all in general. They distinguished universals, or what we call abstract terms, by the genera and species rerum; and they never could decide whether these were substances—or names! That is whether the abstract idea we form of a horse was not really a being as much as the horse we ride! All this and some congenial points respecting the origin of our ideas, and what ideas were, and whether we really had an idea of a thing before we discovered the thing itself—in a word, what they call universals, and the essence of universals; of all this nonsense on which they at length proceeded to accusations of heresy, and for which many learned men were excommunicated, stoned, and what not, the whole was derived from the reveries of Plato, Aristotle, and Zeno, about the nature of ideas; than which subject to the present day no discussion ever degenerated into such insanity. A modern metaphysician infers that we have no ideas at all!

Of these scholastic divines, the most illustrious was Saint Thomas Aquinas, styled the Angelical Doctor. Seventeen folio volumes not only testify his industry, but even his genius. He was a great man, busied all his life with making the charades of metaphysics.

My learned friend Sharon Turner, has favoured me with a notice of his greatest work—his 'Sum of all Theology,' Summa totius Theologie, Paris, 1615. It is a metaphysical treatise, or the most abstruse metaphysics of theology. It occupies above 1250 folio pages, of very small size print in double columns. It may be worth noticing that to this work are appended 19 folio pages of double columns of errata, and about 200 of additional index!

The whole is thrown into an Aristotelian form; the difficulties or questions are proposed first, and the answers are then appended. There are 166 articles on Love 368 on Angels—200 on the Soul—85 on Demons—151 the Intellect—134 on Law—3 on the Catamenia—237 Sins—17 on Virginity, and others on a variety of topics.

The scholastic tree is covered with prodigal foliage, it is barren of fruit; and when the scholastics employ themselves in solving the deepest mysteries, their philosophy became nothing more than an instrument in the hands of the Roman Pontiff. Aquinas has composed 368 articles on angels, of which a few of the heads have been called the reader.

He treats of angels, their substance, orders, office, natures, habits, &c.—as if he himself had been an old experienced angel!

Angels were not before the world!

Angels might have been before the world!

Angels were created by God—They were created immediately by him—They were created in the Empyrean sky—They were created in grace—They were created imperfect beatitude. After a severe chain of reasoning, shows that angels are incorporeal compared to us, but corporeal compared to God.

An angel is composed of action and potentiality; the more superior he is, he has the less potentiality. They have not matter properly. Every angel differs from all other angel in species. An angel is of the same species as a soul. Angels have not naturally a body united to them. They may assume bodies; but they do not want to assume bodies for themselves, but for us.

The bodies assumed by angels are of thick air.

The bodies they assume have not the natural virtue which they show, nor the operations of life but the which are common to inanimate things.

An angel may be the same with a body.

In the same body there are, the soul formerly given being, and operating natural operations; and the angel operating supernatural operations.

Angels administer and govern every corporeal creature. God, and angel, and the soul, are not contained in space but contain it.

Many angels cannot be in the same space.

The motion of an angel in space is nothing else than different contacts of different successive places.

The motion of an angel is a succession of his different operations.

His motion may be continuous and discontinuous as will.

The continuous motion of an angel is necessary through every medium, but may be discontinuous without a medium.

The velocity of the motion of an angel is not according to the quantity of his strength, but according to his will.

The motion of the illumination of an angel is threefold or circular, straight and oblique.

In this account of the motion of an angel we are reminded of the beautiful description of Milton, who marks it continuous motion,

'Smooth-sliding without step.'

The reader desirous of being merry with Aquinas's answers may find them in Maritus Scribnerus, in Ch. VII., inquires if angels pass from one extreme to another without going through the middle? And if angels know this more clearly in a morning? How many angels can dance on the point of a very fine needle, without jostling one another?

All the questions are answered with a subtlety and nicety of distinction more difficult to comprehend and remember than many problems in Euclid; and perhaps a few of the best might still be selected for youth as curious exercises of the understanding. However, a great part of these peculiar productions are loaded with the most trifling, irrelevant, and even scandalous discussions. Even Aquinas could gravely debate, Whether Christ was not an Herod prole? Whether there are excrements in Paradise? Whether the pious at the resurrection will rise with the bowels? Others again debated—Whether the angel Gabriel appeared to the Virgin Mary in the shape of a serpent, of a dove, of a man, or of a woman? Did he seem to be young or old? In what dress was he? Was his garment of two colours? Was his linen clean or foul? His appear in the morning, noon, or evening? What the colour of the Virgin Mary's hair? Was she acquainted with the mechanic and liberal arts? Had she a rough knowledge of the Book of Sentences, and all its parts? that is, Peter Lombard's compilation from the sayings of the Fathers, written 1200 years after her death. These are only trifling matters; they also agitated, whether when during her conception the Virgin was sed, Christ too was seated, and whether when she lay in bed, Christ also lay down? The following question was a favorite topic for discussion, and thousands of the acutest minds, through more than one century, never resolved it. "When a hog is carried to market with a rope tied to its neck, which is held at the other end by a man, whether is the hog carried to market by the rope or the man?"

In the tenth century (says Jortin in his Remarks on ecclesiastical History, Vol. V, p. 17,) after long and interminable controversy about the real presence of Christ in the sacrament, they at length universally agreed to strike space! Yet it must not be imagined that this mutual toleration and forbearance should be ascribed to the prudence and virtue of those times. It was mere ignorance or incapacity of reasoning which kept the peace, and deterred them from entering into debates to which they were equal!

Lord Lytton in his Life of Henry II, laments the happy effects of the scholastic philosophy on the progress of the human mind. The minds of men were turned to classical studies to the subtleties of school divinity, which Rome encouraged as more profitable for the maintenance of her doctrines. It was a great misfortune to fiction and to learning, that men of such acute understanding as Abelard and Lombard, who might have done much to reform the errors of the church, and to restore science in Europe, should have been deprived both, by applying their admirable parts to weave those cobwebs of sophistry, and to confound the clear simplicity of evangelical faith by a false philosophy and a captious logic.

FAME CONTENDED.

All men are fond of glory, and even those philosophers who write against that noble passion prefix their names to their own works. It is worthy of observation that the authors of two religious books, universally received, have concealed their names from the world. The 'Imitation of Christ' is attributed, without any authority, to Thomas à Kempis; and the author of the 'Whole Duty of Man' still remains undiscovered. Millions of their books have been dispersed in the christian world.

To have revealed their names, would have given them much worldly fame as any moralist has obtained—but they contented it! Their religion was the purest, and stood above all worldly passions! Some profane writers indeed have also concealed their names to great works, but their motives were of a very different cast.

THE SIX FOLLIES OF SCIENCE.

Nothing is so capable of disordering the intellects as an intense application to any one of these six things: the Quadrature of the circle; the Multiplication of the Cube; the Perpetual Motion; the Philosophical Stone; Magic; and Judicial Astrology. In youth we may exercise our attention on these curious topics, merely to convince us of their impossibility; but it shows a great defect in judgment to be occupied on them in an advanced age. 'It is proper, however,' Fontenelle remarks, 'to apply one's self to these inquiries: because we find, as we proceed, many valuable discoveries of which we were before ignorant.' The same thought Cowley has applied, in an address to his mistress, thus—

'Although I think thou never wilt be found,
Yet I'm resolved to search for thee;
The search itself rewards the pains,
So though the chymist his great secret miss,
(For neither it is art or nature he)
Yet things well worth his toil he gains;
And does his charge and labour pay
With good unsought experiments by the way.'

The same thought is in Donne. Perhaps Cowley did not suspect, that he was an imitator. Fontenelle could not have read either; he struck out the thought by his own reflection; it is very just. Glauber searched long and deeply for the philosopher's stone, which though he did not find, yet in his researches he discovered a very useful purging salt, which bears his name.

Maupertuis, in a little volume of letters written by him, observes on the Philosophical Stone, that we cannot prove the impossibility of obtaining it, but we can easily see the folly of those who employ their time and money in seeking for it. This price is too great to counterbalance the little probability of succeeding in it. However it is still a bantling of modern chemistry, who has nodded very affectionately on it!—Of the Perpetual Motion, he shows the impossibility, at least in the sense in which it is generally received. On the Quadrature of the Circle, he says he cannot decide if this problem is resolvable or not; but he observes, that it is very useless to search for it any more, since we have arrived by approximation to such a point of accuracy, that on a large circle, such as the orbit which the earth describes round the sun, the geometer will not mistake by the thickness of a hair. The quadrature of the circle is still, however, a favourite game of some visionaries, and several are still imagining that they have discovered the perpetual motion; the Italians nick-name them matto perpetuo; and Bekker tells us of the fate of one Hartmann of Leipsic, who was in such despair at having passed his life so vainly, in studying the perpetual motion, that at length he became himself one in the long letter of Erasmus, by means of the fatal triangle; that is, he hanged himself; for the long letter of Erasmus is the Greek pit, which is imagined to bear some resemblance to the suspension of an unlucky mortal.

IMITATORS.

Some writers, usually pedants, imagine they can supply by the labours of industry the deficiencies of nature. It is recorded of Paulus Manutius, that he frequently spent a month in writing a single letter. He affected to imitate Cicero. But although he has painfully attained to something of the elegance of his style, he is still destitute of the native graces of unaffected composition. He was one of those whom Erasmus bantered in his Ciceronians, so slavishly devoted to Cicero's style, that they ridiculously employed the utmost precautions when they were seized by a Ciceronian fit. The Nooponus of Erasmus tells us of his devotion to Cicero; of his three indexes to all his words, and his never writing but in the dead of night; employing months upon a few lines, and his religious veneration for words, with his total indifference about the sense.

Le Brun, a Jesuit, was a single instance of such unhappy imitation. He was also a Latin poet, and his themes were religious. He formed the extravagant project of substituting a religious Virgil and Ovid merely by adapting his works to their titles. His Christian Virgil consists, like the Pagan Virgil of Ecloughs, Georgics, and of an Epic of twelve books, with this difference, that devotional subjects are substituted for fabulous ones. His epic is the Ignacius, or the pilgrimage of Saint Ignatius. His Christian Ovid is in the same taste; every thing wears a new face. The Epistles are pious ones; the Fasts are the six days of the Creation; the Elegies are the Lamentations of Jeremiah; a poem on the love of God is substituted for the Art of love; and the history of some Conversions supplies the place of the Metamorphoses? This is much in the style of those who have projected the substitution of a family Shakespeare.

A poet of far different character, the elegant Sannazarius, has done much the same thing in his poem De partu Virginis. The same servile imitation of ancient taste appears. It professes to celebrate the birth of Christ, yet his name is not once mentioned in it. The Virgin herself is styled spes doctum! The hope of the Gods! The Incarnation is predicted by Proteus—Virgin, instead of consulting the sacred writings, reads the Sybilline oracles! Her attendants are Dryads, Nereids, &c. This monstrous mixture of polytheism, with the mysteries of Christianity appeared in every thing he had about him. In a chapel at one of his country seats he had two statues placed at his tomb, Apollo and Minerva; catholic piety found no difficulty in the present case, as well as in innumerable others of the same kind, to inscribe the statue of Apollo with the name of David, and that of Minerva with the female one of Judith.

Seneca, in his 114th Epistle, gives a curious literary anecdote of that sort of imitation by which an inferior mind becomes the monkey of an original writer. At Rome, when Sallust was the fashionable writer, short sentences, uncommon words, and an obscure brevity, were affected as so many elegancies. Arruntius, who wrote the history of the Punic Wars, painfully laboured to imitate Sallust. Expressions which are rare in Sallust are frequent in Arruntius, and, of course, without the motive that induced Sallust to adopt them. What rose naturally under the pen of the great historian, the minor one must have run after with a ridiculous anxiety. Seneca adds several instances of the servile affectation of Arruntius, which seems much like those we once had of Johnson, by the undiscerning herd of his monkeys.

One cannot but smile at these imitators; we have abounded with them. In the days of Churchill, every month produced an effusion which tolerably imitated his rough and slovenly versification, his coarse invective, and his careless mediocrity—but the genius remained with the English Juvenal. Sterne had his countless multitude, and in Fielding's time, Tom Jones produced more bastards in wit than the author could ever suspect. To such literary echoes, the reply of Philip of Macedon to one who prided himself on imitating the notes of the nightingale, may be applied; 'I prefer the nightingale herself!' Even the most successful of this imitating tribe must be doomed to share the fate of Silius Italicus in his cold imitation of Virgil, and Cawthorne in his empty harmony of Pope.

To all these imitators I must apply an Arabian anecdote. Ebn Saad, one of Mahomet's amanuenses, when writing what the prophet dictated, cried out by way of admiration—Blessed be God the best creator! Mahomet approved of the expression, and desired him to write those words down also as part of the inspired passage. The consequence was that Ebn Saad began to think himself as great a prophet as the master, and took upon himself to imitate the Koran according to his fancy; but the imitator got himself into trouble, and only escaped with life by falling on his knees, and solemnly swearing he would never again imitate the Koran, for which he was sensible God had never created him.

CICERO'S PUNS.

'I should,' says Menage, have received great pleasure to have conversed with Cicero, had I lived in his time. He must have been a man very agreeable in conversation, since even Cæsar carefully collected his bon mots. Cicero has boasted of the great actions he has done for his country, because there is no vanity in exulting in the performance of our duties; but he has not boasted that he was the most eloquent orator of his age, though he certainly was; because nothing is more disgusting than to exult in our intellectual powers.'

Whatever were the bon mots of Cicero, of which few have come down to us, it is certain that Cicero was an inveterate punster; and he seems to have been more ready with them than with repartees. He said to a senator, who was the son of a tailor, 'Rem acu tetigisti.' You have touched the thing with sharpness. To the son of a cook, 'Ego quoque tibi jure favebo.' The ancients pronounced coo and quoque like co-ke, which alludes to the Latin coo, cook, besides the ambiguity of jure, which applies to broth or law—jus. A Sicilian suspected of being a Jew, attempted to get the cause of Verres into his own hands; Cicero, who knew that he was a creature of the great culprit, opposed him, observing, 'What has a Jew to do with swine's flesh?' The Romans called a boar pig verres. I regret to afford a respectable authority for forensic puns; but to have degraded his adversaries by such petty personalities, only proves that Cicero's taste was not exquisite.

There is something very original in Montague's censure of this great man. Cotton, the Frenchman's translator, has not ill expressed the peculiarities of his author, though he has blundered on a material expression.

'Boldly to confess the truth, his way of writing and that of all other long-winded authors, appears to me very tedious; for his preface, definitions, divisions, and etymologies, take up the greatest part of his work, whatever there is of life and marrow, is smothered and lost in the preparation. When I have spent an hour in reading him, which is a great deal for me, and recollect what I have thence extracted of juice and substance, for the most part I find nothing but wind; for he is not yet come to the arguments that serve to loose the knot I would untie. For me, who only desired to become more wise, not more learned or eloquent, these logical or Aristotelian disquisitions of poets are of no use. I look for good and solid reasons at the first dash. I am for discourses that give the first charge into the heart of the doubts; his languish about the subject, and delay our expectations. Those are proper for the schools, for the bar, and for the pulpit, where we have leisure to nod, and may awake a quarter of an hour after time enough to find again the thread of the discourse. It is necessary to speak after this manner to judges, whom man has a design, right or wrong, to incline to favour his cause; to children and common people, to whom a man must say all he can. I would not have an author make his business to render me attentive; or that he should say fifty times O yes! as the clerks and heralds do.

'As to Cicero, I am of the common opinion that, leasting excepted, he had no great natural parts. He was a good citizen, of an affable nature, as all fat heavy men—(gras de gansseurs are the words in the original, meaning perhaps broad jokers, for Cicero was not fat)—such as he was, usually are; but given to ease, and had a mighty share of vanity and ambition. Neither do I know how to excuse him for thinking his poetry fit to be published. 'Tis no great imperfection to write ill verses: but it is an imperfection not to be able to judge how unworthy his verses were of the glory of his name. For what concerns his eloquence, that is totally out of comparison, and I believe will never be equalled.

PREFACES.

A preface being the entrance to a book, should enter by its beauty. An elegant porch announces the splendour of the interior. I have observed, that ordinary readers skip over these little elaborate compositions. The ladies consider them as so many pages lost, which might better be employed in the addition of a picturesque scene, or a tender letter to their novels. For my part, I always gain amusement from a preface, be it awkwardly, or skilfully written; for dullness, or impertinence, may raise a laugh for a page or two. A preface is frequently a superior composition to the work itself; for long before the days of Johnson, it had been a custom with many authors to solicit for this department of their work the ornamental contribution of a man of genius. Cicero tells his friend Atticus that he had a volume of prefaces or introductions always ready by him to be used as circumstances required. These must have been like our periodical essays. A good preface is as essential to put the reader into good humour, as a good prologue is to a play, or a fine symphony to an opera, containing something analogous to the work itself so that we may feel its want as a desire not elsewhere to be gratified. The Italians call the preface Le sales del libro, the sauce of the book, and if well seasoned it creates an appetite in the reader to devour the book itself. A preface badly composed prejudices the reader against the work. Authors are not equally fortunate in these little introductions; some can compose volumes more skilful than prefaces, and others can finish a preface who could never be capable of finishing a book.

On a very elegant preface prefixed to an ill-written book it was observed that they ought never to have come together; or a sarcastic wit remarked that he considered such marriages were allowable, for they were not of kin.

In prefaces an affected haughtiness or an affected humility are like despicable. There is a deficient dignity in Robertson's; but the haughtiness is now to our purpose. This is called by the French 'La Morgue littéraire,' the surly pomposity of literature. It is sometimes used by writers who have succeeded in their first work, while the failure of their subsequent productions appears to have given them a literary hypochondriasm. Dr Armstrong after his classical poem, never shook hands cordially with the public for not relishing his barren labours. In the preface to his lively 'Sketches' he tells us, 'he could give them much bolder strokes as well as more delicate touches but that he dreads the danger of writing too well, and feel the value of his own labour too sensible to bestow it upon the mobility. This is pure milk compared to the gall of the preface to his poems. There he tells us, 'that at last he has taken the trouble to collect them! What he has destroyed would, probably enough, have been better received by the great majority of readers. But he has always so heartily despised their opinion.' These prefaces remind one of the prologi galeati, prefaces with a helmet! as Le J-rome entitles the one to his Version of the Scriptures. These armed prefaces were formerly very common in the age of literary controversy; for half the business of an author consisted then, either in replying or anticipating reply to the attacks of his opponent.

Prefaces ought to be dated, as these become after a few of editions leading and useful circumstances in literary history.

Pufler with quaint humour observes on Indexes—'An Index is a necessary implement and no impediment of a book, except in the same sense, wherein the carriages of a army are termed Impedimenta. Without this, a large Index is but a labyrinth without a clue to direct the reader forward. I confess there is a lazy kind of learning which only Index; when scholars (like adders which only bite the horse's heels) nibble but at the tables, which are calces or crutches, neglecting the body of the book. But though the Index deserves no crutches (let not a staff be used by them, but a them,) pity it is the weary should be denied the benefit thereof, and industrious scholars prohibited the accommodation of an Index, most used by those who most pretend to pursue it.

THE ANCIENTS AND MODERNS.

Frequent and violent disputes have arisen on the subject of the preference to be given to the ancients, or the moderns. The controversy of Perrault and Boileau make a considerable figure in French literature; the last of whom said that the ancients had been moderns, but that it was by a means clear the moderns would become ancients. The dispute extended to England; Sir William Temple raised upon his gentle indolence against the bold attacks of the high Wotton. The literary world was pestered and tired with this dispute, which at length got into the hands of intolerance and ignorance. Swift's 'Battle of the Books,' by his irresistible vein of keen satire, seems to have laid the perturbed spirit. Yet, surely, it had been better if these acrid and absurd controversies had never disgraced the republic of letters. The advice of Sidonius Apollinaris is excellent; he says, that we should read the ancients with respect, and the moderns without envy.

SOME INGENIOUS THOUGHTS.

Apuleius calls these neck-kerchiefs so glassy fine, (may I express myself?) which in veiling, discover the beautiful bosom of a woman, centum textiles; which may be translated seven air. It is an expression beautifully fanciful. A Greek poet wrote this inscription for a statue of Love—

The Gods, from living turned me to stone:
Praxiteles, from stone, restored me to life.

P. Commire, a pleasing writer of Latin verse, says of the life of a butterfly, Florem, putares nare per liquidum æthera.

I FLIES, and swims a flower in liquid air!

Voiture, in addressing Cardinal Richelieu, says,—How much more affecting is it to hear one's praises from the mouth of the people, than from that of the poets.

Cervantes, with an elevation of sentiment, observes that one of the greatest advantages which princes possess above other men, is that of being attended by servants as great as themselves.

—Lusque salesque,
Sed lectos pelago, quo Venus orta, sales.

This is written by a modern Latin poet; but is in Plutarch, in the comparison of Aristophanes and Menander; in the comedies of Menander there is a natural and divine touch, as if it proceeded from that sea where Venus took her bath. This beautiful thought, observes Monnoye, has been employed by seven or eight modern writers.

Seneca, amongst many strained sentiments, and trivial poems, has frequently a happy thought. As this on anger: 'I wish that the ferocity of this passion could be spent at its first appearance, so that it might injure but once: as in the case of the bee, whose sting is destroyed for ever at the first puncture it occasions.

Aristæmus says of a beauty, that she seemed most beautiful when dressed; yet not less beautiful when undressed. Of two beauties he says, 'they yielded to the Graces only in number.'

Monnoye has these two terse and pointed lines on the portrait of a lady—

'Ce portrait ressemble à la belle,
Il est insensible comme elle!'

In this portrait, my fair, thy resemblance I see;
An insensible charmer it is—just like thee!

A French poet has admirably expressed the instantaneous sympathy of two lovers. A princess is relating to her confidante the birth of her passion:

'Et comme un jeune cœur est bientôt enflammé,
Il me vit, il m'aima, je le vis, l'aimai.'

Soon is the youthful heart by passion moved:
He saw, and loved me—him I saw, and loved.

Calderon is more extravagant still; he says on a similar occasion—

'I saw and I loved her so nearly together, that I do not know if I saw her ere I loved her, or loved her before I saw her.'

An old French poet, Pichou, in his imitation of Bonarelli's Filli del Sciro, has this ingenious thought. A nymph is discovered by her lover, fainting under an unbragous oak—the conflict of beauty and horror is described by a pretty conceit—

'Si l'amour se mouroit, on diroit, le voici!
Et si la mort aimoit, on la peindroit ainsi.

If Love were dying, we should think him here:
If Death could love, he would be pictured thus!

The same lover consents at length that his mistress shall love his rival, and not inelegantly expresses his feelings in the perplexed situation.

'Je veux bien que ton ame un double amour s'assemble
Tu peux aimer sans crime Amante et Née ensemble;
Et lors que le trepas finira mes douleurs
Avoir pour l'un des feux, et pour l'autre des pleurs.

Yes with a double love thy soul may burn;
Oh! 'tis no crime to love Amitee and Nise!
And when in my last hour my grief shall close,
Give one your fires, and give the other tears!

It was said of Petronius, that he was pura impurus, purely impure: pura, because of his style; impuratus, because of his obscenities.

Quam multa! quam paudes! is a fine expression, which was employed to characterise a concise style pregnant with meaning.

How tenderly does Tasso, in one verse, describe his Olindo? So much love and so much modesty!

'Brama assai, poco spera, nulla chiede.

An exquisite verse, which Hoole entirely passes over in his version, but which Fairfax's finer feelings preserves:

—'He, full of bashfulness and truth,
Loved much, hoped little, and desired naught.'

It was said of an exquisite portrait, that to judge by the eye it did not want speech; for this only could be detected by the ear.

Manca il parlar; di vivo altro non chiedi:
Ne manca questo ancor, s'agli occhi credi.

Perrault has very poetically informed us, that the ancients were ignorant of the circulation of the blood—

'—Ignorait jusqu'aux route certaines
Du meandre vivant qui coule dans les veines.

Unknown to them what devious course maintains
The live meander flowing in their veins.

An Italian poet makes a lover who has survived his mistress thus sweetly express himself—

'Piango la sua morte, e la mia vita.'

Much I deplore her death, and much my life.

It has been usual for poets to say, that rivers flow to convey their tributary streams to the sea. This figure, being a mark of subjection proved offensive to the patriotic Tasso, and he has ingeniously said of the river Po, because of its rapidity—

'Pare
Che porti guerra, e non tributo al mare.'
See rapid Po to Ocean's empire bring
A war, and not a tribute, from his spring!

EARLY PRINTING.

There is some probability that this art originated in China, where it was practised long before it was known in Europe. Some European traveller might have imported the hint. That the Romans did not practise the art of printing cannot but excite our astonishment, since they really possessed the art, and may be said to have enjoyed it, unconscious of their rich possession. I have seen Roman stereotypes, or printing immoveable types with which they stamped their pottery. How in daily practising the art though confined to this object, it did not occur to so ingenious a people to print their literary works, is not easily to be accounted for. Did the wise and grave senate dread those inconveniences which attended its indiscriminate use? Or perhaps they did not care to deprive so large a body as their scribes of their business. Not a hint of the art itself appears in their writings.

When first the art of printing was discovered, they only made use of one side of a leaf; they had not yet found out the expedient of impressing the other. Specimens of these early printed books are in his Majesty's and Lord Spencer's libraries. Afterwards they thought of pasting the blank sides, which made them appear like one leaf. Their blocks were made of soft woods, and their letters were carved; but frequently breaking, the expense and trouble of carving and gluing new letters suggested our moveable types, which have produced an almost miraculous celerity in this art. Our modern stereotype consists of entire pages of solid blocks of metal, and not being liable to break like the soft wood at first used, is profitably employed for works which require to be perpetually reprinted. Printing on carved blocks of wood must have greatly retarded the progress of universal knowledge; for one set of types could only have produced one work, whereas it now serves for hundreds.

When their editions were intended to be curious, they omitted to print the first letter of a chapter, for which they left a blank space, that it might be painted or illuminated, to the fancy of the purchaser. Several ancient volumes of these early times have been found where these letters are wanting, as they neglected to have them printed.

The initial carved letter, which is generally a fine woodcut, among our printed books, is evidently a remains or imitation of these ornaments. Among the very earliest books printed, which were religious, the Poor Man's Bible has wooden cuts in a coarse style, without the least shadowing or crossing of strokes, and these they inelegantly daubed over with colours, which they termed illuminating and sold at a cheap rate to those who could not afford to purchase costly missals, elegantly written and painted on vellum. Specimens of these rude efforts of illuminated prints may be seen in Strutt's Dictionary of Engravers. The Bodleian library possesses the originals.

In the productions of early printing may be distinguished the various splendid editions they made of Primers or Prayer-books. They were embellished with cuts finished in a most elegant taste; many of them were ludicrous, and several were obscene. In one of them an angel is represented crowning the Virgin Mary, and God the Father himself assisting at the ceremony. Sometimes St Michael in overcoming Satan; and sometimes St Anthony is attacked by various devils of the most clumsy forms—not of the grotesque and limber family of Callot!

Printing was gradually practised throughout Europe from the year 1440 to 1500. Caxton and his successor Wynkyn de Worde, were our own earliest printers. Caxton was a wealthy merchant, who in 1484, being sent by Edward IV, to negotiate a commercial treaty with the Duke of Burgundy, returned to his country with this invaluable art. Notwithstanding his mercantile habits he possessed a literary taste, and his first work was a translation from a French historical miscellany.

The tradition of the devil and Dr Faustus was derived from the odd circumstance in which the Bibles of the first printer, Fust, appeared to the world. When he had discovered this new art, and printed off a considerable number of copies of the bible, to imitate those which were commonly sold in ms, he undertook the sale of them at Paris. It was his interest to conceal this discovery, and to pass off his printed copies for ms. But as he was enabled to sell his bibles at sixty crowns, while the other scribes demanded five hundred, this raised universal astonishment; and still more when he produced copies as fast as they were wanted, and even lowered his price. The uniformity of the copies increased wonder. Informations were given in to the magistrates against him as a magician; and in searching his lodgings a great number of copies were found. The red ink, and Fust's red ink is peculiarly brilliant; which embellished his copies was said to be his blood; and it was solemnly adjudged that he was in league with the devil. Fust was at length obliged to save himself from a bonfire, to reveal his art to the Parliament of Paris, who discharged him from all prosecution in consideration of this useful invention.

When the art of printing was established, it became the glory of the learned to be correctors of the press to eminent printers. Physicians, lawyers, and bishops themselves, occupied this department. The printers then added frequently to their name those of the correctors of the press; and editions were then valued according to the abilities of the corrector.

The prices of books in these times were considered as an object worthy of the animadversions of the highest powers. This anxiety in favour of the studios, appears from a privilege of Pope Leo X, to Aldus Manutius for printing Varron dated 1553, signed cardinal Bembo. Aldus is exhorted to put a moderate price on the work, lest the Pope should withdraw the privilege, and accord it to others.

Robert Stephens, one of the early printers surpassed in correctness those who exercised the same profession. It is said that to render his editions immaculate, he hung up his proofs in public places and generously recompensed those who were so fortunate as to detect an errata.

Plantin, though a learned man, is more famous as a printer. His printing-office claims our admiration: it was one of the wonders of Europe. This grand building was the chief ornament of the city of Antwerp. Magnificent in its structure, it presented to the spectator a countless number of presses, characters of all figures and all sizes, matrices to cast letters, and all other printing materials; which Babel assures us amounted to immense sums.

In Italy, the three Manutii were more solicitous of corrections and illustrations than of the beauty of their printing. It was the character of the scholar, not of the printer, which they were ambitious.

It is much to be regretted that our publishers are not literary men. Among the learned printers formerly a book was valued because it came from the presses of an Aldus or a Stephens and even in our time the names of Bowyer and Doddsley sanctioned a work. Pelisson in his history of the French academy tells us that Camusat was selected as their bookseller from his reputation for publishing valuable works. He was a man of some literature and good sense, and rarely printed an indifferent work; when we were young I recollect that we always made it a rule to purchase his publications. His name was a test of the goodness of the work. A publisher of this character would be the greatest utility to the literary world; at home he would induce a number of ingenious men to become authors, for would be honourable to be inscribed in his catalogue; and it would be a direction for the continental reader.

So valuable a union of learning and printing did not unfortunately, last. The printers of the seventeenth century became less charmed with glory than with gain. Their correctors and their letters, evinced as little delicacy of choice.

The invention of what is now called the Italic letter is printing was made by Aldus Manutius, to whom learning owes much. He observed the many inconveniences resulting from the vast number of abbreviations which were thus so frequent among the printers, that a book was difficult to understand: a treatise was actually written on the art of reading a printed book, and this addressed to the learned. He contrived an expedient, by which these abbreviations might be entirely got rid of, and yet books suffer little increase in bulk. This he effected by introducing what is now called Italic letter, though it formerly was distinguished by the name of the inventor, hence called the Aldine.

ERRATA.

Besides the ordinary errata, which happened in printing a work, others have been purposely committed that the errata may contain what is not permitted to appear in the body of the work. Wherever the Inquisition had any power, particularly at Rome, it was not allowed to employ the word fatum, or fata, in any book. An author, desirous of using the latter word adroitly invented this scheme: he had printed in his book facta, and, in the errata, he put fi facta, read fata.

Scarron has done the same thing on another occasion. He had composed some verses, at the head of which he placed this dedication.—A Guillemette, Chienne de son Sire; but having a quarrel with his sister he maliciously put into the errata, instead of Chienne de son Sire, reine Chienne de Sire.

Lully at the close of a bad prologue said, the word fi du prologue was an erratum, it should have been fi du prologue.

In a book, there was printed le docteur Morel. A wag put into the errata, for le docteur Morel, read le docteur Morel. This Morel was not the first docteur nor docte.

When a fanatic published a mystical work full of unintelligible raptures, and which he entitled Les Delices &

Errata, it was proposed to print in his errata, for Delices, and Delires.

When the author of an idle and imperfect book ended with the usual phrase of cetera desiderantur, one altered it non desiderantur sed desunt; the rest is wanting, but not wanted.

At the close of a silly book, the author as usual printed the word FINE—A wit put this among the errata, with his pointed couplet ;

Finis! an error, or a lie, my friend!
In writing foolish books—there is no End!

In the year 1561, was printed a work, entitled the Anatomy of the Mass. It is a thin octavo, of 172 pages, and it is accompanied by an Errata of 15 pages! The editor, a pious monk, informs us that a very serious reason induced him to undertake this task: for it is, says he, to preclude the artifices of Satan. He supposes that the Devil, to ruin the fruit of this work, employed two very malicious devils: the first before it was printed, by drenching the press in a kennel, and having reduced it to a most pitiable state, rendered several parts illegible; the second, in obliging the printers to commit such numerous blunders, never yet equalled in so small a work. To combat this double machination of Satan he was obliged carefully to re-peruse the work, and to form this singular list of the blunders of printers under the influence of the Devil. All this he relates in an advertisement prefixed to the Errata.

A furious controversy raged between two famous scholars from a very laughable but accidental Erratum; and threatened serious consequences to one of the parties. Flavius wrote two letters criticising rather freely a polyglot Bible edited by Abraham Ecchellensis. As this learned editor had sometimes censured the labours of a friend of Flavius, this latter applied to him the third and fifth verses of the seventh chapter of St Matthew, which he printed in Latin. Ver. 3. Quid vides festucam in oculo fratris tui, et trabem in Oculo tuo non vides. Ver. 5. Ejice primum trabem de Oculo tuo, et tunc videbis ejicere festucam de Oculo fratris tui. Ecchellensis opens his reply by accusing Flavius of an enormous crime committed in this passage; attempting to correct the sacred text of the Evangelist, and daringly to reject a word, while he supplied its place by another as impious as obscene! This crime, exaggerated with all the virulence of an angry declaimer, closes with a dreadful accusation. Flavius's morals are attacked, and his reputation overturned by a horrid imputation. Yet all this terrible reproach is only founded on an Erratum! The whole arose from the printer having negligently suffered the first letter of the word Oculo to have dropped from the form, when he happened to touch a line with his finger which did not stand straight! He published another letter to do away the imputation of Ecchellensis; but thirty years afterwards his rage against the negligent printer was not extinguished; Certain wits were always reminding him of it.

One of the most egregious of all literary blunders is that of the edition of the Vulgate, by Sixtus V. His holiness carefully superintended every sheet as it passed through the press; and, to the amazement of the world, the work remained without a rival—it swarmed with errata! A multitude of scraps were printed to paste over the erroneous passages, in order to give the true text. The book makes a whimsical appearance with these patches; and the heretics exulted in this demonstration of papal infallibility! the copies were called in, and violent attempts made to suppress it; a few still remain for the raptures of the biblical collectors; at a late sale the bible of Sixtus V. fetched above sixty guineas—not too much for a mere book of blunders! The world was highly amused at the bull of the editorial Pope prefixed to the first volume, which excommunicates all printers who in re-printing the work should make any alteration in the text.

In a version of the Epistles of St Paul into the Ethiopic language, which proved to be full of errors, the editors allege a very good-humoured reason—They who printed the work could not read, and we could not print; they helped us, and we helped them, as the blind helps the blind.

A printer's widow in Germany, while a new edition of the Bible was printing at her house, one night took an opportunity of going into the office, to alter that sentence of subjection to her husband, pronounced upon Eve in Genesis, Chap. 3. v. 16. She took out the two first letters of the word HERR, and substituted NA in their place thus altering the sentence from 'and he shall be thy Lord,' (Herr) to 'and he shall be thy Fool,' (Narr). It is said her life paid for this intentional erratum; and that some secreted copies of this edition have been bought up at enormous prices.

We have an edition of the Bible, known by the name of The vinegar Bible; from the erratum in the title to the 20th Chap. of St Luke, in which, 'Parable of the Vineyard,' is printed 'Parable of the Vinegar.' It was printed in 1717, at the Clarendon press.

We have had another, where 'Thou shalt commit adultery' was printed, omitting the negation; which occasioned the archbishop to lay one of the heaviest penalties on the Company of Stationers that was ever recorded in the annals of literary history.

Herbert Croft used to complain of the incorrectness of our English Classics, as re-printed by the booksellers. It is evident some stupid printer often changed a whole text intentionally. The fine description by Akenside of the Pantheon, 'SEVERELY great,' not being understood by the blockhead, was printed severely great. Swift's own edition of the City Shower, has 'old ACHES throbs.' Aches is two syllables, but modern printers, who had lost the right pronunciation, have aches as in one syllable; and then to complete the metre, have foisted in 'aches will throbs.' Thus what the poet and the linguist wish to preserve is altered, and finally lost.

It appears by a calculation made by the printer of Steeven's edition of Shakespeare, that every octavo page of that work; text and notes, contains 2680 distinct pieces of metal; which in a sheet amount to 42,880—the misplacing of any one of which would inevitably cause a blunder.—With this curious fact before us, the accurate state of our printing, in general, is to be admired, and errata ought more freely to be pardoned than the fastidious minuteness of the insect eyes of certain critics has allowed.

Whether such a miracle as an immaculate edition of a classical author does exist, I have never learnt; but an attempt has been made to obtain this glorious singularity—and was as nearly realized as is perhaps possible: the magnificent edition of As Lucradas of Camoens, by Dom Joze Souza, in 1817. This amateur spared no prodigality of cost and labour, and flattered himself that by the assistance of Didot, not a single typographical error should be found in that splendid volume. But an error was afterwards discovered in some of the copies, occasioned by one of the letters in the word Luciano having got misplaced during the working of one of the sheets. It must be confessed that this was an accident or misfortune—rather than an Erratum!

One of the most remarkable complaints on ERRATA is that of Edw. Leigh, appended to his curious treatise 'on Religion and learning.' It consists of two folio pages, in a very minute character, and exhibits an incalculable number of printers' blunders. 'We have not,' he says, 'Plantin nor Stephens amongst us; and it is no easy task to specify the chiefest errata; false interjections there are too many; here a letter wanting, there a letter too much; a syllable too much, one letter for another; words parted where they should be joined; words joined which should be severed; words misplaced; chronological mistakes, &c.' This unfortunate folio was printed in 1658. Are we to infer by such frequent complaints of the authors of that day, that either they did not receive proofs from the printers, or that the printers never attended to the corrected proofs? Each single erratum seems to have been felt as a stab to the literary feelings of the poor author!

PATRONS.

Authors have too frequently received ill treatment, even from those to whom they dedicated their works.

Some who felt hurt at the shameless treatment of such mock *Mecenas*es have observed that no writer should dedicate his works but to his FRIENDS; as was practised by the ancients, who usually addressed theirs to those who had solicited their labours, or rewarded their progress.

Theodosius Gaza had no other recompense for having inscribed to Sextus IV, his translation of the book of Aristotle on the Nature of Animals, than the price of the binding, which this charitable father of the church munificently bestowed upon him.

Theocritus fills his Idylliums with loud complaints of the neglect of his patrons; and Tasso was as little successful in his dedications.

Ariosto, in presenting his Orlando Furioso to the Cards-nal d'Ete, was gratified with the bitter sarcasm of—'Dove diavolo avete pigliato tanta coglioneria?' Where the devil have you found all this stuff?

When the French historian Duplex, whose pen was indeed fertile, presented his book to the Duke d'Epemon, this Mæcenas, turning to the Pope's Nuncio, who was present, very coarsely exclaimed—Cadedia! ce Mon- sieur a un flux enragé, il chie un livre toutes les lunes!

Thomson, the ardent author of the Seasons, having extravagantly praised a person of rank, who afterwards appeared to be undeserving of eulogiums, properly employed his pen in a solemn recantation of his error. A very different conduct from that of Duplex, who always spoke highly of Queen Margaret of France for a little place he held in her household: but after her death, when the place became extinct, spoke of her with all the freedom of satire.
Such is too often the character of some of the literati, who only dare to reveal the truth when they have no interest to conceal it.

Poor Mickle, to whom we are indebted for so beautiful a version of Camoens' Lusiad, having dedicated this work, the continued labour of five years, to the Duke of Buccleugh had the mortification to find, by the discovery of a friend, that he had kept it in his possession three weeks before he could collect sufficient intellectual desire to cut open the first pages! and what is worse, the neglect he had experienced from this nobleman preyed on his mind, and reduced him to a state of dependency. This patron was a political economist, the pupil of Adam Smith! It is pleasing to add, in contrast with this frigid Scotch patron, that when Mickle went to Lisbon, where his translation had passed before him, he found the Prince of Portugal waiting on the quay to be the first to receive the translator of this great national poem; and during a residence of six months, Mickle was warmly regarded by every Portuguese nobleman.

'Every man believes,' writes Dr Johnson, in a letter to Barrett, 'that mistresses are unfaithful, and patrons are capricious. But he excepts his own mistress, and his own patron.'

A patron is sometimes obtained in an odd way. Ben-serade attached himself to Cardinal Mazarine; but his friendship produced nothing but civility. The poet every day indulged his easy and charming vein of amatory and panegyric poetry, while all the world read and admired his verses. One evening the cardinal, in conversation with the king, described his mode of life when at the papal court. He loved the sciences; but his chief occupation was the belles lettres, composing little pieces of poetry;
he said that he was then in the court of Rome what Ben-serade was now in that of France. Some hours afterwards the friends of the poet related to him the conversation of the cardinal. He quitted them abruptly, and ran to the apartment of his eminence, knocking with all his force, that he might be certain of being heard. 'The cardinal had just gone to bed. In vain they informed him of this circumstance, while he persisted in demanding entrance; and as he continued this incessant disturbance, they were compelled to open the door. He ran to his eminence, fell upon his knees, almost pulled off the sheets of the bed in rapture, imploring a thousand pardons for thus disturbing him, but such was his joy in what he had just heard, which he repeated, that he could not refrain from immediately giving vent to his gratitude and his pride, to have been compared with his eminence for his poetical talents! Had the door not been immediately opened, he should have expired; he was not rich, it is true, but he should now die contented! The cardinal was pleased with his ardour, and probably never suspected his fatuity; and the next week our new actor was pensioned.

On Cardinal Richelieu, another of his patrons, he gratefully made this epitaph,

*Cy gist, ouy gist par la mort bleu
Le Cardinal de Richelieu,
Et ce qui cause mon ennuy
Ma pension avec lui.*

*Here lies, ead 'tis very true!
The illustrious Cardinal Richelieu:
My grief is genuine—void of whim!
Alas! my pension lies with him!*

Le Brun, the great French artist, painted his own portrait, holding in his hand that of his earliest patron. In this accompaniment Le Brun may be said to have pour-trayed the features of his soul, as his pencil had his physionomy. If genius has too often complained of its patrons, it has often too-overvalued their protection.

POETS, PHILOSOPHERS, AND ARTISTS, MADE BY ACCIDENT.

Accident has frequently occasioned the most exordinary geniuses to display their powers. It was at Rome, say Gibbon, on the 15th of October, 1764, as I sat musing amidst the ruins of the Capitol, while the bare-footed friars were singing vespers in the Temple of Jupiter, that the idea of writing the decline and fall of the City first started to my mind.

Father Malebranche having completed his studies in philosophy and theology without any other intention than devoting himself to some religious order, little expected that celebrity his works acquired for him. Loitering in an idle hour in the shop of a bookseller, and turning over a porcel of books, L'Homme de Descartes fell into his hands.
Having dipped into some parts, he read with such delight that the palpitations of his heart compelled him to lay the volume down. It was this circumstance that produced those profound contemplations which made him the Platon of his age.

Cowley became a poet by accident. In his mother's apartment he found, when very young, Spenser's Fair Queen; and, by a continual study of poetry, he became so enchanted of the Muse, that he grew irrecoverably poet.

Dr Johnson informs us, that Sir Joshua Reynolds has the first fondness of his art excited by the perusal of Richardson's Treatise.

Vaucanson displayed an uncommon genius for mechanics. His taste was first determined by an accident when young, he frequently attended his mother to the residence of her confessor; and while she wept with repentance, he wept with weariness! In this state of disagreeable vacation, says Helvetius he was struck with the uniform motion of the pendulum of the clock in the hall. His curiosity was roused; he approached the clock case, and studied its mechanism; what he could not discover, he guessed at. He then projected a similar machine; and gradually his genius produced a clock. Encouraged by this first success, he proceeded in his various attempts and the genius which thus could form a clock, in time formed a fluting automaton.

If Shakspeare's imprudence had not obliged him to quit his wool trade, and his town; if he had not engaged with a company of actors, and at length, disgusted with being an indifferent performer, he had not turned author, the prudent wool-seller had never been the celebrated poet.

'Accident determined the taste of Moliere for the stage.
His grandfather loved the theatre, and frequently carried him there. The young man lived in dissipation; the father observing it, asked in anger, if his son was to be made an actor. "Would to God," replied the grandfather,
"he was as good an actor as Montrose." The words struck young Moliere; he took a disgust to his tapestry trade; and it is to this circumstance that France owes her greatest comic writer.'

'Corneille loved; he made verses for his mistress, became a poet, composed Melite, and afterwards his other celebrated works. The discreet Corneille had remained a lawyer.'

'Thus it is, that the devotion of a mother, the death of Cromwell, deer-stealing, the exclamation of an old man, and the beauty of a woman, have given five illustrious characters to Europe.'

We owe the great discovery of Newton to a very trivial accident. When a student at Cambridge, he had retired during the time of the plague into the country. As he was reading under an apple-tree, one of the fruit fell, and struck him a smart blow on the head. When he observed the smallness of the apple, he was surprised at the force of the stroke. This led him to consider the accelerating motion of falling bodies; from whence he deduced the principle of gravity, and laid the foundation of his philosophy.

Ignatius Loyola was a Spanish gentleman, who was dangerously wounded at the siege of Pampaluna. Having heated his imagination by reading the Lives of the Saints, which were brought to him in his illness, instead of romance, he conceived a strong ambition to be the founder of a religious order; where originated the celebrated society of the Jesuits.

Rousseau found his eccentric powers first awakened by the advertisement of the singular annual subject which the academy of Dijon proposed for that year, in which he wrote his celebrated Declamation against the arts and sciences. A circumstance which determined his future literary efforts.

La Fontaine, at the age of twenty-two, had not taken any profession, or devoted himself to any pursuit. Having accidentally heard some verses of Malherbe, he felt a sudden impulse, which directed his future life. He immediately bought a Malherbe, and was so exquisitely delighted with this poet, that after passing the nights in treasuring his verses in his memory, he would run in the day-time to the woods, where, concealing himself, he would recite his verses to the surrounding dryads.

Plumstead was an astronomer by accident. He was taken from school on account of his illness, when Sacroboscus's book of Sphaera having been lent to him, he was so pleased with it, that he immediately began a course of astronomical studies. Pennant's first propensity to natural history was the pleasure he received from an accidental perusal of Willoughby's work on birds: the same accident, of finding on the table of his professor, Reamur's History of Insects, of which he read more than he attended to the lecture, and having been refused the loan, gave such an instant turn to the mind of Bonnet, that he hastened to obtain a copy, but found many difficulties in procuring this costly work; its possession gave an unalterable direction to his future life; this naturalist indeed lost the use of his sight by his devotion to the microscope.

Dr Franklin attributes the cast of his genius to a similar accident. 'I found a work of De Foe's, entitled an "Essay on Projects," from which perhaps I derived impressions that have since influenced some of the principal parts of my life.'

I shall add the accident which occasioned Roger Ascham to write his Schoolmaster, one of the most curious and useful treatises among our elder writers.

An dinner given by Sir William Cecil, during the plague in 1585, at his apartments at Windsor, where the queen had taken refuge, a number of ingenious men were invited. Secretary Cecil communicated the news of the morning, that several scholars at Eton had run away on account of their master's severity, which he condemned as a great error in the education of youth. Sir William Petre maintained the contrary; severe in his own temper he pleaded warmly in defence of hard flogging. Dr Wootton, in soft tones, sided with the Secretary. Sir John Mason, adopting no side, bantered both. Mr Haddon seconded the hard-hearted Sir William Petre, and adduced, as an evidence, that the best schoolmaster then in England was the hardest flogger. Then was it that Roger Ascham indignantly exclaimed, that if such a master had an able scholar it was owing to the boy's genius, and not the preceptor's rod. Secretary Cecil and others were pleased with Ascham's notions. Sir Richard Sackville was silent, but when Ascham after dinner went to the queen to read one of the orations of Demosthenes, he took him aside, and frankly told him that though he had taken no part in the debate, he would not have been absent from that conversation for a great deal; that he knew to his cost the truth Ascham had supported; for it was the perpetual flogging of such a schoolmaster, that had given him an uncooperable aversion to study. And as he wished to remedy this defect in his own children, he earnestly exhorted Ascham to write his observations on so interesting a topic. Such was the circumstance which produced the admirable requis of Roger Ascham.

INEQUALITIES OF GENIUS.

Singular inequalities are observable in the labours of genius; and particularly in those which admit great enthusiasm, as in poetry, in painting, and in music. Faultless modern industry can preserve in one continued degree; but excellence, the daring and the happy, can only be attained, by human faculties, by starts.

Our poets who possess the greatest genius, with, perhaps, the least industry, have at the same time the most splendid and the worst passages of poetry. Shakespeare and Dryden are at once the greatest and the least of our poets. With some, their great fault consists in having none.

Carracci sarcastically said of Tintoret.—Ho veduto il

Tintoretto—hora eguale a Titiano, hora minore del Tintoretto—I have seen Tintoret now equal to Titian, and now less than Tintoret.

Trublet very justly observes—The more there are beauties, and great beauties, in a work, I am the less surprised to find faults, and great faults. When you say of a work—that it has many faults; that decides nothing, and I do not know by this, whether it is execrable, or excellent. You tell me of another—that it is without any faults; if your account be just, it is certain the work cannot be excellent.

CONCEPTION AND EXPRESSION.

There are men who have just thoughts on every subject; but it is not perceived, because their expressions are feeble. They conceive well, but they produce badly.

Erasmus acutely observed—alluding to what then much occupied his mind—that one might be apt to swear that they had been taught, in the confessional cell, all they had learnt; so scrupulous are they of disclosing what they know. Others, again, conceive ill, and produce well; for they express with elegance, frequently, what they do not know.

It was observed of one pleader, that he knew more than he said; and of another, that he said more than he knew.

The judicious Quintilian observes, that we ought at first to be more anxious in regard to our conceptions than our expressions—we may attend to the latter afterwards. While Horace thought that expressions will never fail with luminous conceptions. Yet they seem to be different things, for a man may have the clearest conceptions, and at the same time be no pleasing writer; while conceptions of no eminent merit may be very agreeably set off by a warm and colouring diction.

Lucian happily describes the works of those who abound with the most luxuriant language, void of ideas. He calls their unmeaning verbiage anemony-words (anemone verborum;) for anemonies are flowers, which, however brilliant, can only please the eye, leaving no fragrance. Pratt, who was a writer of flowing, but nugatory verses, was compared to the daisy; a flower indeed, but without the fragrance.

GEOGRAPHICAL DICTION.

There are many sciences, says Menage, on which we cannot, indeed, compose in a florid or elegant diction—such as geography, music, algebra, geometry, &c. When Atticus requested Cicero to write on geography, the latter excused himself, observing, that its scenes were more adapted to please the eye than susceptible of the embellishments of style. However, in these kinds of sciences, we may lend an ornament to their dryness by introducing occasionally some elegant allusion, or noticing some incident suggested by the object.

Thus when we notice some considerable place, for instance, Woodstock, we may recall attention to the residence of Chaucer, the parent of our poetry; or as a late traveller, in 'an Autumn on the Rhine,' when at Ingelheim, at the view of an old palace built by Charlemagne, adds, with 'a hundred columns brought from Rome,' and was the scene of 'the romantic amours of that monarch's fair daughter, Ihertha, with Evinhart, his secretary;' and viewing the Gothic ruins on the bank of the Rhine, has noticed them as having been the haunts of those illustrious chevaliers voleurs, whose chivalry consisted in pillaging the merchants and towns, till in the thirteenth century, a citizen of Mayence persuaded the merchants of more than a hundred towns to form a league against these little princes and counts; the origin of the famous Hanseatic league, which contributed so much to the commerce of Europe. This kind of erudition gives an interest to all local histories and associates in our memory the illustrious personages who were their inhabitants.

The same principle of composition may be carried with the happiest effect into some dry investigations, though the profound antiquary may not approve of these sports of wit or fancy. Dr Arbuthnot, in his Tables of Ancient Coins, Weights, and Measures, a topic extremely barren of amusement, takes every opportunity of enlivening the dullness of his task; even in these mathematical calculations he betrays his wit; and observes, that 'the polite Augustus, the Emperor of the World, had neither any glass in his windows, nor a shirt to his back.' Those uses of glass and linen were, indeed, not known in his time. Our physician is not less curious and facetious in the account of the fees which the Roman physicians received.

LEGENDS.

Those wild, ludicrous, but often stupid histories entitled Legends, are said to have originated in the following circumstance.

Before colleges were established in the monasteries where the schools were held, the professors in rhetoric frequently gave their pupils the life of some saint for a trial of their talent at amplification. The students, being constantly at a loss to furnish out their pages, invented most of these wonderful adventures. Jortin observes, that the Christians used to collect out of Ovid, Livy, and other pagan poets and historians, the miracles and portents to be found there, and accommodated them to their own monks and saints. The good fathers of that age, whose simplicity was not inferior to their devotion, were so delighted with these flowers of rhetoric, that they were induced to make a collection of these miraculous compositions; not imagining that, at some distant period, they would become matters of faith. Yet, when James de Voragine, Peter Nadal, and Peter Ribadeneira, wrote the lives of the saints, they sought for their materials in the libraries of the monasteries; and, awakening from the dust these manuscripts of amplification, imagined they made an invaluable present to the world, by laying before them these voluminous absurdities. The people received these pious fictions with all imaginable simplicity, and as the book is adorned with a number of cuts, these miracles were perfectly intelligible to their eyes. Tillemont, Fleury, Baillet, Launoi and Bollandus, cleared away much of the rubbish; the enviable title of Golden Legend, by which James de Voragine called his work, has been disputed; iron or lead might more aptly express the character of this folio.

When the world began to be more critical in their reading, the monks gave a graver turn to their narratives; and became penurious of their absurdities. The faithful Catholic contends, that the line of tradition has been preserved unbroken; notwithstanding that the originals were lost in the general wreck of literature from the barbarians, or came down in a most imperfect state.

Baronius has given the lives of many apocryphal saints; for instance, of a saint Xmaris whom he calls a martyr of Antioch; but it appears that Baronius having read in Chrysostom this word, which signifies a couple or pair, he mistook it for the name of a saint, and contrived to give the most authentic biography of a saint who never existed! The Catholics confess this sort of blunder is not uncommon, but then it is only fools who laugh! As a specimen of the happier inventions, one is given, embellished by the dictions of Gibbon—

'Among the insipid legends of ecclesiastical history, I am tempted to distinguish the memorable fable of the Seven Sleepers; whose imaginary date corresponds with the reign of the younger Theodosius, and the conquest of Africa by the Vandals. When the Emperor Decius persecuted the Christians, seven notable youths of Ephesus concealed themselves in a spacious cavern on the side of an adjacent mountain; where they were doomed to perish by the tyrant, who gave orders that the entrance should be firmly secured with a pile of stones. They immediately fell into a deep slumber, which was miraculously prolonged without injuring the powers of life, during a period of one hundred and eighty-seven years. At the end of that time the slaves of Adulius, to whom the inheritance of the mountain had descended, removed the stones to supply materials for some rustic edifice. The light of the sun darted into the cavern, and the Seven Sleepers were permitted to awake. After a slumber as they thought of a few hours, they were pressed by the calls of hunger; and resolved that Jamblichus, one of their number, should secretly return to the city to purchase bread for the use of his companions. The youth, if we may still employ that appellation, could no longer recognize the once familiar aspect of his native country; and his surprise was increased by the appearance of a large cross, triumphantly erected over the principal gate of Ephesus. His singular dress and obsolete language confounded the baker, to whom he offered an ancient medal of Decius as the current coin of the empire; and Jamblichus, on the suspicion of a secret treasure, was dragged before the judge. Their mutual inquiries produced the amazing discovery, that two centuries were almost elapsed since Jamblichus and his friends had escaped from the rage of a Pagan tyrant. The bishop of Ephesus, the clergy, the magistrates the people, and, it is said, the Emperor Theodosius himself, hastened to visit the cavern of the Seven Sleepers who bestowed their benediction, related their story and the same instant peaceably expired.

'This popular tale Mahomet learned when he drove camels to the fairs of Syria; and he has introduced it, as a divine revelation, into the Koran. —The same story has been adopted and adorned, by the nations from Bengal to Africa, who profess the Mahometan religion.

The too curious reader may perhaps require other specimens of the more unlucky inventions of this 'Golden Legend;' as characteristic of a certain class of minds, philosopher will not condemn these grotesque fictions.

These monks imagined that holiness was often procured to a saint's filthiness. St Ignatius, say they, lighted to appear abroad with old dirty shoes; he never used a comb, but let his hair curl; and religiously abstained from paring his nails. One saint attained to such piety to have near three hundred patches on his breech, which, after his death, were hung up in public as an imitative to imitation. St Francis discovered by certain experience, that the devils were frightened away by such kind breeches, but were animated by clean clothing to tempt and seduce the wearers; and one of their heroes declares that the purest souls are in the dirtiest bodies. On this they tell a story which may not be very agreeable to the tedious delicacy. Brother Juniper was a gentleman perfectly pious on this principle; indeed so great was his merit in this species of mortification, that a brother declared he could always nose Brother Juniper when within a mile of the monastery, provided the wind was at the point. Once, when the blessed Juniper, for he was a saint, was a guest, his host, proud of the honour of entertaining so pious a personage, the intimate friend of St Francis, provided an excellent bed, and the finest sheets Brother Juniper abhorred such luxury. And this too evidently appeared after his sudden departure in the morning unknown to his kind host. The great Juniper did this, says his biographer, having told us what he did, not so much from his habitual inclinations for which he was so justly celebrated, as from his excessive piety, and as much as he could to mortify worldly pride, and to show how true saint despised clean sheets.

In the life of St Francis we find, among other grotesque miracles, that he preached a sermon in a desert, but he soon collected an immense audience. The birds shrill; warbled to every sentence, and stretched out their necks opened their beaks, and when he finished, dispersed with a holy rapture into four companies, to report his sermon to all the birds in the universe. A grasshopper remained a week with St Francis during the absence of the Virgin Mary, and pattered on his head. He grew so companionable with a nightingale, that when a nest of swallows began to babble, he hushed them by desiring them not to trouble of their sister, the nightingale. Attacked by a wolf, with only the sign manual of the cross, he held a long dialogue with his rabid assailant, till the wolf, meek as a lap-dog, stretched his paws in the hands of the saint, followed him through towns, and became half a Christian.

This same St Francis had such a detestation of the good things of this world, that he would never suffer his followers to touch money. A friar having placed in a window some money collected at the altar, he desired him to take it in his mouth, and throw it on the dung of an ass! St Philip Neri was such a lover of poverty, that he frequently prayed that God would bring him to that state as to stand in need of a penny, and find nobody that would give him one!

But Saint Macaire was so shocked at having killed a louse, that he endured seven years of penitence among the thorns and briars of a forest. A circumstance which seems to have reached Moliere, who gives this stroke to the character of his Tartuffe:

Il s'impute a peché la moindre bagatelle ;
Jusques-la qu'il se vint, l'autre jour s'accuser
D'avoir pris une puce en faisant sa priere,
Et de l'avoir tué, avec trop de colere !

I give a miraculous incident respecting two pious rascals. The night of the Nativity of Christ, after the first mass, they both retired into a solitary spot of their nursery till the second mass was rung. One asked the other, 'Why do you want two cushions, when I have only one ?'

The other replied, 'I would place it between us, for the child Jesus; as the Evangelist says, where there are two or three persons assembled I am in the midst of them.' This being done, they sat down, feeling a most lively pleasure at their fancy; and there they remained from the Nativity of Christ to that of John the Baptist; but this great interval of time passed with these saintly maidens as two hours would appear to others. The abbess and her nuns were alarmed at their absence, for no one could give any account of them. In the eve of St John, a cowherd passing by them, beheld a beautiful child seated on a cushion between this pair of runaway nuns. He hastened to the abbess with news of these stray sheep, who saw this lovely child playfully seated between these nymphs, who, with blushing countenances, inquired if the second bell had already rung? Both parties were equally astonished to find our young devotees had been there from the Nativity of Jesus to that of St John. The abbess asked after the child who sat between them; they solemnly declared they saw no child between them, and persisted in their story.

Such is one of these miracles of 'the Golden Legend,' which a wicked wit might comment on, and see nothing extraordinary in the whole story. The two nuns might be missing between the Nativities, and be found at the last with a child seated between them. They might not choose to account either for their absence or their child—the only touch of miracle is, that they asseverated, they saw no child—that I confess is a little (child) too much.

The lives of the saints by Alban Butler is a learned work, and the most sensible history of these legends; Ribadeneira's lives of the saints exhibit more of the legendary spirit, for wanting judgment and not faith, he is more voluminous in his details, and more ridiculous in his narratives.

THE PORT ROYAL SOCIETY.

Every lover of letters has heard of this learned society, which, says Gibbon, contributed so much to establish in France a taste for just reasoning, simplicity of style, and philosophical method. Their 'Logic, or the Art of Thinking,' for its lucid, accurate, and diversified matter, is still an admirable work; notwithstanding the writers at that time had to emancipate themselves from the barbarism of the scholastic logic with cautious boldness. It was the conjoint labour of Arnauld and Nicole. Europe has been seduced by the labours of these learned men; but not many have attended to the origin and dissolution of this literary society.

In the year 1637, Le Maitre, a celebrated advocate, resigned the bar, and the honour of being Conseiller d'Etat, which his uncommon merit had obtained him, though then only twenty-eight years of age. His brother, De Sericourt, who had followed the military profession, quitted it at the same time. Consecrating themselves to the service of God, they retired into a small house near the Port-Royal of Paris, where they were joined by their brothers De Sacy, De St Elme, and De Valmont. Arnauld, one of their most illustrious associates, was induced to enter into the Jesuit controversy, and then it was they encountered the powerful persecution of the Jesuits. Constrained to remove from that spot, they fixed their residence at a few leagues from Paris, and called it Port-Royal des Champs.

With these illustrious recluses many distinguished persons now retired, who had given up their parks and houses to be appropriated to their schools; and this community was called the Society of Port-Royal.

Here were no rules, no vows, no constitution, and no cells formed. Prayer and study, and manual labour were their only occupations. They applied themselves to the education of youth, and raised up little academies in the neighbourhood, where the members of the Port-Royal, the most illustrious names of literary France, presided. None considered his birth entitled him to any exemption from their public offices, relieving the poor and attending on the sick, and employing themselves in their farms and gardens; they were carpenters, ploughmen, gardeners, and vine-dressers, &c., as if they had practised nothing else; they studied physic, and surgery, and law; in truth, it seems that from religious motives, these learned men attempted to form a community of primitive Christianity.

The Duchess of Longueville, once a political chief, sacrificed her ambition on the altar of Port-Royal, enlarged the monastic inclosure with spacious gardens and orchards, built a noble house, and often retreated to its seclusion. The learned D'Andilly, the translator of Josephus, after his studious hours, resorted to the cultivation of fig-trees; and the fruit of Port-Royal became celebrated for its size and flavour. Presents were sent to the Queen-Mother of France, Anne of Austria, and Cardinal Mazarine, who used to call it 'Frutti beni.' It appears that 'families of rank, affluence, and piety, who did not wish entirely to give up their avocations in the world, built themselves country-houses in the valley of Port-Royal, in order to enjoy the society of its religious and literary inhabitants.'

In the solitude of Port-Royal Racine received his education; and, on his death-bed desired to be buried in its cemetery, at the feet of his master, Hamon. Arnauld, persecuted, and dying in a foreign country, still cast his lingering looks on this beloved retreat, and left the society his heart, which was there inurned.

Anne de Bourbon, a princess of the blood royal, erected a house near the Port-Royal, and was, during her life, the powerful patroness of these solitary and religious men: but her death in 1679, was the fatal stroke which dispersed them for ever.

The envy and the fears of the Jesuits, and their rancour against Arnauld, who with such ability had exposed their designs, occasioned the destruction of the Port-Royal Society. Exinanite, exinanite usque ad fundamentum in as! Annihilate it, annihilate it, to its very foundations! Such are the terms in the Jesuitic decree. The Jesuits had long called the little schools of Port-Royal the hot-beds of heresy. Gregoire, in his interesting memoir of 'Ruins of Port-Royal,' has drawn an affecting picture of that virtuous society when the Jesuits obtained by their intrigues an order from government to break it up. They razed the buildings, and ploughed up the very foundation; they exhausted their hatred even on the stones, and profaned even the sanctuary of the dead; the corpses were torn out of their graves, and dogs were suffered to contend for the rags of their shrouds. When the Port-Royal had no longer an existence, the memory of that asylum of innocence and learning was still kept alive by those who collected the engravings representing that place by Mademoiselle Hortemels. The police, under Jesuitic influence, at length seized on the plates in the cabinet of the fair artist. How caustic was the retort courteous which Arnauld gave the Jesuits—I do not fear your pen, but its knife.

These were men whom the love of retirement had united to cultivate literature, in the midst of solitude, of peace, and of piety. They formed a society of learned men, of fine taste and sound philosophy. Alike occupied on sacred, as well as on profane writers, they edified, while they enlightened the world. Their writings fixed the French language. The example of these solitary shows how retirement is favourable to penetrate into the sanctuary of the Muses; and that by meditating in silence on the oracles of taste, in imitating we may equal them.

An interesting anecdote is related of Arnauld on the occasion of the dissolution of this society. The dispersion of these great men, and their young scholars, was lamented by every one but their enemies. Many persons of the highest rank participated in their sorrows. The excellent Arnauld, in that moment, was as closely pursued as if he had been a felon.

It was then the Duchess of Longueville concealed Arnauld in an obscure lodging, who assumed the dress of a layman, wearing a sword and full-bottomed wig. Arnauld was attacked by a fever, and in the course of conversation with a physician, Arnauld inquired after news. 'They talk of a new book of the Port-Royal,' replied the doctor, 'attributed to Arnauld or to Sacy; but I do not believe it to come from Sacy; he does not write so well.' 'How, Sir!' exclaimed the philosopher, forgetting his sword and wig; 'believe me, my nephew writes better than I do.' The physician eyed his patient with amazement—he hastened to the Duchess, and told her, 'The malady of the gentleman you sent me to is not very serious, provided you do not suffer him to see any one, and insist on his holding his tongue.' The Duchess, alarmed, immediately had Arnauld conveyed to her palace. She gave him an apartment, concealed him in her chamber, and persisted to attend him herself. 'Ask,' she said, 'what you want of the servant, but it shall be myself who shall bring it to you.'

How honourable is it to the female character, that in all similar events their sensibility is not greater than their fortitude! But the Duchess of Longueville saw in Arnauld a model of human fortitude, which martyrs never excelled. His remarkable reply to Nicole, when they were hunted room place to place, can never be forgotten: Arnauld wished Nicolle to assist him in a new work, when the latter observed, 'We are now old, is it not time to rest?' 'Rest!' returned Arnauld, 'have we not all eternity to rest in?' The whole of the Arnauld family were the most extraordinary instance of that hereditary character which is continued through certain families: here it was a sublimity, and, perhaps singular union of learning with religion. The Arnaulds, Sacy, Pascal, Tillemont, with other illustrious names, to whom literary Europe will owe perpetual obligations, combined the life of the monastery with that of the library.

THE PROGRESS OF OLD AGE IN NEW STUDIES.

Of the pleasures derivable from the cultivation of the arts, sciences, and literature, time will not abate the growing passion; for old men still cherish an affection and feel a youthful enthusiasm in those pursuits, when all others have ceased to interest. Dr Reid, to his last day, retained a most active curiosity in his various studies, and particularly in the revolutions of modern chemistry. In advanced life we may resume our former studies with a new pleasure and in old age we may enjoy them with the same relish with which more useful students commence. Professor Dugald Stewart tells us that Adam Smith observed to him that 'of all the amusements of old age, the most grateful and soothing is a renewal of acquaintance with the favourite studies and favourite authors of youth—a remark, which in his own case seemed to be more particularly exemplified while he was republishing, with the enthusiasm of a student, the tragic poets of ancient Greece. I heard him repeat the observation more than once while Sophocles and Euripides lay open on his table.'

Socrates learned to play on musical instruments in his old age; Cato, at eighty thought proper to learn Greek; and Phitarch, almost as late in life, Latin.

Theophrastus began his admirable work on the Characters of Men at the extreme age of ninety. He only terminated his literary labours by his death.

Peter Ronsard, one of the fathers of French poetry, applied himself late to study. His acute genius, and ardent application, rivalled those poetic models which he admired; and Boccaccio was thirty-five years of age when he commenced his studies in polite literature.

The great Arnauld retained the vigour of his genius, and the command of his pen, to his last day; and at the age of eighty-two was still the great Arnauld.

Sir Henry Spelman neglected the sciences in his youth, but cultivated them at fifty years of age, and produced good fruit. His early years were chiefly passed in farming, which greatly diverted him from his studies; but a remarkable disappointment respecting a contested estate, disgusted him with these rustic occupations; resolved to attach himself to regular studies, and literary society, he sold his farms, and became the most learned antiquary and lawyer.

Colbert the famous French minister, almost at sixty returned to his Latin and law studies.

Tellier, the chancellor of France, learned logic, merely for an amusement, to dispute with his grandchildren.

Dr Johnson applied himself to the Dutch language but a few years before his death. The Marquis de Saint Aulaire, at the age of seventy, began to court the Muses, and they crowned him with their freshest flowers. The verses of this French Anacreon are full of fire, delicacy, and sweetness.

Chaucer's Canterbury Tales were the composition of his latest years; they were begun in his fifty-fourth year, and finished in his sixty-first.

Ludovico Monaldesco, at the extraordinary age of 115, wrote the memoirs of his times, a singular exertion, noticed by Voltaire, who himself is one of the most remarkable instances of the progress of age in new studies.

The most delightful of auto-biographers for artists, is that of Benvenuto Cellini; a work of great originality, which, was not begun till 'the clock of his age had struck fifty-eight.'

Koornhert began at forty to learn the Latin and Greek languages, of which he became a master; several students, who afterwards distinguished themselves, have commenced as late in life their literary pursuits. Ozilby, the translator of Homer and Virgil, knew little of Latin or Greek till he was past fifty; and Franklin's philosophical pursuits began when he had nearly reached his fiftieth year.

Accorso, a great lawyer, being asked why he began the study of the law so late, answered, that indeed he began late, but should therefore master it the sooner.

Dryden's complete works form the largest body of poetry from the pen of one writer in the English language; yet he gave no public testimony of poetical abilities till his twenty-seventh year. In his sixty-eighth year he proposed to translate the whole Iliad; and the most pleasing productions were written in his old age.

Michael Angelo preserved his creative genius even in extreme old age; there is a device said to be invented by him of an old man represented in a go-cart, with an hour-glass upon it; the inscription Ancore impera! — YET I AM LEARNING!

We have a literary curiosity in a favourite treatise still Erasmus and men of letters of that period, De Ratione Studii, by Joachim Sterck, otherwise Fortius de Rhingelberg. The enthusiasm of the writer often carries him to the verge of ridicule; but something must be granted to his peculiar situation and feelings; for Baillet tells us that his method of studying had been formed entirely from his own practical knowledge and hard experience; at a late period of life he commenced his studies, and at length he imagined that he had discovered a more perpendicular mode of ascending the hill of science than by its usual circuitous windings. His work Mr Knox compares to the sound of a trumpet.

Ménage, in his Anti-Baillet, has a very curious apology for his writing verses in his old age, by showing how many poets amused themselves notwithstanding their gray hairs, and wrote sonnets or epigrams at ninety.

La Casa, in one of his letters, humorously said, Io credo ch'io farò Sonnetto venti cinque anni, o trenta, poi che io sarò morto. I think I may make some sonnets twenty-five, or perhaps thirty years after I shall be dead! Poteau tells us that he wrote verses to solace the evils of old age—

— Petavius æger

Cantabat veteris querens solatia morbi.

Malherbe declares the honours of genius were his, yet young—

Je les possède jeune, et les possède encors
A la fin de mes jours.

Maynard moralises on this subject,

En cheveux blancs il me faut donc aller
Comme un enfant tous les jours à l'école;
Que je suis fou d'apprendre a bien parler
Lorsque la mort vient m'oter la parole.

SPANISH POETRY.

Pere Bouhours observes, that the Spanish poets display an extravagant imagination, which is by no means destitute of esprit—shall we say wit? but which evinces little taste or judgment.

Their verses are much in the style of our Cowley—trivial points, monstrous metaphors, and quaint conceits. It is evident that the Spanish poets imported this taste from the time of Merino in Italy; but the warmth of the Spanish climate appears to have redoubled it, and to have blown the kindled sparks of chimerical fancy to the heat of a Vulcanian forge.

Lopes de Vega, in describing an afflicted shepherdess, in one of his pastorals, who is represented weeping near the sea-side, says 'That the sea joyfully advances to gather her tears; and that, having enclosed them in shells, it converts them into pearls.'

'Y el mar como imbiديو

A tierra por las lagrimas salia,

Y alegre de coherlas

Las guardia en conchas, y convertio en perlas.'

Villegas addresses a stream—'Thou who runnest over sands of gold, with feet of silver,' more elegant than our Shakespeare's 'Thy silver skin laced with thy golden blood.' Villegas monstrously exclaims, 'Touch my breast, if you doubt the power of Lydia's eyes—you will find it turned to ashes.' Again—'Thou art so great that thou canst only imitate thyself with thy own greatness,' much like our 'None but himself can be his parallel.'

Gongora, whom the Spaniards once greatly admired, and distinguished by the epithet of The Wonderful, is full of these points and conceits.

He imagines that a nightingale, who enchantingly varied her notes, and sang in different manners, had a hundred thousand other nightingales in her breast which alternately sang through her throat—

* Con diferencia tal, con gracia tanta,

A quel r. ysenor lora, que aspecho

Que teine ocos cien mil dentro del pecho
Que aherna su dolor por su garganta.'

Of a young and beautiful lady he says, that she has but few years of life, but many ages of beauty.

Muchos siglos de hermosura
En pocos años de edad.

Many ages of beauty is a false thought, for beauty becomes not more beautiful from its age; it would be only a spermatized beauty. A face of two or three ages old could have but few charms.

In one of his odes he addresses the River of Madrid the title of the Duke of Streams and the Viscount of Isere.

'Manganares, Manganares,
Os que en todo el aguamiso,
Estois Duque de Arroyos,
Y Visconde de los Rios.'

He did not venture to call it a Spanish grandes, for, in fact, it is but a shallow and dirty stream; and as Quevedo satirically informs us, 'Manganares is reduced, during the summer season, to the melancholy condition of the wickedish man, who asks for water in the depths of hell.'

Concerning this river a pleasant witicism is recorded. Though so small, this stream in the time of a flood can spread itself over the neighbouring fields; for this reason Philip the Second built a bridge eleven hundred feet long!—A Spaniard passing it one day, when it was perfectly dry, observing this superb bridge, archly remarked, 'That I would be proper that the bridge should be sold to purchase water.'—Es menester, vender la puente por comprar agua.

The following elegant translation of a Spanish madrigal of the kind here criticised I found in a newspaper, but it is evidently by a master-hand.

On the green margin of the land,
Where Gaudalhorse winds his way,
My lady lay:
With golden key Sleep's gentle hand
Had closed her eyes so bright—
Her eyes, two suns of light—
And bade his balmy dews
Her rosy cheeks suffuse.
The River God in slumber saw her laid,
He raised his dripping head,
With weeds o'erspread,
Clad in his wat'ry robes approach'd the maid,
And with cold kisses, like death,
Drank the rich perfume of the maiden's breath.
The maiden felt that icy kiss,
Her suns unclosed, their flame
Full and unclouded on the intruder came.
Amazed th' intruder felt,
His fro by body melt,
And hear the radiance on his bosom hiss;
And, forced in blind confusion to retire,
Leaps in the water to escape the fire.

SAINT EVREMOND.

The portrait of St Evremond, delineated by his own hand, will not be unacceptable to many readers.

This writer possessed delicacy and wit, and has written well, but with great inequality. His poetry is insipid, and his prose abounds with points; the antithesis was his favorite figure, and its prodigality fatigues. The comparisons he forms between some of the illustrious ancients will interest from their ingenuity.

In his day it was a literary fashion for writers to give their own portraits; a fashion that seems to have passed over into our country, for Farquhar has drawn his own character in a letter to a lady. Others of our writers have given these self-miniatures. Such painters are, no doubt, great flatterers, and it is rather their ingenuity, than their truth, which we admire in these cabinet pictures.

'I am a philosopher, as far removed from superstition as from impiety; a voluptuary, who has not less abhorrence of debauchery than inclination for pleasure; a man, who has never known want or abundance. I occupy that station of life which is contemned by those who possess every thing; envied by those who have nothing, and only relished by those who make their felicity consist in the exercise of their reason. Young, I hated dissipation; convinced that a man must possess wealth to provide for the comforts of a long life. Old, I disliked economy; as I believe that we need not greatly dread want, when we have but a short time to be miserable. I am satisfied with what nature has done for me, nor do I repine at fortune.

I do not seek in men what they have of evil, that I may censure; I only discover what they have ridiculous, that I may be amused. I feel a pleasure in detecting their follies; I should feel a greater in communicating my discoveries did not my prudence restrain me. Life is too short, according to my ideas, to read all kinds of books, and to load our memories with an endless number of things at the cost of our judgment. I do not attach myself to the observations of scientific men to acquire science; but to the most rational that I may strengthen my reason. Sometimes, I seek for more delicate minds, that my taste may imbibe their delicacy; sometimes for the gayer, that I may enrich my genius with their gaiety; and, although I constantly read, I make it less my occupation than my pleasure. In religion, and in friendship, I have only to paint myself such as I am—in friendship more tender than a philosopher; and in religion as constant and sincere as a youth who has more simplicity than experience. My piety is composed more of justice and charity than of penitence. I rest my confidence on God, and hope every thing from his benevolence. In the bosom of providence I find my repose, and my felicity.'

MEN OF GENIUS DEFICIENT IN CONVERSATION.

The student who may, perhaps, shine a luminary of learning and of genius, in the pages of his volume, is found, not rarely, to lie obscured beneath a heavy cloud in colloquial discourse.

If you love the man of letters seek him in the privacies of his study. It is in the hour of confidence and tranquillity his genius shall elicit a ray of intelligence, more fervid than the labours of polished composition.

The great Peter Corneille, whose genius resembled that of our Shakspeare, and who has so forcibly expressed the sublime sentiments of the hero, had nothing in his exterior that indicated his genius; on the contrary, his conversation was so inept that it never failed of wearying. Nature who had lavished on him the gifts of genius, had forgotten to blend with them her more ordinary ones. He did not even speak correctly that language of which he was such a master.

When his friends represented to him how much more he might please by not disdaining to correct these trivial errors, he would smile and say—I am not the less Peter Corneille. Descartes, whose habits were formed in solitude and meditation, was silent in mixed company; and Thomas described his mind by saying that he had received his intellectual wealth from nature in solid bars, but not in current coin; or as Addison expressed the same idea, by comparing himself to a banker who possessed the wealth of his friends at home, though he carried none of it in his pocket, or as that judicious moralist Nicole, one of the Port-Royal Society, who said of a scintillant wit—He conquers me in the drawing-room, but he surrenders to me at discretion on the staircase. Such may say with Themistocles, when asked to play on a lute, 'I cannot fiddle, but I can make a little village a great city.'

The deficiencies of Addison in conversation are well known. He preserved a rigid silence amongst strangers; but if he was silent, it was the silence of meditation. How often at that moment, he laboured at some future Spectator!

Mediocrity can talk; but it is for genius to observe.

The cynical Mandeville compared Addison, after having passed an evening in his company, to 'a silent parson in a tie-wig.' It is no shame for an Addison to receive the censures of a Mandeville; he has only to blush when he calls down those of a Pope.

Virgil was heavy in conversation, and resembled more an ordinary man than an enchanting poet.

La Fontaine, says La Bruyere, appeared coarse, heavy, and stupid; he could not speak or describe what he had just seen; but when he wrote he was the model of poetry.

It is very easy, said a humorous observer on La Fontaine, to be a man of wit or a fool; but to be both, and that too in the extreme degree, is indeed admirable, and only to be found in him. This observation applies to that fine natural genius Goldsmith. Chaucer was more facetious in his tales than in his conversation, and the Countess of Pembroke used to rally him by saying that his silence was more agreeable to her than his conversation.

Isocrates, celebrated for his beautiful oratorical compositions, was of so timid a disposition that he never ventured to speak in public. He compared himself to the wheatstone which will not cut, but enables other things to do this; for his productions served as models to other orators. Vaucanson was said to be as much a machine as any he had made.

Dryden said of himself,—"My conversation is slow and dull, my humour saturnian and reserved. In short, I am none of those who endeavour to break jests in company, or make repartees.

VIDA.

What a consolation for an aged parent to see his child, by the efforts of his own merits, attain from the humblest obscurity to distinguished eminence! What a transport for the dear sensibility to return to the obscure dwelling of his parent, and to embrace him, adorned with public honours. Poor Vida was deprived of this satisfaction; but he is placed higher in our esteem by the present anecdote than even by that classic composition, which rivals the Art of Poetry of his great master.

Jerome Vida, after having long served two Popes, at length attained to the episcopacy. Arrayed in the robes of his new dignity he prepared to visit his aged parents, and felicitated himself with the raptures which the old couple would feel in embracing their son as their bishop. When he arrived at their village, he learnt that it was but a few days since they were no more! His sensibilities were exquisitely pained. The muse, elegantly querulous, dictated some elegiac verse; and in the sweetest pathos deplored the death and the disappointment of his parents.

THE SCUDERIES.

Bien heureux Scudery, dont la fertile plume
Peut tout les mois sans peine enfanter un volume.

Boileau has written this couplet on the Scuderies, the brother and sister, both famous in their day for composing romances, which they sometimes extended to ten or twelve volumes. It was the favourite literature of that period, as novels are now. Our nobility not unfrequently condescended to translate these voluminous compositions.

The diminutive size of our modern novels is undoubtedly an improvement; but in resembling the size of primers, it were to be wished that their contents had also resembled their inoffensive pages. Our great grandmothers were incommoded with overgrown folios: and, instead of finishing the eventful history of two lovers at one or two sittings, it was sometimes six months, including Sundays, before they could get quit of their Clelians, their Cyruses, and Partenissas.

Mademoiselle Scudery, Menage informs us, had composed ninety volumes! She had even finished another romance, which she would not give to the public, whose taste, she perceived, no more relished this kind of works. She was that unfortunate author who lives to more than ninety years of age; and consequently outlive their immortality.

She had her panegyricists in her day: Menage observes, 'What a pleasing description has Mademoiselle Scudery made in her Cyrus, of the little court at Rambouillet! A thousand things in the romances of this learned lady render them inestimable. She has drawn from the ancients their happiest passages, and has even improved upon them; like the prince in the fable, whatever she touches becomes gold. We may read her works with great profit, if we possess a correct taste, and lose instruction. Those who censure their length, only show the littleness of their judgment; as if Homer and Virgil were to be despised, because many of their books are filled with episodes and incidents that necessarily retard the conclusion. It does not require much penetration to observe that Cyrus and Clelia are a species of the epic poem. The epic must embrace a number of events to suspend the course of the narrative; which only taking in a part of the life of the hero, would terminate too soon to display the skill of the poet. Without this artifice, the charm of uniting the greater part of the episodes to the principal subject of the romance would be lost. Mademoiselle de Scudery has so well treated them, and so aptly introduced a variety of beautiful passages, that nothing in this kind is comparable to her productions. Some expressions, and certain turns, have become somewhat obsolete, all the rest will last for ever, and outlive the criticisms they have undergone.'

Menage has here certainly uttered a false prophecy. The curious only look over her romances. They contain innumerable many beautiful inventions: the misfortune is, that time and patience are rare requisites for the enjoyment of these liads in prose.

'The misfortune of her having written too abundantly has occasioned an unjust contempt,' says a French critic. 'We confess there are many heavy and tedious passages in her voluminous romances; but if we consider that in Clelia and the Artemene are to be found inimitable delicate touches, and many splendid parts which would do honour to some of our living writers, we must acknowledge that the great defects of all her works arise from her not writing in an age when taste had reached the acmé of cultivation. Such is her erudition that the French place her next to the celebrated Madame Dacier. Her works, containing many secret intrigues of the court and city, her readers must have keenly relished on their early publication.'

Her Artemenes, or the Great Cyrus, and principally her Clelia, are representations of what then passed at the court of France. The Map of the Kingdom of Tenderness, Clelia, appeared, at the time, as the happiest invention. This once celebrated map is an allegory which distinguishes the different kinds of tenderness, which are reduced to esteem, gratitude, and inclination. The map represents three rivers, which have these three names, and on which are situated three towns called Tenderness: Tenderness on Inclination; Tenderness on Esteem; and Tenderness on Gratitude. Pleasant Attention, or Petit Soins, is a village very beautifully situated. Mademoiselle de Scudery was extremely proud of this little allegorical map; and had a terrible controversy with another writer about its originality.

George Scudery, her brother and inferior in genius, had a striking singularity of character:—he was one of the most complete votaries to the universal divinity of Vanity. With a heated imagination, entirely destitute of judgment, his military character was continually exhibiting itself by that peaceful instrument the pen, so that he exhibits a most amusing contrast of ardent feelings in a cool situation; not liberally endowed with genius, but abounding with its semblance in the fire of eccentric gasconade; no man has portrayed his own character with a bolder colouring than himself in his numerous prefaces and addresses; surrounded by a thousand self-illusions of the most sublime class, every thing that related to himself had an Homeric grandeur of conception.

In an epistle to the Duke of Montmorency, he says, 'I will learn to write with my left hand, that my right hand may more nobly be devoted to your service'; and alluding to his pen, (plume), declares, 'he comes from a family who never used one, but to stick in their hats.' When he solicits small favours from the great, he assures them 'that princes must not think him importunate, and that his writings are merely inspired by his own individual interest; no! he exclaims, I am studious only of your glory, while I am careless of my own fortune.' And indeed, to do him but justice, he acted up to those romantic feelings. After he had published his epic of Alaric, Christina of Sweden proposed to honour him with a chain of gold of the value of five hundred pounds, provided he would expunge from his epic the eulogiums he had bestowed on the Count of Gardie, whom she had disgraced. The epicical soul of Scudery magnanimously scorned the bribe, and replied, that 'if the chain of gold should be as weighty as that chain mentioned in the history of the Incas, I will never destroy any altar on which I have sacrificed!'

Proud of his boasted nobility and erratic life, he thus addresses the reader: 'You will lightly pass over any faults in my work, if you reflect that I have employed the greater part of my life in seeing the finest parts of Europe, and that I have passed more days in the camp than in the library. I have used more matches to light my musket than to light my candles; I know better how to arrange columns in the field than those on paper; and to square battalions better than to round periods.' In his first publication, he began his literary career perfectly in character, by a challenge to his critics!

He is the author of sixteen plays, chiefly heroic tragedies; children who all bear the features of their father. He first introduced in his 'L'Amour Tyrannique' a strict observance of the Aristotelian unities of time and place; and the necessity and advantages of this regulation are urged, which only shows that Aristotle goes but little to the composition of a pathetic tragedy. In his last drama, 'Arminius,' he extravagantly scatters his panegyrics on his fifteen predecessors; but of the present one he has the not craked notion : it is the quintessence of Scudery ! an ingenious critic calls it 'The downfall of mediocrity !' It is amusing to listen to this blazing preface— At length, indeed, nothing remains for me but to mention the great genius which I now present to you, and by which I have solved to close my long and laborious course. It is indeed my master-piece ! and the most finished work that ever came from my pen ; for whether we examine the fable, the manners, the sentiments, or the versification, it is certain that I never performed any thing so just, so great, nor so beautiful ; and if my labours could ever deserve a name, I would claim it for this work !

The actions of this singular personage were in unison with his writings : he gives a pompous description of a post unimportant government which he obtained near Versailles, but all the grandeur existed only in our author's heated imagination. Bachaumont and De la Chaux, two wits of those times, in their playful 'Voyage' describe it with humour :

Mais il faut vous parler du Fort
Qui sans doute est une merveille ;
C'est notre dame de la garde
Gouvernement commode et beau,
A qui suffit pour tout garde,
Un Suisse avec sa hallebarde
Point sur la porte du chateau !

A fort very commodiously guarded ; only requiring one sentinel, and that sentinel a soldier painted on the door ! In a poem on his disgust with the world, he tells us how intimate he has been with princes : Europe has known him through all her provinces ; he ventured every thing in a thousand combats :

L'on me vit oïr, l'on me vit commander,
Et mon poil tout poudré d'une blancheur les armes ;
Il est peu de beaux arts ou je ne suis instruit ;
En prose et en vers, mon nom fit quelque bruit ;
Et par plus d'un chemin je parvins à la gloire !

IMITATED.

Princes were proud my friendship to proclaim,
And Europe gazed where'er her Hero came !
I grasp'd the laurels of heroic strife,
The thousand perils of a soldier's life !
Obedient in the ranks each toilsome day !
Though heroes soon command, they first obey.
'Twas not for me, too long a time to yield !
Born for a chieftain in the tented field !
Around my plumed helm, my silvery hair
Hung like an honour'd wreath of age and care ;
The finer arts have charm'd my studious hours,
Vers'd in their mysteries, skilful in their powers ;
In verse and prose my equal genius glow'd,
Pursuing glory, by no single road !

Such was the vain George Scudery ! whose heart however was warm : poverty could never degrade him ; adversity never broke down his magnanimous spirit !

DE LA ROCHEFOUCAULT.

The maxims of this noble author are in the hands of everyone. To those who choose to derive every motive and every action from the solitary principle of self-love, they are inestimable. They form one continued satire on human nature ; but they are not reconcilable to the feelings of the man of more generous dispositions, or who passes through life with the firm integrity of virtue. Even at court we find a Sully, a Malesherbes and a Clarendon, as well as a Rochefoucault and a Chesterfield.

The Duke de la Rochefoucault says Segrais, had not studied ; but he was endowed with a wonderful degree of discernment, and knew the world perfectly well. This afforded him opportunities of making reflections, and reducing into maxims those discoveries which he had made in the heart of man, of which he displayed an admirable knowledge.

It is perhaps worthy of observation that this celebrated French duke, according to Olivet in his History of the French Academy, could never summon resolution, at his election, to address the academy. Although chosen member, he never entered ; for such was his timidity, that he could not face an audience and pronounce the usual compliment on his introduction ; he whose courage, whose heart, and whose genius, were alike distinguished. The fact is, that it appears by Mad. de Sevigne, that Roche-foucault lived a close domestic life ; and that there must be at least as much theoretical as practical knowledge in the opinions of such a retired philosopher.

Chesterfield, our English Rochefoucault, we are also informed, possessed an admirable knowledge of the heart of man ; and he too has drawn a similar picture of human nature ! These are two noble authors whose chief studies seem to have been made in courts. May it not be possible, allowing these authors not to have written a sentence of apocrypha, that the fault lies not so much in human nature as in the satellites of Power ?

PRIOR'S HANS CARVEL.

Were we to investigate the genealogy of our best modern stories, we should often discover the illegitimacy of our favourites ; we should indeed trace them frequently to the East. My well-read friend Mr Douce, has collected materials for such a work ; but his modesty has too long prevented him from receiving the gratitude of the curious in literature.

The story of the ring of Hans Carvel is of very ancient standing, as are most of the tales of this kind.

Ménage says that Poggius, who died in 1459, has the merit of its invention ; but I suspect he only related a very popular story.

Rabelais, who has given it in his peculiar manner, changed its original name of Philephus to that of Hans Carvel.

This tale is likewise in the eleventh of Les Cent Nouvelles. Nouvelles collected in 1461, for the amusement of Louis XI, when Dauphin, and living in solitude.

Ariosto has borrowed it, at the end of his fifth Satire, but, by his pleasant manner of relating it, it is fairly appropriated.

In a collection of novels at Lyons, in 1555, it is also employed in the eleventh novel.

Celio Malespini has it again in page 288 of the second part of his Two Hundred Novels, printed at Venice in 1609.

Fontaine has prettily set it off, and an anonymous writer has composed it in Latin Anacreontic verses ; and at length our Prior has given it in his best manner, with equal gaiety and freedom. After Ariosto, La Fontaine, and Prior, let us hear of it no more ; yet this has been done.

Voltaire has a curious essay to show that most of our best modern stories and plots originally belonged to the eastern nations, a fact which has been made more evident by recent researches. The Amphitruon of Moliere was an imitation of Plautus, who borrowed it from the Greeks, and they took it from the Indians ! It is given by Dow in his History of Hindostan. In Captain Scott's Tales and Anecdotes from Arabian writers, we are surprised at finding so many of our favourites very ancient orientalists.—The Ephesian Matron, verified by La Fontaine, was borrowed from the Italians ; it is to be found in Petronius, and Petronius had it from the Greeks. But where did the Greeks find it ? In the Arabian Tales ! And from whence did the Arabian fabulists borrow it ? From the Chinese ! It is found in Du Halde, who collected it from the Versions of the Jesuits.

THE STUDENT IN THE METROPOLIS.

A man of letters, who is more intent on the acquisitions of literature than on the plots of politics, or the speculations of commerce, will find a deeper solitude in a populous metropolis than if he had retreated to the seclusion of the country.

The student who is no flatterer of the little passions of men, will not be much incommoded by their presence, Gibbon paints his own situation in the heart of the fashionable world.—'I had not been endowed by art or nature with those happy gifts of confidence and address which unlock every door and every bosom. While coaches were rattling through Bond-street, I have passed many a solitary evening in my lodging with my books. I withdrew without reluctance from the noisy and extensive scene of crowds without company, and dissipation without pleasure.' And even after he had published the first volume of his History, he observes that in London his confinement was solitary and sad ; 'the many forgot my existence when they saw me no longer at Brooks's, and the few who sometimes had a thought on their friend, were detained by business or pleasure, and I was proud and happy if I could prevail on my bookseller Elmsly to enliven the dullness of the evening.

A situation very elegantly described in the beautifully-polished verses of Mr Rogers, in his 'Epistle to a Friend';

When from his classic dreams the student steals
Amid the buzz of crowds, the whirl of wheels,
To muse unnoticed, while around him press
The meteor-forms of equipage and dress;
Alone in wonder lost, he seems to stand
A very stranger in his native land.

He compares the student to one of the seven sleepers in the ancient legend.

Descartes residing in the commercial city of Amsterdam, writing to Balzac, illustrates these descriptions with great force and vivacity.

You wish to retire; and your intention is to seek the solitude of the Chartreux, or, possibly, some of the most beautiful provinces of France and Italy. I would rather advise you, if you wish to observe mankind, and at the same time to lose yourself in the deepest solitude, to join me in Amsterdam. I prefer this situation to that even of your delicious villa, where I spent so great a part of the last year; for however agreeable a country-house may be, a thousand little conveniences are wanted, which can only be found in a city. One is not alone so frequently in the country as one could wish: a number of impertinent visitors are continually besieging you. Here, as all the world, except myself, is occupied in commerce, it depends merely on myself to live unknown to the world. I walk every day amongst immense ranks of people, with as much tranquillity as you do in your green valleys. The men I meet with make the same impression on my mind as would the trees of your forests, or the flocks of sheep grazing on your common. The busy hum too of these merchants does not disturb one more than the purring of your brooks. If sometimes I amuse myself in contemplating their anxious motions, I receive the same pleasure which you do in observing those men who cultivate your land; for I reflect that the end of all their labours is to embellish the city which I inhabit, and to anticipate all my wants. If you contemplate with delight the fruits of your orchards, with all the rich promises of abundance, do you think I feel less in observing so many fleets that convey to me the productions of either India? What spot on earth could you find, which like this, can so interest your vanity and gratify your taste?

THE TALMUD.

The Jews have their Talmud; the Catholics their Legends of Saints; and the Turks their Sonnah. The Protestant has nothing but his Bible. The former are three kindred works. Men have imagined that the more there is to be believed, the more are the merits of the believer. Hence all traditionists formed the orthodox and the strongest party. The word of God is lost amidst those heaps of human inventions, sanctioned by an order of men connected with religious duties; they ought now, however, to be regarded rather as Curiosities of Literature. I give a sufficiently ample account of the Talmud and the Legends, but of the Sonnah I only know that it is a collection of the traditional opinions of the Turkish prophets, directing the observance of petty superstitions not mentioned in the Koran.

The TALMUD is a collection of Jewish traditions, which have been orally preserved. It comprises the MISHNA, which is the text, and the GEMARA, its commentary. The whole forms a complete system of the learning, ceremonies, civil and canon laws of the Jews; treating indeed on all subjects; even gardening, manual arts, &c. The rigid Jews persuaded themselves that these traditional explanations are of divine origin. The Pentateuch, say they, was written out by their legislator before his death in thirteen copies, distributed among the twelve tribes, and the remaining one deposited in the ark. The oral law Moses continually taught in the Sanhedrim, to the elders and the rest of the people. The law was repeated four times; but the interpretation was delivered only by word of mouth from generation to generation. In the fortieth year of the flight from Egypt, the memory of the people became treacherous, and Moses was constrained to repeat this oral law, which had been conveyed by successive traditionists. Such is the account of honest David Levi: it is the creed of every rabbin. David believed in every thing, but in Jesus.

This history of the Talmud some inclined to suppose apocryphal, even among a few of the Jews themselves.

When these traditions first appeared, the keenest controversy has never been able to determine. It cannot be denied that there existed traditions among the Jews in time of Jesus Christ. About the second century they were industriously collected by Rabbi Juda the holy, prince of the rabbins, who enjoyed the favour of Antonine Pius. He has the merit of giving some order to this multifarious collection.

It appears that the Talmud was compiled by several Jewish doctors, who were solicited for this purpose by the emperor, that they might have something to oppose to the Christian adversaries.

The learned W. Wotton, in his curious 'Discourses on the traditions of the Scribes and Pharisees, supplies an analysis of this vast collection; he has translated the two divisions of this code of traditional laws with the original text and the notes.

There are two Talmuds: the Jerusalem and the Babylonian. The last is the most esteemed, because it is the most bulky.

R. Juda, the prince of the rabbins, committed to writing all these traditions, and arranged them under six general heads, called orders or classes. The subjects are indeed curious for philosophical inquirers, and multifarious as the events of civil life. Every order is formed of treatises; every treatise is divided into chapters, every chapter into misnas, which word means mixtures or miscellanies, in the form of aphorisms. In the first part is discussed what relates to seeds, fruits, and trees; in the second, feasts; in the third, women, their duties, their disorders, marriages, divorces, contracts, and nuptials; in the fourth, are treated the damages or losses sustained by beasts or men; in the fifth, things found; deposits; usuries; rents; farms; partnerships in commerce; inheritance; sales and purchases; oaths; witnesses; arrests; idolatry; and here are named those to whom the oral law was received and preserved. In the sixth part are noticed sacrifices and holy things; and the sixth treats of purifications; vessels; furniture; clothes; houses; leprosy; baths; and numerous other articles. A this forms the MISHNA.

The GEMARA that is, the complement, or perfection, contains the Disputes and Opinions, of the RABBINS of the oral traditions. Their last decisions. It must be confessed that absurdities are sometimes elucidated by other absurdities; but there are many admirable things in this vast repository. The Jews have such veneration for this compilation, that they compare the holy writings to water, and the Talmud to wine; the text of Moses to pear, but the Talmud to aromatics. Of the twelve hours which the day is composed, they tell us that God employs nine to study the Talmud, and only three to read the written law!

St Jerome appears evidently to allude to this work, and notices its 'Old Wives' Tales,' and the filthiness of some of its matters. The truth is, that the rabbins resemble the Jesuits and Casuists; and Sanchez's work on 'Mahomoe' is well known to agitate matters with such scrupulous niceties, as to become the most offensive thing possible. But as among the schoolmen and the casuists there have been great men, the same happened to these gemarists. Maimonides was a pillar of light among their darkness. The antiquity of this work is of itself sufficient to make very curious.

The Mishna, entitled the Corner, i. e. of the field. The laws of gleaming are commanded according to Leviticus xix, 9, 10. Of the corner to be left in a corn-field. Whether the corner is due, and when not. Of the forgotten sheaf. Of ears of corn left in gathering. Of grapes left upon the vine. Of olives left upon the trees. When and where the poor may lawfully glean. What sheaf, or olives, grapes, may be looked upon to be forgotten, and what a Who are the proper witnesses concerning the poor's duty to exempt it from tithing, &c. They distinguish uncircumcised fruit—it is unlawful to eat of the fruit of a tree till the fifth year of its growth: the first three years of its bearing, it is called uncircumcised; the fourth is fered to God; and the fifth may be eaten.

The Mishna, entitled Heterogeneous Mixtures, contains several curious horticultural particulars. Of divisions:

been garden-bees and fields, that the produce of the several kinds of grains or seeds may appear distinct. Of the distance between every species. Distances between vines planted in corn-fields from one another and from the corn; three vines planted against hedges, walls, or espaliers, at any thing sowed near them. Various causes relating to vineyards planted near any forbidden seeds.

In their seventh, or subsequal year, in which the produce of all estates was given up to the poor, one of their regulations is on the different work which must not be sowed in the sixth year, lest (because the seventh being devoted to the poor) the produce should be unfairly diminished, and the public benefits arising from this law be frustrated. Of whatever is not perennial, and produced that year by the earth, no money may be made; but what is perennial may be sold.

On priest's tithes, we have a regulation concerning eating the fruits they are carrying to the place where they are to be separated.

The order of women is very copious. A husband is obliged to forbid his wife to keep a particular man's company save two witnesses. Of the waters of jealousy by which suspected woman is to be tried by drinking, we find many particular. The ceremonies of clothing the accused woman at her trial. Pregnant women, or who suckle, are not obliged to drink; for the rabbins seem to be well convinced of the effects of the imagination. Of their divorces we are the laws; and care is taken to particularize bills of divorces written by men in delirium or dangerously ill. The party of the rabbins will not allow of any divorce, unless something light was found in the woman's character, his another (the Pharisees) allow divorces even when a woman has only been so unfortunate as to suffer her husband's soup to be burnt!

In the order of damages, containing rules how to tax the damages done by man or beast, or other casualties, their distinctions are as nice as their cases are numerous. What is innocent and what convict. By the one they are creatures not naturally used to do mischief in any particular way; and by the other, those that naturally, or by a vicious habit, are mischievous that way. The tooth of a beast is convict when it is proved to eat its usual food, the property of another man; and full restitution must be made; but if a beast that is used to eat fruits and herbs, wears clothes or damages tools, which are not its usual food, the owner of the beast shall pay but half the damage committed on the property of the injured person; but if the injury is committed on the property of the person who does the damage, he is free, because the beast gnawed it was not its usual food. As thus; if the beast of A goes or tears the clothes of B, in B's house or grounds, shall pay half the damages; but if B's clothes are injured in A's grounds by A's beast, A is free, for what had he to do to put his clothes in A's grounds? They made a subtle distinction, as when an ox gores a man or a woman, the law inquired into the habits of the beast; whether he was an ox that used to gore, or an ox that was not used to gore. However these were niceties sometimes acute, sometimes often ridiculous. No beast could be convicted by vicious till evidence was given that he had done three successive days; but if he leaves off those three tricks for three days more, he is innocent again. An ox may be convict of goring an ox and not a man, or of goring a man and not an ox: nay, of goring on the sabbath, but not a working day. Their aim was to make the punishment depend on the proofs of the design of the beast that did the injury; but this attempt evidently led them to distinctions much too subtle and obscure. Thus some rabbins say that the morning prayer of the Sherash must be said at the time they can distinguish blue from white; but others, more indulgent, insists it may be when we can distinguish blue from green; which latter colours are so similar as to require a stronger light. With the same subtle sentences in distinguishing things, is their law touching not touching fire on the sabbath. Among those things are specified in this constitution, the rabbins allow a minister to look over young children by lamp-light, but not to read himself. The minister is forbidden to direct the children where they should read, because by lamp-light, lest he should trim his lamp; but he may direct the children where they should read, because it is quickly done, and there would be no danger of his doing it in his presence, or suffering any of his to do it in his. All these regulations, which some perceive as minute and frivolous, show a great intimacy with the human heart, and a spirit of profound observation which had been capable of achieving great purposes.

The owner of an innocent beast only pays half the costs for the mischief incurred. Man is always convict, and for all mischief he does he must pay full costs. However there are casual damages,—as when a man pours water accidentally on another man; or makes a thorn-hedge which annoys his neighbour; or falling down, and another by stumbling on him incurs harm; how such compensations are to be made. He that has a vessel of another's in keeping, and removes it, but in the removal breaks it, must swear to his own integrity: i. e. that he had no design to break it. All offensive or noisy trades were to be carried on at a certain distance from a town. Where there is an estate, the sons inherit and the daughters are maintained; but if there is not enough for all, the daughters are maintained, and the sons must get their living as they can, or even beg. The contrary to this excellent ordination has been observed in Europe.

These few titles may enable the reader to form a general notion of the several subjects on which the Mishna treats. The Gemara or Commentary is often overloaded with ineptitudes and ridiculous subtilties. For instance, in the article of 'Negative Oaths.' If a man swears he will eat no bread, and does eat all sorts of bread, in that case the perjury is but one; but if he swears that he will eat neither barley, nor wheat, nor rye-bread, the perjury is multiplied as he multiplies his eating of the several sorts. Again, the Pharisees and the Sadducees had strong differences about touching the holy writings with their hands. The doctors ordained that whoever touched the book of the law must not eat of the truma (first fruits of the wrought produce of the ground), till they had washed their hands. The reason they gave was this. In times of persecution they used to hide those sacred books in secret places, and good men would lay them out of the way when they had done reading them. It was possible then that these rolls of the law might be gnawed by mice. The hands then that touched these books when they took them out of the places where they had laid them up, were supposed to be unclean, so far as to disable them from eating the truma till they were washed. On that account they made this a general rule, that if any part of the Bible (except Ecclesiastes, because that excellent book their sagacity accounted less holy than the rest) or their phylacteries, or the strings of their phylacteries, were touched by one who had a right to eat the truma, he might not eat it till he had washed his hands. An evidence of that superstitious trifling for which the Pharisees and the later Rabbins have been so justly reprobated.

They were absurdly minute in the literal observance of their vows, and as shamefully subtle in their artful evasion of them. The Pharisees could be easy enough to themselves when convenient, and always as hard and unrelenting as possible to all others. They quibbled, and dissolved their vows with experienced casuistry. Jesus reproaches the Pharisees in Matthew xv, and Mark vii, for flagrantly violating the fifth commandment, by allowing the vow of a son, perhaps made in hasty anger, its full force, when he had sworn that his father should never be the better for him, or any thing he bad, and by which an indigent father might be suffered to starve. There is an express case to this purpose in the Mishna, in the title of Vows. The reader may be amused by the story.—A man made a vow that his father should not profit by him. This man afterwards made a wedding-feast for his own son, and wishes his father should be present; but he cannot invite him because he is tied up by his vow. He invented this expedient:—he makes a gift of the court in which the feast was to be kept, and of the feast itself, to a third person in trust, that his father should be invited by that third person with the other company whom he at first designed. This third person then says,—If these things you thus give me are mine, I will dedicate them to God, and then none of you can be the better for them. The son replied,—I did not give them to you that you should consecrate them. Then the third man said,—Yours was no donation, only you were willing to eat and drink with your father. Thus, says R. Juda, they dissolved each other's intentions; and when the case came before the rabbins, they decreed, that a gift which may not be consecrated by the person to whom it is given is not a gift.

The following extract from the Talmud exhibits a subtle mode of reasoning, which the Jews adopted when the learned of Rome sought to persuade them to conform to their idolatry. It forms an entire Mishna, entitled Seder Nes- his, Avoda Zara, iv, 7, on idolatrous worship, translated by Wotton.

'Some Roman senators examined the Jews in this manner:—If God had no delight in the worship of idols, why did he not destroy them? The Jews made answer,—If men had worshipped only things of which the world had had no need, he would have destroyed the objects of their worship; but they also worship the sun and moon, stars and planets; and then he must have destroyed his world for the sake of these deluded men. But still, said the Romans, why does not God destroy the things which the world does not want, and leave those things which the world cannot be without? Because, replied the Jews, this would strengthen the hands of such as worship these necessary things, who would then say,—Ye allow now that these are gods, since they are not destroyed.

RABBINICAL STORIES.

The preceding article furnishes some of the more serious investigations to be found in the Talmud. Its levities may amuse. I leave untouched the gross obscenities and immoral decisions. The Talmud contains a vast collection of stories, apologies, and jests; many display a vein of pleasantry, and at times have a wildness of invention which sufficiently mark the features of an eastern parent. Many extravagantly puerile were designed merely to recreate their young students. When a rabbin was asked the reason of so much nonsense, he replied that the ancients had a custom of introducing music in their lectures, which accompaniment made them more agreeable; but that not having musical instruments in the schools, the rabbins invented these strange stories to arouse attention. This was ingeniously said; but they make miserable work when they pretend to give mystical interpretations to pure nonsense.

These rabbinical stories, and the LEGENDS of the Catholics, though they will be despised, and are too often despicable, yet as the great Lord Bacon said of some of these inventions, they would 'serve for winter talk by the fire-side,' and a happy collection from these stories is much wanted.

In 1711, a German professor of the Oriental languages, Dr Eisenmenger published in two large volumes quarto, his 'Judaism discovered,' a ponderous labour, of which the scope was to ridicule the Jewish traditions.

Ishbi gave a dangerous adventure into which King David was drawn by the devil. The king one day hunting, Satan appeared before him in the likeness of a roe. David discharged an arrow at him, but missed his aim. He pursued the feigned roe into the land of the Philistines. Ishbi, the brother of Goliath, instantly recognized the king as him, who had slain that giant. He bound him, and bended him neck and heels, and laid him under a wine-press in order to press him to death. A miracle saves David. The earth beneath him became soft, and Ishbi could not press wine out of him. That evening in the Jewish congregation a dove, whose wings were covered with silver, appeared in great perplexity; and evidently signified the King of Israel was in trouble. Abishai, one of the king's counsellors, inquiring for the king, and finding him absent, is at a loss to proceed, for according to the Mishna, no one may ride on the king's horse, nor sit upon his throne, nor use his sceptre. The school of the rabbins however allowed these things in time of danger. On this Abishai vaults on David's horse, and (with an Oriental metaphor) the land of the Philistines leaped to him instantly! Arrived at Ishbi's house, he beholds his mother Orpa spinning. Perceiving the Israelite, she snatched up her spinning-wheel and threw it at him, to kill him; but not hitting him, she desired him to bring the spinning-wheel to her. He did not do this exactly, but returned it to her in such a way that she never asked any more for her spinning-wheel. When Ishbi saw this, and recollecting that David, though tied up neck and heels, was still under the wine-press, he cried out, 'There are now two, who will destroy me?' So he threw David high up into the air, and stuck his spear into the ground, imagining that David would fall upon it and perish. But Abishai pronounced the magical name, which the Talmudists frequently made use of, and it caused David to hover between earth and heaven, so that he fell not down! Both at length unite against Ishbi, and observing that two young lions should kill one lion, find no difficulty in getting rid of the brother of Goliath.

Of Solomon, another favourite hero of the Talmudists a fine Arabian story is told. This king was an adept in necromancy, and a male and a female devil were always in waiting for any emergency. It is observable, that the Am bians who have many stories concerning Solomon, always describe him as a magician. His adventures with Aschmedai, the prince of devils, are numerous; and they both (the king and the devil) served one another many a slippery trick. One of the most remarkable is when Aschmedai, who was prisoner to Solomon, the king having contrived to possess himself of the devil's seal-ring, and chained him one day offered to answer an unwholy question put to him! Solomon, provided he returned him his seal-ring, and loosed his chain. The impertinent curiosity of Solomon induced him to commit this folly. Instantly Aschmedai allowed the monarch, and stretching out his wings up to the firmament of heaven, one of his feet remaining on the earth he spit out Solomon four hundred leagues from him. This was done so privately that no one knew any thing of the matter. Aschmedai then assumed the likeness of Solomon and sat on his throne. From that hour did Solomon say, 'This then is the reward of all my labour,' according to Ecclesiasticus, i, 3; which this, means, one rabbin says, 'walking staff; and another insists was his ragged coat. For Solomon went a begging from door to door; and whenever he came he uttered these words: 'I the preacher was king over Israel in Jerusalem.' At length coming before the council, and still repeating these remarkable words without addition or variation, the rabbins said; 'This means something; for a fool is not constant in his talk. They asked the chamberlain if the king frequently said him? and he replied to them, No! then they sent to the queens, to ask if the king came into their apartments? as they answered, Yes! The rabbins then sent them a message to take notice of his feet; for the feet of devils are like the feet of cocks. The queens acquainted them that his majesty always came in slippers, but forced them to embrace at times forbidden by the law. He had attempted to lie with his mother Bathsheba, whom he had almost killed to pieces. At this the rabbins assembled in great haste and taking the beggar with them, they gave him the ring and the chain in which the great magical name was engraved, and led him to the palace. Aschmedai was sitting on the throne as the real Solomon entered; but instantly shrieked and flew away. Yet to his last day was Solomon afraid of the prince of devils, and had his bed guarded by the valiant men of Israel, as is written in Cant. iii, 7, &

They frequently display much humour in their inventions, as in the following account of the manners and morals of an infamous town which derided all justice. The were in Sodom four judges, who were liars, and deriders of justice. When any one had struck his neighbour's wife and caused her to miscarry, these judges thus counselled the husband; 'Give her to the offender that he may get his child for thee.' When any one had cut off an ear, his neighbour's ass, they said to the owner,—Let us have the ass till the ear is grown again, that it may be turned to thee as thou wishest.' When any one wounded his neighbour, they told the wounded man to 'give him a fee, for letting him bleed.' A toll was exacted, passing a certain bridge; but if any one chose to go through the water, or walk round about to save it, he was condemned to a double toll. Eleasar, Abraham's servant came thither, and they wounded him.—When before the judge he was ordered to pay his fee for having his blood let, Eleasar flung a stone at the judge and wounded him on which the judge said to him,—What meanest thou? Eleasar replied,—Give him who wounded me the fee that is due to myself for wounding thee. The people of the town had a bedstead on which they laid travellers who were tired to rest. If any one was too long for it, they cut off his legs; and if he was shorter than the bedstead, they straitened him to its head and foot. When a beggar came to the town, every one gave him a penny, on which was inscribed the donor's name; but they would sell him no bread nor let him escape. When the beggar died from hunger then they came about him, and each man took back his penny. These stories are curious inventions of levity, mockery and malice, seasoned with humour. It is in some of the famous decisions of Sancho Panza are to be found in the Talmud.

Abraham is said to have been jealous of his wives, and built an enchanted city for them. He built an iron city and put them in.—The walls were so high and dark, sun could not be seen in it. He gave them a bowl of pearls and jewels, which sent forth a light in this city equal to the sun. (Noah, it seems, when in the ark had no other light than jewels and pearls. Abraham sneezing to Egypt brought with him a chest. At the custom-house the officers exacted the duties. Abraham would have readily paid, but desired they would not open the chest. They first insisted on the duty for clothes, which Abraham consented to pay; but then they thought by his ready acquiescence that it might be gold.—Abraham consents to pay for gold. They now suspected it might be silk. Abraham was willing to pay for silk, or more costly pearls; and Abraham generously consented to pay as if the chest contained the most valuable of things. It was then they resolved to open and examine the chest. And behold as soon as the chest was opened, that great lustre of human beauty broke out which made such a noise in the land of Egypt: it was Sarah herself! The jealous Abraham, to conceal her beauty had locked her up in this chest.

The whole creation in these rabbinical fancies is strangely gigantic and vast. The works of eastern nations are full of these descriptions; and Hesiod's Theogony, and Milton's battles of angels, are puny in comparison with these rabbinical heroes, or rabbinical things. Mountains are buried with all their woods with great ease, and creatures start into existence too terrible for our conceptions. The winged monster in the 'Arabian Nights,' called the Roc, is evidently one of the creatures of rabbinical fancy; it would sometimes, when very hungry, seize and fly away with an elephant. Captain Cook found a bird's nest in an island near New-Holland, built with sticks on the ground, six-and-twenty feet in circumference, and near three feet in height. But of the rabbinical birds, fish, and animals, it is not probable any circumnavigator will ever trace even a slightest vestige or resemblance.

One of their birds, when it spreads its wings, blots out the sun. An egg from another fell out of its nest, and the white thereof broke and glued about three hundred cedar-trees, and overflowed a village. One of them stands up to the lower joint of the leg in a river, and some mariners imagining the water was not deep, were hasting to bathe, when a voice from heaven said,—'Step not in there, for seven years ago there a carpenter dropped his axe, and it hath not yet reached the bottom.'

The following passage concerning fat geese is perfectly in the style of these rabbins. 'A rabbin once saw in a desert a flock of geese so fat that their feathers fell off, and the rivers flowed in fat. Then said I to them, shall we have part of you in the other world when the Messiah shall come? And one of them lifted up a wing, and another a leg, to signify these parts we should have. We should otherwise have had all parts of these geese; but we Israelites shall be called to an account touching these fat geese, because their sufferings are owing to us. It is our iniquities that have delayed the coming of the Messiah, and these geese suffer greatly by reason of their excessive fat, which daily and daily increases, and will increase till the Messiah comes!'

What the manna was which fell in the wilderness has often been disputed, and still is disputable: it was sufficient for the rabbins to have found in the Bible that the taste of it was 'as a wafer made with honey,' to have raised their fancy to its pitch. They declare it was 'like oil to children, honey to old men, and cakes to middle age.' It had every kind of taste except that of cucumbers, melons, garlic, and onions, and leeks, for these were those Egyptian roots which the Israelites so much regretted to have lost. This manna had, however, the quality to accommodate itself to the palate of those who did not murmur in the wilderness: and to these it became fish, flesh, or fowl.

The rabbins never advance an absurdity without quoting a text in scripture; and to substantiate this fact they quote Deut. ii, 7, where it is said, 'through this great wilderness, these forty years the Lord thy God hath been with thee, and thou hast lacked nothing.' St Austin repeats this explanation of the rabbins, that the faithful found in this manna the taste of their favourite food! However the Israelites could not have found all these benefits as the rabbins tell us, for in Numbers xi, 8, they exclaim, 'There is nothing at all, besides the manna before our eyes.' They had just said that they remembered the melons, cucumbers, &c. which they had eaten of so freely in Egypt. One of the hyperboles of the rabbins is, that the manna fell in such quantities that the kings of the east and the west beheld them; which they found in a passage in the 23d Psalm: Thus prepared a table before me in the presence of mine enemies? These may serve as specimens of the forced interpretations on which their grotesque fables are founded.

Their detestation of Titus, their great conqueror, appears by the following wild invention.—After having narrated certain things too shameful to read, of a prince whom Josephus describes in far different colours, they tell us that on sea Titus tauntingly observed in a great storm that the God of the Jews was only powerful on the water, and that therefore he had succeeded in drowning Pharaoh and Sistra. 'Had he been strong he would have waged war with me in Jerusalem.' On uttering this blasphemy, a voice from heaven said, 'Wicked man! I have a little creature in the world which shall wage war with thee!' When Titus landed, a gnat entered his nostrils, and for seven years together made holes in his brains. When his skull was opened the gnat was found as large as a pigeon: the mouth of the gnat was of copper and the claws of iron.

That however there are some beautiful inventions in the Talmud, I refer to the story of 'Solomon and Sheba,' in the present collections.

ON THE CUSTOM OF SALUTING AFTER SNEEZING.

It is probable that this custom, so universally prevalent, originated in some ancient superstition; it seems to have excited inquiry among all nations.

Some Catholics, says Father Feijoo, have attributed the origin of this custom to the ordinance of a pope, Saint Gregory—who is said to have instituted a short benediction to be used on such occasions, at a time when, during a pestilence, the crisis was attended by sneezing, and in most cases followed by death.

But the Rabbins who have a story for every thing, say, that before Jacob, men never sneezed but amor, and then immediately died: they assure us that the patriarch was the first who died by natural disease, before him all men died by sneezing; the memory of which was ordered to be preserved in all nations by a command of every prince to his subjects to employ some salutary exclamation after the act of sneezing. But these are Talmudical dreams, and only serve to prove that so familiar a custom has always created inquiry.

Even Aristotle has delivered some considerable nonsense on this custom; he says it is an honourable acknowledgment of the seat of good sense and genius—the head—to distinguish it from two other offensive eruptions of air, which are never accompanied by any benediction from the by-standers. The custom at all events existed long prior to Pope Gregory. The lover in Apuleius, Gytion in Petronius, and allusions to it in Pliny, prove its antiquity; and a memoir of the French academy notices the practice in the New World on the first discovery of America. Every where man is saluted for sneezing.

An amusing account of the ceremonies which attend the sneezing of a king of Menomotapa, shows what a national concern may be the sneeze of despotism.—Those who are near his person, when this happens, salute him in so loud a tone that persons in the antichamber hear it and join in the acclamation; in the adjoining apartments they do the same, till the noise reaches the street, and becomes propagated throughout the city; so that at each sneeze of his majesty, results a most horrid cry from the salutations of many thousands of his vassals.

When the king of Benmar sneezes, his courtiers immediately turn their backs on him, and give a loud slap on their right thigh.

With the ancients sneezing was ominous; from the right it was considered auspicious; and Plutarch, in his life of Themistocles, says, that before a naval battle it was a sign of conquest! Catullus, in his pleasing poem of Acme and Septimius, makes this action from the city of Love from the left the source of his fiction. The passage has been elegantly verified by a poetical friend, who finds authority that the gods sneezing on the right in Asenon, is supposed to come to us on earth on the left.

Cupid sneezing in his flight
Once was heard upon the right,
Boding too to lovers true;
But now upon the left he flew,
And with sportive sneezes divine,
Gave of joy the sacred sign.
Acme bent her lovely face,
Flush'd with rapture's rosy grace,
And those eyes that swam in bliss,
Fret't with many a breathing kiss;
Breathing, murmuring, soft, and low,
Thus might life fix ever so!
'Love of my life, and life of love'
Cupid rules our fates above,

Ever let us vow to join
In homage at his happy shrine.
Cupid heard the lovers true,
Again upon the left he flew,
And with sportive sneeze divine,
Renew'd of joy the sacred sign.

BO NAVENTURE DE PERIERS.

A happy art in the relation of a story is, doubtless, a very agreeable talent—it has obtained La Fontaine all the applause his charming naïveté deserves.

Bonaventure de Periers, Val de Chambre de la Roynne de Navarre, of whom the French have three little volumes of tales in prose, shows that pleasantly and sportive vein in which the tales of that time frequently abound. The following short anecdote is not given as the best specimen of our author, but as it introduces a novel etymology of a word in great use.

'A student at law, who studied at Poitiers, had tolerably improved himself in cases of equity; not that he was overburdened with learning, but his chief deficiency was a want of assurance and confidence to display his knowledge. His father passing by Poitiers, recommended him to read aloud, and to render his memory more prompt by continued exercise. To obey the injunctions of his father he determined to read at the Ministrie. In order to obtain a certain assurance, he went every day into a garden, which was a very secret spot, being at a distance from any house, and where there grew a great number of fine large cabbages. Thus for a long time he pursued his studies, and repeated his lectures to these cabbages, addressing them by the title of gentlemen; and balancing his periods to them as if they had composed an audience of scholars. After a fortnight or three weeks preparation, he thought it was high time to take the chair; imagining that he should be able to lecture his scholars as well as he had before done his cabbages. He comes forward, he begins his oration—but before a dozen words his tongue freezes between his teeth! Confused and hardly knowing where he was, all he could bring out was—Domini, Ego bene video quod non estis caules; that is to say—for there are some who will have every thing in plain English—Gentlemen, I now clearly see you are not cabbages! In the garden he could conceive the cabbages to be scholars; but in the chair, he could not conceive the scholars to be cabbages.'

On this story La Monnoye has a note, which gives a new origin to a familiar term.

'The hall of the School of Equity at Poitiers, where the institutes were read, was called La Ministrie. On which head, Florimond de Remond (book vii, ch. 11), speaking of Albert Babinot, one of the first disciples of Calvin, after having said he was called 'The good man,' adds, that because he had been a student of the institutes at this Ministrie of Poitiers, Calvin, and others, styled him Mr. Minister; from whence, afterwards, Calvin took occasion to give the name of MINISTERS to the pastors of his church.

GROTIUS.

The life of Grotius has been written by De Burigny; it shows the singular felicity of a man of letters and a statesman; and in what manner a student can pass his hours in the closest imprisonment. The gate of the prison has sometimes been the porch of fame.

Grotius was born with the happiest dispositions; studious from his infancy, he had also received from Nature the qualities of genius; and was so fortunate as to find in his father a tutor who had formed his early taste and his moral feelings. The younger Grotius, in imitation of Horace, has celebrated his gratitude in verse.

One of the most interesting circumstances in the life of this great man, which strongly marks his genius and fortitude, is displayed in the manner in which he employed his time during his imprisonment. Other men, condemned to exile and captivity, if they survive, they despair: the man of letters counts those days as the sweetest of his life.

When a prisoner at the Hague, he laboured on a Latin essay on the means of terminating religious disputes, which occasioned so many infelicities in the state, in the church, and in families; when he was carried to Louvestein, he resumed his law studies, which other employments had interrupted. He gave a portion of his time to moral philosophy, which engaged him to translate the maxims of the ancient poets, collected by Stobæus, and the fragments of Menander and Philæon. Every Sunday was devoted to read the scriptures, and to write his Commentaries on the New Testament. In the course of this work he fell ill, but as soon as he recovered his health he composed his treatise in Dutch verse, on the Truth of the Christian Religion. Sacred and profane authors occupied him alternately. His only mode of refreshing his mind was to pass from one work to another. He sent to Vossius his Observations on the Tragedies of Seneca. He wrote several other works particularly a little Catechism, in verse, for his daughter Cornelia; and collected materials to form his Apology. Add to these various labours and extensive correspondences he held with the learned and his friends; and his letters were often so many treatises. There is a printed collection amounting to two thousand. Grotius had notes ready for every classical author of antiquity whenever they prepared a new edition; an account of his plans and his performances might furnish a volume of themselves; yet he never published in haste, and was fond of revising them; we must recollect, notwithstanding such interrupted literary avocations, his hours were frequently devoted to the public functions of an ambassador. 'I only reserve for my studies the time which other ministers give to their pleasure to conversations often useless, and to visits sometimes unnecessary; such is the language of this great man! A though he thus produced abundantly, his confinement was not more than two years. We may well exclaim here that the mind of Grotius had never been imprisoned.

Perhaps the most sincere eulogium, and the most grateful to this illustrious scholar, was that which he received at the hour of his death.

When this great man was travelling, he was suddenly struck by the hand of death, at the village of Rostod. The parish minister, who was called in his last moments ignorant who the dying man was, began to go over the usual points; but Grotius, who saw there was no time to lose, exhorted him, turned to him, and told him, that he needed them not; and concluded by saying, Sum Grotius—I am Grotius. Te magnus ille Grotius?—What! are you that great Grotius? interrogated the minister.—What an eulogium! This anecdote seems, however, apocryphal; for we have a narrative of his death by the clergyman himself. On the death of Grotius a variety of tales were spread concerning his manner of dying raised by different parties.

In the approbation of the censor to print this 'Vie de Grotius,' it is observed that while 'his history gives us a clear idea of the extent of the human mind, it will further inform us, that Grotius died without reaping any advantage from his great talents.'

FOURLEMEN TURNED CRITICS.

I offer to the contemplation of those unfortunate mortals who are necessitated to undergo the criticisms of lords this pair of anecdotes—

Soderini, the Gonfaloniere of Florence, having had a statue made by the great Michael Angelo, when it was finished came to inspect it; and having for some time sagaciously considered it, poring now on the face, then on the arms, the knees, the form of the leg, and at length on the foot itself; the statue being of such perfect beauty, he found himself at a loss to display his powers of criticism, but by lavishing his praise. But only to praise, might appear as if there had been an obtuseness in the keenness of his criticism. He trembled to find a fault, but a fault must be found. At length he ventured to mutter something concerning the nose; it might, he thought, be something more Grecian. Angelo differed from his grace, but he said he would attempt to gratify his taste. He took up his chisel, and concealed some marble dust in his hand; feigning to retouch the part, he adroitly let fall some of the dust he held concealed. The cardinal observing it as it fell, transported at the idea of his critical acumen, exclaimed—'Ah, Angelo! you have now given an inimitable grace.'

When Pope was first introduced to read his Iliad to Lord Halifax, the noble critic did not venture to be dissatisfied with so perfect a composition; but, like the cardinal, this passage, and that word, this turn, and that expression, formed the broken cant of his criticisms. The honest poet was stung with vexation; for, in general, the parts at which his lordship hesitated were those of which he was most satisfied. As he returned home with Sir Samuel Garth he revealed to him the anxiety of mind. 'Oh,' replied Garth, laughing, 'you are not so well acquainted with his lordship as myself; he must criticize. At your next visit read to him those very passages as they now stand; tell him that have recollected his criticisms; and I'll warrant you his approbation of them. This is what I have done a hundred times myself.' Pope made use of this stratagem; think like the marble dust of Angelo; and my lord, like a cardinal, exclaimed—'Dear Pope, they are now infallible!'

LITERARY IMPOSTURES.

Some authors have practised singular impositions on the public. Varillas, the French historian, enjoyed for some time a great reputation in his own country for his historic impositions, but when they became more known, the scholars of other countries destroyed the reputation he had unjustly acquired. His continual professions of sincerity deceived many in his favour, and made him pass for a writer who had penetrated into the inmost recesses of the cabinet; but the public were at length undeceived, and were convinced that the historical anecdotes which Varillas put off for authentic facts had no foundation, being wholly his own inventing:—though he endeavoured to make them pass for realities by affected citations of titles, instructions, letters, memoirs, and relations, all of them imaginary. He had read almost every thing historical, printed and manuscript; but he had a fertile political imagination, and gave his conjectures as facts, while he quoted at random his pretended authorities. Burnet's book against Varillas is a curious little volume.

Genelli Careri, a Neapolitan gentleman, for many years never quitted his chamber; confined by a tedious indisposition, he amused himself with writing a Voyage round the World; giving characters of men, and descriptions of countries, as if he had really visited them; and his volumes are still very interesting. Du Halde, who has written so numerous an account of China, compiled it from the Memoirs of the missionaries, and never travelled ten leagues from Paris in his life; though he appears, by his writings, to be very familiar with Chinese scenery.

Duméril's travels, more recently made a great sensation—and the public were duped; they proved to be the bad voyages of a member of the German Grub-street, sent his own garret! Too many of our 'Travels' have been manufactured to fill a certain size; and some which bear names of great authority, were not written by the professed authors.

This is an excellent observation of an anonymous author—'writers who never visited foreign countries, and travellers who have run through immense regions with fleetings pace, have given us long accounts of various countries and people; evidently collected from the idle reports and heard traditions of the ignorant vulgar, from whom only they could have received those relations which we see promulgated with such undiscerning credulity.'

Some authors have practised the singular imposition of assuming a variety of titles of works as if preparing for the press, but of which nothing but the titles have been seen.

Parcial, historiographer of France, had a reason for these ingenious inventions; he continually announced such tales, that his pension for writing on the history of France might not be stopped. When he died, his historical labours did not exceed six pages!

Gregorio Reti is an historian of much the same stamp as Varillas. He wrote with great facility, and hunger literally quickened his pen. He took every thing too lightly; yet his works are sometimes looked into for many particulars of English history not to be found elsewhere; and perhaps ought not to have been there if truth had been consulted. His great aim was always to make a book: to swell his volumes with digressions, intersperses many fabulous stories, and applies all the repartees he collected from old novel-writers, to modern characters.

Such forgeries abound; the numerous 'Testaments' of Colbert, Mazarine, and other great ministers, are forgeries usually from the Dutch press, as are many supposed political 'Memoirs.'

Old translations from the Greek and Latin authors, they were taken from French versions.

The travels written in Hebrew, of Rabbi Benjamin of Meville, of which we have a curious translation, are, I believe, apocryphal. He describes a journey, which if ever it took, it must have been with his night-cap on; being a great dream! It is said that to inspirit and give importance to his nation, he pretended he had travelled to all synagogues in the east; places he mentions he does not appear ever to have seen, and the different people he describes no one has known. He calculates that he has found near eight hundred thousand Jews, of which about half are independent, and not subjects to any Christian or Gentile sovereign. These fictitious travels have been a source of much trouble to the learned; particularly to those whose zeal to authenticate them induced them to follow the aerial footsteps of the Hyppogriffs of Rabbi Benjamin. He affirms that the tomb of Ezekiel, with the library of the first and second temples, were to be seen in his time at a place on the banks of the river Euphrates; Wesselius of Groningen, and many other literati, travelled on purpose to Mesopotamia, to reach the tomb and examine the library, but the fairy treasures were never to be seen, nor even heard of!

The first on the list of impudent impostures is Annus of Viterbo, a Dominican, and master of the sacred palace under Alexander VI. He pretended he had discovered the genuine works of Sanchoniatho, Manetho, Berosus, and other works, of which only fragments are remaining. He published seventeen books of antiquities! but not having any ms to produce, though he declared he had found them buried in the earth, these literary fabrications occasioned great controversies; for the author died before he had made up his mind to a confession. At their first publication universal joy was diffused among the learned. Suspicion soon rose, and detection followed. However, as the forger never would acknowledge himself as such, it has been ingeniously conjectured that he himself was imposed on, rather than that he was the impostor; or, as in the case of Chatterton, possibly all may not be fictitious. It has been said that a great volume in ms anterior by two hundred years to the seventeen folios of Annus, exists in the Bibliothèque Colbertine, in which these pretended histories were to be read; but as Annus would never point out the sources of his seventeen folios, the whole is considered as a very wonderful imposture. I refer the reader to Tyrwhitt's Vindication of his Appendix to Rowley's or Chatterton's Poems, p. 140, for some curious observations, and some facts of literary imposture.

One of the most extraordinary literary impostures was that of one Joseph Vella, who, in 1794, was an adventurer in Sicily, and pretended that he possessed seventeen of the lost books of Livy in Arabic: he had received this literary treasure, he said, from a Frenchman who had purloined it from a shelf in St Sophia's church at Constantinople. As many of the Greek and Roman classics have been translated by the Arabians, and many were first known in Europe in their Arabic dress, there was nothing improbable in one part of his story. He was urged to publish these long-desired books; and Lady Spencer, then in Italy, offered to defray the expenses. He had the effrontery, by way of specimen, to edit an Italian translation of the sixtieth book, but that book took up no more than one octavo page! A professor of Oriental literature in Prussia introduced it in his work, never suspecting the fraud; it proved to be nothing more than the epitome of Florus. He also gave out that he possessed a code which he had picked up in the abbey of St Martin, containing the ancient history of Sicily, in the Arabic period comprehending above two hundred years; and of which ages, their own historians were entirely deficient in knowledge. Vella declared he had a genuine official correspondence between the Arabian governors of Sicily and their superiors in Africa, from the first landing of the Arabians in that island. Vella was now loaded with honours and pensions! It is true he showed Arabic ms, which, however, did not contain a syllable of what he said. He pretended he was in continual correspondence with friends at Morocco and elsewhere. The King of Naples furnished him with money to assist his researches. Four volumes in quarto were at length published! Vella had the adroitness to change the Arabic ms he possessed, which entirely related to Mahomet, to matters relative to Sicily; he bestowed several weeks labour to disfigure the whole, altering page for page, line for line, and word for word, but interspersed numberless dots, strokes, and flourishes, so that when he published a facsimile, every one admired the learning of Vella, who could translate what no one else could read. He complained he had lost an eye in this minute labour; and every one thought his pension ought to have been increased. Every thing prospered about him, except his eye, which some thought was not so bad neither. It was at length discovered by his blunders, &c, that the whole was a forgery; though it had now been patronized, translated, and extracted throughout Europe. When this ms was examined by an Orientalist, it was discovered to be nothing but a history of Mahomet and his family. Vella was condemned to imprisonment.

The Spanish antiquary, Medina Conde, in order to favour the pretensions of the church in a great lawsuit, forged deeds and inscriptions, which he buried in the ground, where he knew they would shortly be dug up. Upon their being found, he published engravings of them and gave explanations of their unknown characters, making them out to be so many authentic proofs and evidences of the contested assumptions of the clergy.

The Morocco ambassador purchased of him a copper bracelet of Fatima, which Medina proved by the Arabic inscription and many certificates to be genuine, and found among the ruins of the Alhambra, with other treasures of its last king, who had hid them there in hope of better days. This famous bracelet turned out afterwards to be the work of Medina's own hands, and made out of an old brass candlestick!

George Psalmanazer, to whose labours we owe much of the great Universal History, exceeded in powers of deception any of the great impostors of learning. His island of Formosa was an illusion eminently bold, and maintained with as much felicity as erudition; and great must have been that erudition which could form a pretended language and its grammar, and fertile the genius which could invent the history of an unknown people; it is said that the deception was only satisfactorily ascertained by his own penitential confession; he had defied and baffled the most learned. The literary impostor Lauder had much more audacity than ingenuity, and he died contemned by all the world. Ireland's Shakspeare served to show that commentators are not blessed, necessarily, with an interior and unerring tact. Genius and learning are ill directed in forming literary impostures, but at least they must be distinguished from the fabrications of ordinary impostors.

A singular forgery was practised on Captain Wilford by a learned Hindoo, who, to ingratiate himself and his studies with the too zealous and pious European, contrived among other attempts to give the history of Noah and his three sons, in his 'Purana,' under the designation of Satyavrata. Captain Wilford having read the passage, transcribed it for Sir William Jones, who translated it as a curious extract; the whole was an interpolation by the dextrous introduction of a forged sheet, discoloured and prepared for the purpose of deception, and which, having served his purpose for the moment, was afterwards withdrawn. As books in India are not bound, it is not difficult to introduce loose leaves. To confirm his various impostures this learned forger had the patience to write two voluminous sections, in which he connected all the legends together in the style of the Puranas, consisting of 12,000 lines. When Captain Wilford resolved to collate the manuscript with others, the learned Hindoo began to disfigure his own manuscript, the captain's, and those of the college, by erasing the name of the country and substituting that of Egypt. With as much pains, and with a more honourable direction, our Hindoo Lauder might have immortalized his inverted invention.

We have authors who sold their names to be prefixed to works they never read; or, on the contrary, have prefixed the names of others to their own writing. Sir John Hill owned to a friend once when he fell sick, that he had over-fatigued himself with writing seven works at once! One of which was on architecture, and another on cookery! This hero once contracted to translate Swammerdam's work on insects for fifty guineas. After the agreement with the bookseller, he perfectly recollected that he did not understand a single word of the Dutch language! nor did there exist a French translation. The work however was not the less done for this small obstacle. Sir John bargained with another translator for twenty-five guineas. The second translator was precisely in the same situation as the first; as ignorant, though not so well paid as the knight. He rebargained with a third, who perfectly understood his original, for twelve guineas! So that the translators who could not translate feasted on venison and turtle, while the modest drudge, whose name never appeared to the world, broke in patience his daily bread! The craft of authorship has many mysteries. The great patriarch and primeval dealer in English literature, is said to have been Robert Green, one of the most facetious, profligate, and indefatigable of the scribbler's family. He laid the foundation of a new dynasty of literary emperors. The first act by which he proved his claim to the throne of Grub-street has served as a model to his numerous successors—it was an amul dextrous trick! Green sold his 'Orlando Furioso' to twelve different theatres, and is supposed to have been the first author in English literary history who wrote as a brad or as crabb'd Anthony Wood phrases it in the language of celibacy and cynicism, 'he wrote to maintain his wife, as that high and loose course of living which poets general follow.' With a drop still sweeter, old Anthony describes Gayton, another worthy; 'he came up to London to live in a shirking condition, and wrote trile things merely to get bread to sustain him, and his wife.' The Hermit Anthony seems to have had a mortal antipathy against the Eves literary men.

CARDINAL RICHELIEU.

The present anecdote concerning Cardinal Richelieu may serve to teach the man of letters how he deals of criticism to the great, when they ask his opinion of manuscripts, be they in verse or prose.

The cardinal placed in a gallery of his palace the portraits of several illustrious men, and he was desirous of composing the inscriptions to be placed round the portrait. That he intended for Montluc, the marshal of France was conceived in these terms: 'Multa fecit, plura scripsit tamen magnus fuit. He showed it without mentioning the author to Bourbon, the royal professor in Greek, and asked his opinion concerning it; He reproached it, as considered that the Latin was much in the style of the breviary; and, if it had concluded with an alleluyah, would serve for an anthem to the magnificent. The cardinal agreed with the severity of his strictures; and even acknowledged the discernment of the professor; 'fur,' he said, 'it is really written by a priest.' But however it might approve of Bourbon's critical powers, he punished without mercy his ingenuity. The pension his majesty had bestowed on him was withheld the next year.

The cardinal was one of those ambitious men who foolishly attempt to rival every kind of genius; and seeing himself constantly disappointed, he envied, with all the venom of rancour, those talents which are so frequently the all that men of genius possess.

He was jealous of Balzac's splendid reputation; and offered the elder Heinsius ten thousand crowns to write criticism which should ridicule his elaborate compositions. This Heinsius refused, because Salmasius threatened to revenge Balzac on his Herodes infanticida.

He attempted to rival the reputation of Corneille's 'Cid' by opposing to it one of the most ridiculous dramatic productions; it was the allegorical tragedy called 'Europe' in which the minister had congregated the four quarters of the world! Much political matter was thrown together, divided into scenes and acts. There are appended to it key of the Dramatis personae and of the allegories. In this tragedy, France represents France; Iber, Spain; Parthia, hope, Naples, &c. and these have their attendants:—Lilia (alluding to the French lilies) is the servant of France; while Hispale is the confidant of Iber. But the key to the allegories is much more copious:—Albione signifies England; three knots of the hair of Austrasia, mean the towns of Clermont, Stenay, and Jamet, these places once belonging to Lorraine. A box of diamonds of Austrasia, is the town of Nancy, belonging once to the dukes of Lorraine. The key of Iberia's great porch is Perpignan, which France took from Spain; and in this manner is this sublime tragedy composed! When he first sent it anonymously to the French Academy it was reprobated. He then tore it in rage, and scattered it about his study. Towards evening like another Medea lamenting over the members of her own children, he and his secretary passed the night in uniting the scattered limbs. He then ventured to show himself and having pretended to correct this incorrigible tragedy the submissive Academy retracted their censures, but the public pronounced its melancholy fate on its first representation. This lamentable tragedy was intended to thwart Corneille's 'Cid.' Enraged at its success, Richelieu even commanded the academy to publish a severe critique of it well known in French literature. Boileau on this occasion has these two well-turned verses:—

'En vain, contre le Cid, un ministre as ligne;
Tout Paris, pour Chimene, a les yeux de Rodrigue.'

To oppose the Cid, in vain the statesman tries
All Paris, for Chimene, has Roderick's eyes.

It is said that in consequence of the fall of this tragedy the French custom is derived of securing a number of hands to applaud their pieces at their first representations. And the following droll anecdote concerning this droll tragedy in Beauchamp's Recherches sur le Theatre.

The minister after the ill success of his tragedy retired accompanied the same evening to his country house at And. He then sent for his favourite Desmaretz, who was supper with his friend Petit. Desmaretz, conjecturing that the interview would be stormy, begged his friend to accompany him.

'Well,' said the cardinal as soon as he saw them, 'the French will never possess a taste for what is lofty: they have not to have relished my tragedy.'—My lord answered Petit, 'it is not the fault of the piece, which is so admirable, but that of the players.' Did not your eminence perceive that not only they knew not their parts, but that they were all drunk?'—Really,' replied the cardinal, something pleased, 'I observed they acted it dreadfully ill.'

Desmaretz and Petit returned to Paris, flew directly to the players to plan a new mode of performance, which was to secure a number of spectators; so that at the second representation bursts of applause were frequently heard!

Richelieu had another singular vanity of closely imitating Cardinal Ximenes. Pliny was not a more servile imitator of Cicero. Marville tells us that, like Ximenes, he placed himself at the head of an army: like him he degraded princes and nobles; and like him rendered himself formidable to all Europe. And because Ximenes had established schools of theology, Richelieu undertook likewise to raise the notice the schools of the Sorbonne. And, to conclude, Ximenes had written several theological treatises, our cardinal was also desirous of leaving posterity various polemical works. But his gallantries rendered him more ridiculous. Always in ill health, this miserable lover and gaw cardinal would, in a freak of love, dress himself with rare feather in his cap and sword by his side. He was here hurt by a filthy nickname given him by the queen of Louis XIII than even by the hiss of theatres and the critical condemnation of academies.

Cardinal Richelieu was assuredly a great political genius. Sir William Temple observes, that he instituted the French Academy to give employment to the wits, and to hinder them from inspecting too narrowly into his politics and his administration. It is believed that the Marshal de Gramont lost an important battle by the orders of the cardinal; that in this critical conjuncture of affairs his majesty, who was inclined to dismiss him, could not then absolutely, do without him.

Vanity in this cardinal levelled a great genius. He who should attempt to display universal excellence will be impelled to practise meannesses, and to act follies which, if he has the least sensibility, must occasion him many a pang and many a blush.

ARISTOTLE AND PLATO.

No philosopher has been so much praised and censured as Aristotle: but he had this advantage, of which some of the most eminent scholars have been deprived, that he enjoyed during his life a splendid reputation. Philip of Macedonia must have felt a strong conviction of his merit when he wrote to him on the birth of Alexander:—'I receive from the gods this day a son; but I thank them not so much for the favour of his birth, as his having come into the world at a time when you can have the care of his education; and that through you he will be rendered worthy of being my son.'

Dionæus Laertius describes the person of the stagyrite. His eyes were small, his voice hoarse, and his legs lank. He stammered, was fond of a magnificent dress, and wore costly rags. He had a mistress whom he loved passionately, and for whom he frequently acted inconsistently with the philosophic character; a thing as common with philosophers as with other men. Aristotle had nothing of the austerity of the philosopher, though his works are so austere: he was open, pleasant, and even charming in his conversation; fiery and volatile in his pleasures; magnificent in his dress. He is described as fierce, disdainful, and sarcastic. He joined to a taste for profound erudition that of an elegant dissipation. His passion for luxury occasioned him such expenses when he was young that he consumed all his property. Laertius has preserved the will of Aristotle, which is curious. The chief part turns on the future welfare and marriage of his daughter. 'If, after my death she chooses to marry, the executors will be careful she marries no person of an inferior rank. If she resides at Chalcis, she shall occupy the apartment contiguous to the garden; if she chooses Stagira, she shall reside in the house of my father, and my executors shall furnish either of those places she fixes on.'

Aristotle had studied under the divine Plato; and the disciple and the master could not possibly agree in their doctrines: they were of opposite tastes and talents. Plato was the chief of the academic sect, and Aristotle of the peripatetic. Plato was simple, modest, frugal, and of austere manners; a good friend and a zealous citizen, but a theoretical politician: a lover indeed of benevolence, and desirous of diffusing it amongst men, but knowing little of them as we find them; his 'republic' is as chimerical as Rousseau's ideas, or Sir Thomas More's Utopia. Rapin, the critic, has sketched an ingenious parallel of these two celebrated philosophers.

The genius of Plato is more polished, and that of Aristotle more vast and profound. Plato has a lively and teeming imagination; fertile in invention, in ideas, in expressions, and in figures; displaying a thousand different turns, a thousand new colours, all agreeable to their subject; but after all it is nothing more than imagination. Aristotle is hard and dry in all he says, but what he says is all reason, though it is expressed dryly: his diction, pure as it is, has something uncommonly austere; and his obscurities, natural or affected, disgust and fatigue his readers. Plato is equally delicate in his thoughts and in his expressions. Aristotle, though he may be more natural, has not any delicacy: his style is simple and equal, but close and nervous; that of Plato is grand and elevated, but loose and diffuse. Plato always says more than he should say: Aristotle never says enough, and leaves the reader always to think more than he says. The one surprises the mind, and charms it by a flowery and sparkling character: the other illuminates and instructs it by a just and solid method. Plato communicates something of genius by the fecundity of his own; and Aristotle something of judgment and reason by that impression of good sense which appears in all he says. In a word, Plato frequently only thinks to express himself well; and Aristotle only thinks to think justly.

An interesting anecdote is related of these philosophers. Aristotle became the rival of Plato. Literary disputes long subsisted betwixt them. The disciple ridiculed his master, and the master treated contemptuously his disciple. To make this superiority manifest, Aristotle wished for a regular disputation before an audience where erudition and reason might prevail; but this satisfaction was denied.

Plato was always surrounded by his scholars, who took a lively interest in his glory. Three of these he taught to rival Aristotle, and it became their mutual interest to depreciate his merits. Unfortunately, one day Plato found himself in his school without these three favourite scholars. Aristotle flies to him—a crowd gathers and enters with him. The idol whose oracles they wished to overturn was presented to them. He was then a respectable old man, the weight of whose years had enfeebled his memory. The combat was not long. Some rapid sophisms embarrassed Plato. He saw himself surrounded by the inevitable traps of the subtlety logician. Vanquished, he reproached his ancient scholar by a beautiful figure:—'He has kicked against us as a colt against his mother.'

Soon after this humiliating adventure he ceased to give public lectures. Aristotle remained master in the field of battle. He raised a school, and devoted himself to render it the most famous in Greece. But the three favourite scholars of Plato, zealous to avenge the cause of their master, and to make amends for their imprudence in having quitted him, armed themselves against the usurper. Xenocrates, the most ardent of the three, attacked Aristotle, confounded the logician, and re-established Plato in all his rights. Since that time the academic and peripatetic sects, animated by the spirits of their several chiefs, avowed an eternal hostility. In what manner his works have descended to us has been told at page 15 of this volume. Aristotle having declaimed irreverently of the gods, and dreading the fate of Socrates, wished to retire from Athens. In a beautiful manner he pointed out his successor. There were two rivals in his schools: Menodæmus the Rhodian, and Theophrastus the Lesbian. Alluding delicately to his own critical situation, he told his assembled scholars that the wine he was accustomed to drink was injurious to him, and he desired them to bring the wines of Rhodes and Lesbos. He then tasted both, and declared they both did honour to their soil, each being excellent, though different in quality. The Rhodian wine is the strongest, but the Lesbian is the sweetest, and that he himself preferred it. Thus his ingenuity pointed out his favourite Theophrastus, the author of the 'Characters,' for his successor.

ABELARD AND ELOISA.

Abelard, so famous for his writings and his amours with Eloisa, ranks among the heretics for opinions concerning the Trinity! His superior genius probably made him appear so culpable in the eyes of his enemies. The cabal formed against him disturbed the earlier part of his life with a thousand persecutions, till at length they persuaded Bernard, his old friend, but who had now turned saint, that poor Abelard was what their malice described him to be. Bernard, inflamed against him, condemned unheard the unfortunate scholar. But it is remarkable that the book which was burnt as unorthodox, and as the composition of Abelard, was in fact written by Peter Lombard, bishop of Paris; a work which has since been canonized in the Sorbonne, and on which the scholastic theology is founded. The objectionable passage is an illustration of the Trinity by the nature of a syllogism.—'As (says he) the three propositions of a syllogism form but one truth, so the Father and Son constitute but one essence. The major represents the Father, the minor the Son, and the conclusion the Holy Ghost.' It is curious to add that Bernard himself has explained this mystical union precisely in the same manner, and equally clear. 'The understanding,' says this saint, 'is the image of God. We find it consists of three parts: memory, intelligence and will. To memory, we attribute all which we know, without cogitation; to intelligence, all truths we discover which have not been deposited by memory. By memory, we resemble the Father; by intelligence the Son, and by will the Holy Ghost.' Bernard's Lib. de Anima, Cap. I, Num. 6, quoted in the 'Mem. Secretes de la Republique des Lettres.' We may add also, that because Abelard, in the warmth of honest indignation, had reproved the monks of St Denis, in France, and St Gildas De Ruys, in Bretagne, for the horrid incontinence of their lives, they joined his enemies, and assisted to smother the life of this ingenious scholar; who perhaps was guilty of no other crime than that of feeling too sensibly an attachment to one who not only possessed the enchanting attractions of the softer sex, but what indeed is very unusual, a congeniality of disposition, and an enthusiasm of imagination.

'Is it, in heaven, a crime to love too well?'

It appears by a letter of Peter de Cluny to Eloisa, that she had solicited for Abelard's absolution. The abbot gave it to her. It runs thus: 'Ego Petrus Cluniacensis Abbas, qui Petrum Abelardum in monachum Cluniacensem recepi, et corpus ejus furim delatum Heloise abbatisse et moniali Paracleti concessi, auctoritate omnipotentis Dei et omnium sanctorum absolvo pum pro officio ob omnibus peccatis suis.

An ancient chronicle of Tours records that when they deposited the body of the Abbess Eloisa in the tomb of her lover Peter Abelard, who had been there interred twenty years, this faithful husband raised his arms, stretched them, and closely embraced his beloved Eloisa. This poetic fiction was invented to sanctify, by a miracle, the frailties of their youthful days. This is not wonderful;—but it is strange that Du Chesne, the father of French history, not only relates this legendary tale of the ancient chroniclers, but gives it as an incident well authenticated, and maintains its possibility by various other examples. Such fanciful incidents once not only embellished poetry, but enlivened history.

Bayle tells us that billets doux and amorous verses are two powerful machines to employ in the assaults of love; particularly when the passionate songs the poetical lover composes are sung by himself. This secret was well known to the elegant Abelard. Abelard so touched the sensible heart of Eloisa, and infused such fire into her frame, by employing his fine pen and his fine voice, that the poor woman never recovered from the attack. She herself informs us that he displayed two qualities which are rarely found in philosophers, and by which he could instantly win the affections of the female;—he wrote and sang finely. He composed love-verses so beautiful, and songs so agreeably, as well for the words as the airs, that all the world got them by heart, and the name of his mistress was spread from province to province.

What a gratification to the enthusiastic, the amorous the vain Eloisa! of whom Lord Lyttleton in his curious life of Henry II, observes, that had she not been compelled to read the fathers and the legends in a nunnery, but had been suffered to improve her genius by a continual application to polite literature, from what appears in her letters she would have excelled any man of that age.

Eloisa, I suspect, however, would have proved but a very indifferent polemic. She seems to have had a certain delicacy in her manners which rather belongs to the fine lady. We cannot but smile at an observation of hers on the apostles which we find in her letters. 'We read that the apostles, even in the company of their masters were so rustic and ill bred that, regardless of common decorum, as they passed through the corn fields they plucked the ears and ate them like children. Nor did they wash their hands before they sat down to table. To eat with unwashed hands, said our Saviour to those who were offended, doth not defile a man.'

It is on the misconception of the mild apologetical rep of Jesus, indeed, that religious fanatics have really considered that to be careless of their dress, and not to fire themselves from filth and slovenliness, is an act of piety just as the late political fanatics, who thought that republicanism consisted in the most offensive filthiness. On this principle, that it is saintlike to go dirty, ragged, and slovenly, says Bishop Lavington, 'enthusiasm of the Methodist and Papists,' how piously did Whitfield take care of his outward man, who in his journal writes, 'My apparel was mean—thought it unbecoming a penitent to have powdered hair—I wore woolen gloves, a patched gown, and dirty shoes!'

After an injury, not less cruel than humiliating, Abelard raises the school of the Paraclete; with what enthusiasm he followed to that desert! His scholars in crowds hasten to their adored master. They cover their mud sheds with the branches of trees. They do not want to sleep under better roofs, provided they remain by the side of their unfortunate master. How lively must have been their taste for study! It formed their solitary passion, and the love of glory was gratified even in that desert.

The two reprehensible lines in Pope's Eloisa, too celebrated among certain of its readers.

'Not Caesar's empress would I deign to prove;

'No,—make me mistress to the man I love!'

are, however, found in her original letters. The author of that ancient work, 'The Romaunt of the Rose,' has given it thus naively: a specimen of the natural style in those days.

Re le'empereur, qui est a Rome
Souz qui doyvent estre tout homme,
Me daignoit prendre pour sa femme,
Et me faire du monde dame;
Si vouldroye je mieux, di-e-elle
Et Dieu en tesmoing en appelle
Etre sa Putaine appelee
Qu'etre emperiere couronnee.

PHRYGONOMY.

A very extraordinary physiognomical anecdote has been given by De la Place in his 'Pieces interessantes et peu connues,' v. i, p. 8.

A friend assured him that he had seen a voluminous and secret correspondence which had been carried on between Louis XIV, and his favourite physician De la Chambre on this science: the faith of the monarch seems to have been great, and the purpose to which the correspondences tended was extraordinary indeed, and perhaps scarcely credible. Who will believe that Louis XIV was so convinced of that talent which De la Chambre attributed to himself, of deciding merely by the physiognomy of persons not only on the real bent of their character, but to what employment they were adapted, that the king entered into a secret correspondence to obtain the critical notices of his physiognomist? That Louis XIV should have pursued this system, undetected by his own courtiers, is also singular; but it appears by this correspondence that this art positively swayed him in his choice of officers and favourites. On one of the backs of those letters De la Chambre had written, 'If I die before his majesty, he will incur great risk of making many an unfortunate choice.'

This collection of physiognomical correspondence, if it does really exist, would form a curious publication; we have heard nothing of it. De la Chambre was an enthusiastic physiognomist, as appears by his works; 'The Characters of the Passions,' four volumes in quarto; 'The Art of knowing Mankind'; and 'The Knowledge of Animals.' Lavater quotes his 'Vote and Interest' in favour of his favourite Science. It is, however, curious to add, that Philip, Earl of Pembroke, under James I, had formed a particular collection of Portraits, with a view to physiognomical studies. According to Evelyn on Medals, p. 302, such was his sagacity in discovering the characters and dispositions of men by their countenances, that James I made so little use of his extraordinary talent on the first arrival of ambassadors at court.

The following physiological definition of PHYSIOGNOMY is extracted from a publication by Dr Gwither, of the year 1804, which, dropping his history of 'the Animal Spirits,' is curious.

'Soft wax cannot receive more various and numerous impressions than are imprinted on a man's face by objects moving his affections; and not only the objects themselves have this power, but also the very images or ideas; that is to say, any thing that puts the animal spirits into the same motion that the object present did, will have the same effect with the object. To prove the first, let one observe a man's face looking on a pitiful object, then a ridiculous, then a strange, then on a terrible or dangerous object, and so forth. For the second, that ideas have the same effect with the object, dreams confirm too often.

'The manner I conceive to be thus: The animal spirits moved in the sensory by an object, continue their motion to the brain; whence the motion is propagated to this or that particular part of the body, as is most suitable to the design of its creation; having first made an alteration in the fact by its nerves, especially by the pathetic and oculorum nerve securing its many muscles, as the dial-plate to that suspended piece of clock-work which shows what is to be expected next from the striking part. Not that I think the motion of the spirits in the sensory continued by the impression of the object all the way, as from a finger to the foot: I know it too weak, though the tenseness of the nerves favours it. But I conceive it done in the medulla of the brain, where is the common stock of spirits; as in an organ, whose pipes being uncovered, the air rushes into them; but the keys let go, is stopped again. Now, if by repeated acts or frequent entertaining of a favourite idea, of a passion or vice, which natural temperament has hurried one to, or custom dragged, the face is so often put into that posture which attends such acts, that the animal spirits find such latent passages into its nerves, that it is sometimes unalterably set: as the Indian religious are by long continuing in strange posture in their pagoda. But most commonly such a habit is contracted, that it falls insensibly into that posture when some present object does not obliterate that more natural impression by a new, or dissimulation hide it.

'Hence it is that we see great drinkers with eyes generally set towards the nose, the adductile muscles being often employed to let them see their loved liquor in the glass at the time of drinking; which were therefore called hibitory. Lascivious persons are remarkable for the oculorum nerve petulantia, as Petronius calls it. From this also we may solve the Quaker's expecting face, waiting for the pretended spirit; and the melancholy face of the securaries; the studious face of men of great application of mind; revengeful and bloody men, like executioners in the act; and though scarce in a man a while pass for wisdom, yet, sooner or later, Saint Martin peeps through the disguise to undo all. A changeable face I have observed to show a changeable mind. But I would by no means have what has been said understood as without exception: for I doubt not but sometimes there are found men with great and virtuous souls under very unpromising outsides.'

The great Prince of Conde was very expert in a sort of physiognomy which showed the peculiar habits, motions, and postures of familiar life and mechanical employments. He would sometimes lay wagers with his friends, that he would guess, upon the Point Neuf, what trade persons were of that passed by, from their walk and air.

CHARACTERS DESCRIBED BY MUSICAL NOTES.

The idea of describing characters under the names of Musical Instruments has been already displayed in two most pleasing papers which embellish the Teller, written by Addison. He dwells on this idea with uncommon success. It has been applauded for its originality; and in the general preface to that work, those papers are distinguished for their felicity of imagination. The following paper was published in the year 1700, in a volume of 'Philosophical Transactions and Collections,' and the two numbers of Addison in the year 1710. It is probable that this inimitable writer borrowed the seminal hint from his work.

'A conjecture at dispositions from the modulations of the voice.

'Sitting in some company, and having been but a little before musical, I chanced to take notice, that in ordinary discourse words were spoken in perfect notes; and that some of the company used eighths, some fifths, some thirds; and that his discourse which was most pleasing, his words, as to their tone, consisted most of concord, and were of disconcord as such as made up harmony. The same person was the most affable, pleasant, and best natured in the company. This suggests a reason why many discourses which one hears with much pleasure, when they come to be read scarcely seem the same things.

'From this difference of Music in Speech, we may conjecture that of TEMPER. We know, the Doric mood sounds gravity and sobriety; the Lydian, burlesqueness and freedom; the Æolic, sweet stiffness and quiet composure; the Phrygian, jollity and youthful levity; the Ionic is a stiller of storms and disturbances arising from passion. And why may not we reasonably suppose that those whose speech naturally runs into the notes peculiar to any of these moods, are likewise in nature hereto congenious? C Fa ut may show me to be of an ordinary capacity, though good disposition. G Sol re ut, to be peevish and effeminate. Flats, a manly or melancholic sadness. He who hath a voice which will in some measure agree with all cliffs, to be of good parts, and fit for variety of employments, yet somewhat of an inconsistent nature. Likewise from the TIMBRE; so semibreves may speak a temper dull and phlegmatic; minims, grave and serious; crotchets, a prompt wit; quavers, vehemency of passion, and scolds use them. Semi-brief-rest, may denote one either stupid or fuller of thoughts than he can utter; minim-rest, one that deliberates; creschet-rest, one in a passion. So that from the natural use of MOOD, NOTE, and TIME, we may collect DISPOSITIONS.'

MILTON.

It is painful to observe the acrimony which the most eminent scholars have infused frequently in their controversial writings. The politeness of the present times has in some degree softened the malignity of the man, in the dignity of the author, but this is by no means an irrevocable law.

It is said not to be honourable to literature to revive such controversies; and a work entitled 'Querelles Litteraires,' when it first appeared, excited loud murmurs. But it has its moral; like showing the drunkard to a youth that he may turn aside disgusted with ebriety. Must we suppose that men of letters are exempt from the human passions? Their sensibility, on the contrary, is more irritable than that of others. To observe the ridiculous attitudes in which great men appear, when they employ the style of the fish-market, may be one great means of restraining that ferocious pride often breaking out in the republic of letters. Johnson at least appears to have entertained the same opinion; for he thought proper to republish the low invective of Dryden against Settle; and since I have published my 'Quarrels of Authors,' it becomes me to say no more.

The celebrated controversy of Salmasius continued by Morus with Milton—the first the pleader of King Charles, the latter the advocate of the people—was of that magnitude, that all Europe took a part in the paper-war of these two great men. The answer of Milton, who perfectly massacred Salmasius, is now read but by the few. Whatever is addressed to the times, however great may be its merit, is doomed to perish with the times; yet on these pages the philosopher will not contemplate in vain.

It will form no uninteresting article to gather a few of the rhetorical words, for flowers we cannot well call them, with which they mutually presented each other. Their rancour was at least equal to their erudition, the two most learned antagonists of a learned age!

Salmasius was a man of vast erudition, but no taste. His writings are learned; but sometimes ridiculous. He called his work Defensio Regia, Defence of Kings. The opening of this work provokes a laugh. 'Englishmen! who toss the heads of kings as so many tennis-balls; who play with crowns as if they were bows; who look upon scriptures as so many crooks.'

That the deformity of the body is an idea we attach to the deformity of the mind, the vulgar must acknowledge; but surely it is unpardonable in the enlightened philosopher thus to compare the crookedness of corporeal matter with the rectitude of the intellect: yet Meibourne and Dennis, the last, a formidable critic, have frequently considered, that comparing Dryden and Pope to whatever the eye turned from with displeasure was very good argument to lower their literary abilities. Salmasius seems also to have entertained this idea, though his spies in England gave him wrong information; or, possibly, he only drew the figure of his own distempered imagination.

Salmasius sometimes reproaches Milton as being but a puny piece of man; an humunculus, a dwarf deprived of the human figure, a bloodless being composed of nothing but skin and bone; a contemptible pedagogue, fit only to flog his boys; and sometimes elevating the ardour of his mind into a poetic frenzy, he applies to him the words of Virgil, 'Monstrum horrendum, informe, ingens, cui lumen ademptum.' Our great poet thought this senseless declamation merited a serious refutation; perhaps he did not wish to appear despicable in the eyes of the ladies; and he would not be silent on the subject, he says, lest any one should consider him as the credulous Spaniards are made to believe by their priests, that a heretic is a kind of rhinoceros or a dog-headed monster. Milton says, that he does not think any one ever considered him as unbeautiful; that his size rather approaches mediocrity than the diminutive; that he still felt the same courage and the same strength which he possessed when young, when, with his sword, he felt no difficulty to combat with men more robust than himself; that his face, far from being pale, emaciated, and wrinkled, was sufficiently creditable to him; for though he had passed his fortieth year, he was in all other respects ten years younger. And very pathetically he adds, 'that even his eyes, blind as they are, are unblemished in their appearance; in this instance alone, and much against my inclination, I am a deceiver!'

Morus, in his Epistle dedicatory of his Regii Sanguinis Clamor, compares Milton to a hangman; his disordered vision to the blindness of his soul, and vomits forth his venom.

When Salmasius found that his strictures on the person of Milton were false, and that on the contrary it was uncommonly beautiful, he then turned his battery against those graces with which Nature had so liberally adorned his adversary. And it is now that he seems to have laid no restriction on his pen; but raging with the irritation of Milton's success, he throws out the blackest calumnies, and the most infamous aspersions.

It must be observed, when Milton first proposed to answer Salmasius he had lost the use of one of his eyes; and his physicians declared, that if he applied himself to the controversy, the other would likewise close for ever! His patriotism was not to be baffled but with life itself. Unhappily, the predictions of his physicians took place! Thus a learned man in the occupations of study falls blind; a circumstance even now not read without sympathy. Salmasius considers it as one from which he may draw caustic ridicule and satiric severity.

Salmasius glories that Milton lost his health and his eyes in answering his apology for King Charles! He does not now reproach him with natural deformities; but he malignantly sympathizes with him, that he now no more is in possession of that beauty which rendered him so amiable during his residence in Italy. He speaks more plainly in a following page; and in a word, would blacken the austere virtues of Milton with a crime too infamous to name.

Impartiality of criticism obliges us to confess that Milton was not destitute of rancour. When he was told that his adversary boasted he had occasioned the loss of his eyes, he answered, with the ferocity of the irritated puritan—'And I shall cost him his life!' A prediction which was soon after verified: for Christina, Queen of Sweden, withdrew her patronage from Salmasius, and sided with Milton. The universal neglect the proud scholar felt, hastened his death in the course of a twelvemonth.

How the greatness of Milton's mind was degraded! He actually condescended to enter in a correspondence in Holland to obtain little scandalous anecdotes of his miserable adversary Morus, and deigned to adulate the unworthy Christina of Sweden, because she had expressed herself favourably on his 'Defence.' Of late years we have had but too many instances of this worst of passions; the mutual pathos of politics!

ORIGIN OF NEWSPAPERS.

We are indebted to the Italians for the idea of newspapers. The title of their gazettes was perhaps derived from gazera, a magpie or chatterer; or more probably from farthing coin, peculiar to the city of Venice, called gazetta which was the common price of the newspapers. Another etymologist is for deriving it from the Latin gaza, which would colloquially lengthen into gazetta, and signify a little treasury of news. The Spanish derive it from the Led gaza, and likewise their gazetero and our gazetteer for writer of the gazette, and what is peculiar to themselves gazetista, for a lover of the gazette.

Newspapers then took their birth in that principal land of modern politicians, Italy, and under the government of that aristocratic republic Venice. The first paper was Venetian one, and only monthly; but it was merely the newspaper of the government. Other governments afterwards adopted the Venetian plan of a newspaper, with the Venetian name; from a solitary government gazette an inundation of newspapers has burst upon us.

Mr George Chalmers, in his life of Ruddiman, gives curious particulars of these Venetian gazettes. 'A jealous government did not allow a printed newspaper; and the Venetian gazetta continued long after the invention of printing to the close of the sixteenth century, and even to our own days, to be distributed in manuscript.' In the Magliabechian library at Florence are thirty volumes of Venetian gazettes all in manuscript.

Those who first wrote newspapers, were called by the Italians menantes; because, says Vossius, they intended commonly by these loose papers to spread about defamatory reflections, and were therefore prohibited in Italy by Gregory XIII, by a particular bull, under the name of menantes, from the Latin minantes, threatening. Menantes however, derives it from the Italian menare, which signifies to lead at large, or spread afar.

Mr Chalmers discovers in England the first newspaper. It may gratify national pride, says he, to be told that mankind are indebted to the wisdom of Elizabeth and the prudence of Burleigh for the first newspaper. The epoch of the Spanish Armada is also the epoch of a genuine newspaper. In the British Museum are several newspapers which were printed while the Spanish fleet was in the English Channel during the year 1588. It was a wise policy to prevent, during a moment of general anxiety, the danger of false reports, by publishing real information. The earliest newspaper is entitled 'The English Mercury' which by authority was printed at London by her highnesses printer, 1588.' These were, however, but extraordinary gazettes, not regularly published. In this obscure origin they were skillfully directed by the policy of the great statesman Burleigh, who to inflame the national feeling, gives an extract of a letter from Madrid which speaks of putting the queen to death, and the instruments of torture on board the Spanish fleet.

Mr Chalmers has exultingly taken down these patriarchal newspapers, covered with the dust of two centuries.

The first newspaper in the collection of the British Museum is marked No 50, and is in Roman, not in black letter. It contains the usual articles of news like the London Gazette of the present day. In that curious paper, there are news dated from Whitehall, on the 23d July, 1588. Under the date of July 26 there is the following notice: 'Yesterday the Scots ambassador being introduced to Sir Francis Walsingham, had a private audience of her majesty, to whom he delivered a letter from the king his master, containing the most cordial assurances of his resolution to adhere to her majesty's interests, and to those of the protestant religion. And it may not here be improper to take notice of a wise and spiritual saying of this young prince (he was twenty-two) to the queen's minister at his court, viz. That all the favour he did expect from the Spaniards was the courtesy of Polyphemus to Ulysses, as he the last devoured. Mr Chalmers defies the gazetteer of the present day to give a more decorous account of the introduction of a foreign minister. The aptness of King James' classical saying carried it from the newspaper into history. I must add, that in respect to his voiz no man has been more injured than this monarch. More pointed sentences are recorded of James I than perhaps of any prince, and yet, such is the delusion of that medium by which the popular eye sees things in this world, that he is usually considered as a mere royal pedant. I have entered more fully on this subject in an 'Inquiry of the literary and political character of James First.'

From one of these 'Mercuries' Mr Chalmers has given some advertisements of books, which run much like those of the present times, and exhibit a picture of the literature of those days. All these publications were 'imprinted and sold' by the queen's printers, Field and Barker.

1st. An admonition to the people of England, wherein are answered the slanderous untruths reproachfully uttered by Mar-prelate, and others of his brood, against the bishops and chief of the clergy.*

2dly. The copy of a letter sent to Don Bernardin Mendana, ambassador in France, for the king of Spain; declaring the state of England, &c. The second edition.

3dly. An exact journal of all passages at the siege of Bergen-op-Zoom. By an eye-witness.

4thly. Father Parson's coat well dusted; or short and witty animadversions on that infamous fardle of abuse and calumnies, entitled Leicester's Commonwealth.*

5thly. Elizabetha Triumphans, an heroic poem by James Askvi; with a declaration how her excellence was entertained at the royal course at Tilbury, and of the overthrow of the Spanish fleet.

Periodical papers seem first to have been more generally used by the English, during the civil wars of the usurper Cromwell, to disseminate amongst the people the sentiments of royalty or rebellion, according as their authors were disposed. Peter Heylin in the preface to his Cosmography mentions, that 'the affairs of each town or war were better presented to the reader in the Weekly News-books.' Hence we find some papers entitled News from Hall, Truths from York, Warranted Tidings from Ireland, &c. We find also 'The Scot's Dove' opposed to 'The Parliament Kite,' or 'The Secret Owl.'—Keener animosities produced keener titles: 'Heracitus ridens' found an antagonist in 'Democritus ridens,' and 'The weekly Discoverer' was shortly met by 'The discoverer stript naked.' 'Mercurius Britannicus' was grappled by Mercurius Masix, faithfully lashing all Scouts, Mercuries, Posts, Specs, and others.† Under all these names papers had appeared, and a Mercury was the prevailing title of these 'News-Books,' and the principles of the writer were generally shown by the additional epithet. We find an alarming number of these Mercuries, which, were the story not too long to tell, might excite some laughter; they present us with a very curious picture of those singular times.

Devoted to political purposes they soon became a public nuisance by serving as receptacles of party malice, and echoing to farthest ends of the kingdom the insolent voice of all factions. They set the minds of men more at variance, inflamed their tempers to a greater fierceness, and gave a keener edge to the sharpness of civil discord.

Such works will always find adventurers adapted to their scurrilous purposes, who neither want at times, either talents, or boldness, or wit, or argument. A vast crowd issued from the press, and are now to be found in a few private collections. They form a race of authors unknown to most readers of these times; the names of some of their chiefs however have just reached us, and in the minor chronicle of domestic literature I rank these notable heroes; Marchmont Needham, Sir John Birkenhead, and Sir Roger L'Estrange.

Marchmont Needham, the great patriarch of newspaper writers, was a man of versatile talents and more versatile politics; a bold adventurer, and most successful, because the most profligate of his tribe. We find an ample account of him in Anthony Wood. From college he came to London: was an usher in Merchant Taylor's school; then an under clerk in Gray's Inn; at length studied physic, and practised chemistry; and finally he was a captain, and in the words of honest Anthony, 'siding with the rout and scum of the people, he made them weekly sport by railing at all that was noble, in his Intelligence, called Mercurius Britannicus, wherein his endeavours were to sacrifice the fame of some lord, or any person of quality, and of the king himself, to the beast with many heads.' He soon became popular, and was known under the name of Captain Needham of Gray's Inn; and whatever he now wrote was uttered oracular. But whether from a slight imprisonment for aspersing Charles I, or some pique with his own party; he requested an audience on his knees with the king; reconciled himself to his majesty, and showed himself a violent royalist in his 'Mercurius Pragmaticus,' and galled the presbyterians with his wit and quips. Some time after, when the popular party prevailed, he was still further enlightened, and was got over by President Bradshaw, as easily as by Charles I. Our Mercurial writer became once more a virulent presbyterian, and lashed the royalists outrageously in his 'Mercurius Politicus,' at length on the return of Charles II, being now conscious, says our friend Anthony, that he might be in danger of the halter, once more he is said to have fled into Holland, waiting for an act of oblivion. For money given to a hungry courtier, Needham obtained his pardon under the great seal. He latterly practised as a physician among his party, but lived universally hated by the royalists, and now only committed harmless treasures with the College of Physicians, on whom he poured all that gall and vinegar which the government had suppressed from flowing through its natural channel.

The royalists were not without their Needham in the prompt activity of Sir John Birkenhead. In buffonery, keenness, and boldness, having been frequently imprisoned, he was not inferior, nor was he at times less an adventurer. His Mercurius Aulicus was devoted to the court, then at Oxford. But he was the fertile parent of numerous political pamphlets, which appears to abound in banter, wit, and satire. He had a promptness to seize on every temporary circumstance, and a facility in execution. His 'Paul's Church Yard' is a bantering pamphlet, containing fictitious titles of books and acts of parliament, reflecting on the mad reformers of these times. One of his poems is entitled 'The Jolt,' being written on the Protector having fallen off his own coach-box: Cromwell had received a present from the German Court Oldenburgh, of six German boxes, and attempted to drive them himself in Hyde Park, when this great political Phaeton met the accident, of which Sir John Birkenhead was not slow to comprehend the benefit, and hints how unfortunately for the country it turned out: Sir John was during the dominion of Cromwell an author by profession. After various imprisonments for his majesty's cause, says the venerable historian of English literature, already quoted, 'he lived by his wits, in helping young gentlemen out at dead lifts in making poems, songs, and epistles on and to their mistresses; as also in translating, and other petite employments.' He lived however after the Restoration to become one of the masters of requests, with a salary of 3000*l* a year. But he showed the baseness of his spirit, (says Anthony), by slighting those who had been his benefactors in his necessities.

Sir Roger L'Estrange among his rivals was esteemed as the most perfect model of political writing. The temper of the man was factious, and the compositions of the author seem to us coarse, yet I suspect they contain much idiomatic expression. His Esop's Fables are a curious specimen of familiar style. Queen Mary showed a due contempt of him after the Revolution, by this anagram;

Roger L'Estrange.
Lie strange Roger!

Such were the three patriarchs of newspapers. De Saint Foix, in his curious Essais historiques sur Paris, gives the origin of newspapers to France. Renaudot, a physician at Paris, to amuse his patients was a great collector of news; and he found by these means that he was more sought after than his more learned brethren. But as the seasons were not always sickly, and he had many hours not occupied by his patients, he reflected, after several years of assiduity given up to this singular employment, that he might turn it to a better account, by giving every week to his patients, who in this case were the public at large, some fugitive sheets which should contain the news of various countries. He obtained a privilege for this purpose in 1632.

At the Restoration the proceedings of parliament were interdicted to be published, unless by authority; and the first daily paper after the Revolution took the popular title of 'The Orange Intelligencer.'

In the reign of Queen Anne, there was but one daily paper: the others were weekly. Some attempted to introduce literary subjects, and others topics of a more general speculation. Sir Richard Steele formed the plan of his

* I have written the history of the Mar-prelate faction, in 'Guerres de Authors,' which our historians appears not to have known. The materials were suppressed by government, and not preserved even in our national depositories.

Tuller. He designed it to embrace the three provinces, of manners and morals, of literature, and of politics. The public were to be conducted insensibly into so different a tract from that to which they had been hitherto accustomed. Hence politics were admitted into his paper. But it remained for the chaster genius of Addison to banish this painful topic from his elegant pages. The writer in polite letters felt himself degraded by sinking into the diurnal narrators of political events, which so frequently originate in rumours and party fiction. From this time, newspapers and periodical literature became distinct works—at present, there seems to be an attempt to revive this union; it is a retrograde step for the independent dignity of literature.

TRIALS AND PROOFS OF GUILT IN SUPERSTITIOUS AGES.

The strange trials to which those suspected of guilt were put in the middle ages, conducted with many devout ceremonies, by the ministers of religion, were pronounced to be the judgments of God! The ordeal consisted of various kinds: walking blindfold amidst burning ploughshares passing through fires; holding in the hand a red hot bar; and plunging the arm into boiling water: the popular affirmation, 'I will put my hand into the fire to confirm this,' appears to be derived from this solemn custom of our rude ancestors. Challenging the accuser to single combat, when frequently the stoutest champion was allowed to supply their place; swallowing a morsel of consecrated bread; sinking or swimming in a river for witchcraft; or weighing a witch: stretching out the arms before the cross, till the champion soonest wearied dropped his arms, and lost his estate, which was decided by this very short chancery suit, called the judicium crucis. The bishop of Paris and the abbot of St Denis disputed about the patronage of a monastery: Pepin the short, not being able to decide on their confused claims, decreed one of these judgments of God, that of the cross. The bishop and abbot each chose a man, and both the men appeared in the chapel, where they stretched out their arms in the form of a cross. The spectators, more devout than the mob of the present day, but still the mob, were piously attentive, but betted however now for one man, now for the other, and critically watched the slightest motion of the arms. The bishop's man was first tired:—he let his arms fall, and ruined his patron's cause forever! Though sometimes these trials might be eluded by the artifice of the priest, numerous were the innocent victims who unquestionably suffered in these superstitious practices.

From the tenth to the twelfth century they were very common. Hildebert, bishop of Mans, being accused of high treason by our William Rufus, was preparing to undergo one of these trials; when Ives, bishop of Chartres, convinced him that they were against the canons of the constitutions of the church, and adds, that in this manner Innocentiam defendere, est innocentiam perdere.

An abbot of St Aubin of Angers in 1066, having refused to present a horse to the Viscount of Tours, which the viscount claimed in right of his lordship, whenever an abbot first took possession of that abbey: the ecclesiastic offered to justify himself by the trial of the ordeal, or by duel, for which he proposed to furnish a man. The viscount at first agreed to the duel; but, reflecting that these combats, though sanctioned by the church, depended wholly on the skill or vigour of the adversary, and could therefore afford no substantial proof of the equity of his claim, he proposed to compromise the matter in a manner which strongly characterizes the times: he waived his claim, on condition that the abbot should not forget to mention in his prayers, himself, his wife, and his brothers! As the orisons appeared to the abbot, in comparison with the horse, of little or no value, he accepted the proposal.

In the tenth century the right of representation was not fixed: it was a question, whether the sons of a son ought to be reckoned among the children of the family; and succeeded equally with their uncles, if their fathers happened to die while their grandfathers survived. This point was decided by one of those combats. The champion in behalf of the right of children to represent their deceased father proved victorious. It was then established by a perpetual decree that they should henceforward share in the inheritance, together with their uncles. In the eleventh century the same mode was practised to decide respecting two rival Liberities! A pair of knights, clad in complete armour, were the critics to decide which was the authentic and true Liturgy.

If two neighbours, say the capitularies of Dagobert, dispute respecting the boundaries of their possessions, a piece of turf of the contested land he dug up by the judge and brought by him into the court, and the two parties then touch it with the points of their swords, calling on God to be a witness of their claims;—after this let them combat, and let victory decide on their rights!

In Germany, a solemn circumstance was practised in these judicial combats. In the midst of the lists, the placed a bier.—By its side stood the accuser and the accused; one at the head and the other at the foot of the bier, and leaned there for some time in profound silence before they began the combat.

Mr Ellis, in his elegant preface to Way's Fablia shows how faithfully the manners of the age are painted in these ancient tales, by observing the judicial combats introduced by a writer of the fourteenth century, who in his poem represents Pilate as challenging Jesus Christ to single combat, and another who describes the persecutor who pierced the side of Christ as a knight who joustet with Jews.

Judicial combat appears to have been practised by the Jews. Whenever the rabbins had to decide on a dispute about property between two parties, neither of which could produce evidence to substantiate his claim they terminated it by single combat. The rabbins were impressed by the notion that consciousness of right would give additional confidence and strength to the rightful possessor. This appears in the recent sermon of a rabbin. It may, however, be more philosophical to observe that such judicial combats were more frequently favourable to the criminal than to the innocent, because the bold wicked man is usually more ferocious and hardy than he whom he singles out as his victim, and who only wishes to preserve his own quiet enjoyments—in this case the assailant is the most terrible combatant.

In these times those who were accused of robbery were put to trial by a piece of barley-bread, on which the man had been said; and if they could not swallow it they were declared guilty. This mode of trial was improved by adding to the bread a slice of cheese; and such were their credulity and firm dependence on Heaven in these ridiculous trials, that they were very particular in this holy bread and cheese called the corned. The bread was to be of unleavened barley, and the cheese made of ewe's milk in the month of May.

Du Cange observes, that the expression—'May this piece of bread choke me!' comes from this custom. The anecdote of Earl Godwin's death by swallowing a piece of bread, in making this asseveration, is recorded in our history. If it be true, it was a singular misfortune.

Amongst the proofs of guilt in superstitious ages was that of the bleeding of a corpse. If a person was murdered, it was believed that at the touch or approach of the murderer the blood gushed out of the body in various parts. By the side of the bier, if the slightest change was observable in the eyes, the mouth, feet, or hands of the corpse, the murderer was conjectured to be present, and many innocent spectators must have suffered death; 'for when a body is full of blood, warmed by a sudden external heat and a putrefaction coming on, some of the blood-vessels will burst, as they will all in time.' This practice was once allowed in England, and is still looked on in some of the uncivilized parts of these kingdoms as a detection of the criminal. It forms a rich picture in the imagination of our old writers; and their histories and ballads are labouring into pathos by dwelling on this phenomenon.

Robertson observes that all these absurd institutions were cherished from the superstitions of the age believing the legendary histories of those saints, who crowd and disgrace the Roman calendar. These fabulous miracles had been declared authentic by the bills of the popes and the decrees of councils; they were greedily swallowed by the populace; and whoever believed that the Supreme Being had interposed miraculously on those trivial occasions mentioned in legends, could not but expect his intervention in matters of greater importance when solemnly referred to his decision. Besides this ingenious remark, the fact is, that these customs were a substitute for written laws which that barbarous period had not; and as no society can exist without laws, the ignorance of the people had recourse to these customs, which, bad and absurd as they were, served to close controversies which otherwise might have given birth to more destructive practices. Ordeals are in truth the rude laws of a barbarous people who have not yet obtained a written code, and not advanced enough in civilizato enter into the refined inquiries, the subtle distinctions and elaborate investigations, which a court of law demands.

May we suppose that these ordeals owe their origin to that one of Moses, called the 'Waters of Jealousy'? The Greeks likewise had ordeals, for in the Antigonus of Epichides, the soldiers offer to prove their innocence by standing red-hot iron, and walking between fires. One cannot but smile at the whimsical ordeals of the Siamese. Among other practices to discover the justice of a cause, civil or criminal, they are particularly attached to using certain consecrated purgative pills, which they make the contending parties swallow. He who retains them longest wins his cause! The practice of giving Indians a consecrated grain of rice to swallow is known to discover the thief, in any company, by the contortions and dismay evident on the countenance of the real thief.

But to return to the middle ages. They were acquainted in those times with secrets to pass unburnt these singular trials. Voltaire mentions one for undergoing the ordeal of boiling water. Our late travellers in the east have confirmed this statement. The Mevicheb derives can hold out hot iron between their teeth. Such artifices have been publicly exhibited at Paris and London. Mr Sharon Turner observes on the ordeals of the Anglo Saxons, that he had was not to be immediately inspected, and was left to the chance of a good constitution to be so far healed during three days (the time they required it to be bound up and sealed, before it was examined) as to discover those appearances when inspected, which were allowed to be satisfactory. There was likewise much preparatory training suggested by the more experienced; besides, the accused was as opportunity of going alone into the church, and making terms with the priests. The few spectators were always distant; an old iron, &c. might be substituted, and the fire diminished at the moment, &c.

Doubless they possessed these secrets and medicaments, which they had at hand, to pass through these trials in perfect security. Camerarius, in his 'Historia Subsecivæ,' gives an anecdote of these times which may serve to show their readiness. A rivalry existed between the Austin friars and the Jesuits. The father general of the Austin friars was dining with the Jesuits; and when the table was removed, he entered into a formal discourse of the superiority of the monastic order, and charged the Jesuits in unqualified terms, with assuming the title of 'fratres,' while they held not the three vows, which other monks were obliged to consider as sacred and binding. The general of the Austin friars was very eloquent and very authoritative;—and the superior of the Jesuits was very unlearned, but not half a fool.

He did not care to enter the list of controversy with the Austin friar, but arrested his triumph by asking him if he would see one of his friars, who pretended to be nothing more than a Jesuit, and one of the Austin friars who religiously performed the aforesaid three vows, show instantly which of them would be the readier to obey his superiors? The Austin friar consented. The Jesuit then turning to one of his brothers, the holy friar Mark, who was waiting on them, said, 'Brother Mark, our companions are cold. I command you, in virtue of the holy obedience you have sworn to me, to bring here instantly out of the kitchen fire, and in your hands, some burning coals, that they may warm themselves over your hands.' Father Mark instantly obeys, and to the astonishment of the Austin friars, brought in his hand a supply of red burning coals, and held them to whoever chose to warm himself; and at the command of his superior returned them to the kitchen hearth. The general of the Austin friars, with the rest of his brotherhood, stood amazed; he looked wistfully on one of his monks, as if he wished to command him to do the like.—But the Austin monk, who perfectly understood him, and saw this was not a time to hesitate, observed, 'Reverend father, forbear, and do not command me to tempt God! I am ready to fetch you fire in a chafing dish, but not in my bare hands.' The triumph of the Jesuits was complete; and it is not necessary to add, that the miracle was noised about, and that the Austin friars could never account for it, notwithstanding their strict performance of the three vows!

INQUISITION.

Innocent the Third, a pope as enterprising as he was successful in his enterprises, having sent Dominic with some missionaries into Languedoc, these men so irritated the heretics they were sent to convert, that most of them were assassinated at Toulouse in the year 1200. He called in the aid of temporal arms, and published against them a crusade, granting, as was usual with the popes on similar occasions, all kind of indulgences and pardons to those who should arm against the Mahometans, so he styled these unfortunate men. Once all were Turks when they were not catholics! Raymond, Count of Toulouse, was constrained to submit. The inhabitants were passed on the edge of the sword, without distinction of age or sex. It was then he established that scourge of Europe. The Inquisition: for having considered that though all might be compelled to submit by arms, numbers might remain who would profess particular dogmas, he established this sanguinary tribunal solely to inspect into all families, and inquire concerning all persons who they imagined were unfriendly to the interests of Rome. Dominic did so much by his persecuting inquiries, that he firmly established the inquisition at Toulouse.

Not before the year 1484 it became known in Spain.—To another Dominican, John de Torquemada, the Count of Rome owed this obligation. As he was the confessor of Queen Isabella, he had extorted from her a promise that if ever she ascended the throne, she would use every means to extirpate heresy and heretics. Ferdinand had conquered Granada, and had expelled from the Spanish realm multitudes of unfortunate Moors. A few remained, whom, with the Jews, he compelled to become Christians; they, at least assumed the name; but it was well known that both these nations naturally respected their own faith, rather than that of the Christian. This race was afterwards distinguished as Christianos Novos: and in forming marriages, the blood of the Hidalgo was considered to lose its purity by mingling with such a suspicious source.

Torquemada pretended that this dissimulation would greatly hurt the interests of the holy religion. The queen listened with respectful diffidence to her confessor; and at length gained over the king to consent to the establishment of this unrelenting tribunal. Torquemada, indefatigable in his zeal for the holy seat, in the space of fourteen years that he exercised the office of chief inquisitor, is said to have prosecuted near eighty thousand persons, of whom six thousand were condemned to the flames!

Voltaire attributes the taciturnity of the Spaniards to the universal horror such proceedings spread. 'A general jealousy and suspicion took possession of all ranks of people: friendship and sociability were at an end! Brothers were afraid of brothers, fathers of their children.'

The situations and the feelings of one imprisoned in the cells of the inquisition are forcibly painted by Orobin, a mild, and meek, and learned man, whose controversy with Limborch is well known. When he escaped from Spain he took refuge in Holland, was circumcised, and died a philosophical Jew. He has left this admirable description of himself in the cell of the inquisition. 'Inclosed in this dungeon I could not even find space enough to turn myself about; I suffered so much that I felt my brain disordered. I frequently asked myself, am I really Don Bathazar Orobin, who used to walk about Seville at my pleasure, who so much enjoyed myself with my wife and children? I often imagined that all my life had only been a dream, and that I really had been born in this dungeon! The only amusement I could invent was metaphysical disputations. I was at once opponent, respondent, and presser?

In the cathedral at Saragossa is the tomb of a famous inquisitor; six pillars surrounded his tomb, to each is chained a Moor, as preparatory to his being burnt. On this St Foix ingeniously observes, 'If ever the Jack Ketch of any country should be rich enough to have a splendid tomb, this might serve as an excellent model.'

The inquisition, as Bayle informs us, punished heretics by fire, to elude the maxim, Ecclesia non nocet sanguinem: for, burning a man, say they, does not spill his blood! Otho, the bishop at the Norman invasion, in the tapestry worked by Matilda the queen of William the Conqueror, is represented with a mace in his hand, for the purpose, that when he despatched his antagonist, he might not spill blood, but only break his bones! Religion has had her quibbles as well as law.

The establishment of this despotic order was resisted in France; but it may perhaps surprise the reader that a recorder of London in a speech urged the necessity of setting up an inquisition in England! It was on the trial of Penn the quaker, in 1670, who was acquitted by the jury which seems highly to have provoked the said recorder, Magna Charta, writes the prefacer to the trial, 'with the recorder of London, is nothing more than Magna F—.' It appears that the jury after being kept two days and two nights to change their verdict, were in the end both fined and imprisoned. Sir John Howell, the recorder, said, 'Till now I never understood the reason of the policy and prudence of the Spaniards in suffering the inquisition among them; and certainly it will not be well with us, till something like unto the Spanish inquisition be in England.'—Thus it will ever be, while both parties struggling for the pre-eminence, rush to the sharp extremity of things, and annihilate the trembling balance of the constitution. But the adopted motto of Lord Erskine must ever be that of every Briton, 'Trial by Jury.'

So late as the year 1761, Gabriel Malagrida, an old man of seventy was burnt by these evangelical executioners.—His trial was printed at Amsterdam, 1762, from the Lisbon copy. And for what was this unhappy Jesuit condemned? Not, as some have imagined, for his having been concerned in a conspiracy against the king of Portugal. No other charge is laid to him in this trial, but that of having indulged certain heretical notions, which any other tribunal but that of the inquisition would have looked upon as the delirious fancies of an old fanatic. Will posterity believe that in the eighteenth century an aged visionary was led to the stake for having said, amongst other extravagances, that 'The Holy Virgin having commanded him to write the life of Anti-Christ, told him that he, Malagrida, was a second John, but more clear than John the Evangelist: that there were to be three Anti-Christi, and that the last should be born at Milan, of a monk and a nun, in the year 1820; and that he would marry Proserpine, one of the infernal furies?'

For such ravings as these the unhappy old man was burnt in recent times. Granger assures us that in his remembrance a horre that had been taught to tell the spots upon cards, the hour of the day, &c., by significant tokens, was, together with his owner, put into the inquisition for both of them dealing with the devil! A man of letters declared that, having fallen into their hands, nothing perplexed him so much as the ignorance of the inquisitor and his council; and it seemed very doubtful whether they had read even the scriptures.

One of the most interesting anecdotes relating to the terrible inquisition, exemplifying how the use of the diabolical engines of torture force men to confess crimes they have not been guilty of, is related by a Portuguese gentleman.

A nobleman in Lisbon having heard that his physician and friend was imprisoned by the inquisition, under the stale pretext of Judaism, addressed a letter to one of them to request his freedom, assuring the inquisitor that his friend was as orthodox a Christian as himself. The physician, notwithstanding this high recommendation, was put to the torture; and, as was usually the case, at the height of his sufferings confessed every thing they wished. This enraged the nobleman, and feigning a dangerous illness, he begged the inquisitor would come to give him his last spiritual aid.

As soon as the Dominican arrived, the lord, who had prepared his confidential servants, commanded the inquisitor in their presence to acknowledge himself a Jew, to write his confession, and to sign it. On the refusal of the inquisitor the nobleman ordered his people to put on the inquisitor's head a red hot helmet, which to his astonishment in drawing aside a screen, he beheld glowing in a small furnace. At the sight of this new instrument of torture, 'Luke's iron crown,' the monk wrote and subscribed the abhorred confession. The nobleman then observed, 'See now the enormity of your manner of proceeding with unhappy men! My poor physician, like you, has confessed Judaism; but with this difference, only torments have forced that from him, which fear alone has drawn from you!'

The inquisition has not failed of receiving its due praises. Macedo, a Portuguese Jesuit, has discovered the 'Origin of the Inquisition' in the terrestrial Paradise, and presumes to allege, that God was the first who began the functions of an inquisitor over Cain and the workmen of Babel! Macedo, however is not so dreaming a personage as he appears; for he obtained a professor's chair at Panda for the arguments he delivered at Venice against the pope, which were published by the title of 'The literary Roarings of the Lion at St Mark;' besides he is the author of 106 different works; but it is curious to observe how far our interest is apt to prevail over our conscience,—Macedo praised the Inquisition up to heaven, while he sank of pope to nothing!

Among the great revolutions of this age, and since the last edition of these volumes, the inquisition in Spain and Portugal is abolished—but its history enters into that of all human mind; and the history of the inquisition by Lieber, translated by Chandler, with a very curious 'Introduction,' loses none of its value with the philosophical mind. This monstrous tribunal of human opinions aimed at the sovereignty of the intellectual world without intellect.

SINGULARITIES OBSERVED BY VARIOUS NATIONS. THEIR REPARTS.

The philosophical compiler of L'Esprit des Usages des Costumes, has arranged the greater part of the present article.

The Maldivian islanders eat alone. They retire into the most hidden parts of their houses; and they draw down the cloths that serve as blinds to their windows, that they may eat unobserved. This custom probably arises from the savage, in the early periods of society, concealing himself to eat: he fears that another with as sharp an appetite but more strong than himself, should come and ravish his meal from him. The ideas of witchcraft are also widely spread among barbarians; and they are not a little fearful that some incantation may be thrown among the victuals.

In noticing the solitary meal of the Maldivian islanders another reason may be alleged for this misanthropical rite. They never will eat with any one who is inferior to them in birth, in riches, or in dignity; and as it is a difficult matter to settle this equality, they are condemned to lead this unsocial life.

On the contrary, the islanders of the Philippines are remarkably sociable. Whenever one of them finds himself without a companion to partake of his meal, he runs till he meets with one; and we are assured that, however keen his appetite may be, he ventures not to satisfy it without a guest.

Savages, (say Montaigne) when they eat, 'S'essuyent les doigts aux cuisses, à la bonasse des genitoires, et à la plante des pieds.' We cannot forbear exulting in the pushed convenience of napkins!

The tables of the rich Chinese shine with a beautiful varnish, and are covered with silk carpets very elegantly worked. They do not make use of plates, knives, or forks: every guest has two little ivory or ebony sticks which he handles very adroitly.

The Otaheiteans, who are naturally sociable, and very gentle in their manners, feed separately from each other.—At the hour of repast, the members of each family divide into two brothers, two sisters, and even husband and wife, father and mother, have each their respective basket. They place themselves at the distance of two or three yards from each other; they turn their backs, and take their meal in profound silence.

The custom of drinking at different hours from those assigned for eating, is to be met with amongst many savage nations. It was originally begun from necessity. It became a habit, which subsisted even when the fountain was near to them. A people transplanted, observes an ingenious philosopher, preserve in another climate modes of living which relate to those from whence they originally came. It is thus the Indians of Brazil scrupulously abstain from eating when they drink, and from drinking when they eat.

When neither decency nor politeness are known, the man who invites his friends to a repast is greatly embarrassed to testify his esteem for his guests, and to preserve them with some amusement; for the savage guest imposes on him this obligation. Amongst the greater part of the American Indians, the host is continually on the watch to solicit them to eat, but touches nothing himself. In New France he wears himself with singing, to divert the company while they eat.

When civilization advances, men wish to show their confidence to their friends: they treat their guests as relations; and it is said that in China the master of the house to give a mark of his politeness, absents himself while his guests regale themselves at his table with undisturbed revelry.

The demonstrations of friendship in a rude state have a savage and gross character, which it is not a little curious to observe. The Tartars pull a man by the ear to press to drink, and they continue tormenting him till he has his mouth, then they clap their hands and dance before him.

No customs seem more ridiculous than those practised by the Kamatchatka, when he wishes to make another his guest. He first invites him to eat. The host and his guest strip themselves in a cabin which is heated to an uncommon degree. While the guest devours the food with which they serve him, the other continually stirs the fire. The stranger must bear the excess of the heat as well as the repast. He vomits ten times before he will yield; at length obliged to acknowledge himself overcome, he begins to compound matters. He purchases a moment's respite by a present of clothes or dogs; for his host threatens to beat the cabin, and to oblige him to eat till he dies. The stranger has the right of retaliation allowed to him: he treats in the same manner, and exacts the same presents. Should his host not accept the invitation of him whom he had handsomely regaled, in that case the guest would take possession of his cabin, till he had the presents returned to him which the other had in so singular a manner obtained.

For this extravagant custom a curious reason has been found. It is meant to put the person to a trial, whose friendship is sought. The Kamatchatka, who is at the expense of the fire, and the repast, is desirous to know if the stranger has the strength to support pain with him, and if he is generous enough to share with him some part of his property. While the guest is employed on his meal, he continues heating the cabin to an insupportable degree; and for a last proof of the stranger's constancy and attachment he exacts more clothes and more dogs. The host passes through the same ceremonies in the cabin of the stranger; and he shows, in his turn, with what degree of ardour he can defend his friend. The most singular customs would appear simple, if it were possible for the philosopher to understand them on the spot.

As a distinguishing mark of their esteem, the negroes of Africa drink out of one cup at the same time. The king of Loango eats in one house, and drinks in another. A Kamatchatka kneels before his guest; he cuts an enormous slice from a sea-calf; he crams it entire into the mouth of his friend, furiously crying out 'Tana?'—There! eat cutting away what hangs about his lips, snatches and devours it with avidity.

A barbarous magnificence attended the feasts of the great monarchs of France. After their coronation or installation, when they sat at table, the nobility served them on horseback.

MONARCHS.

Saint Chrysostom has this very acute observation on kings: many monarchs are infected with the strange wish that their successors may turn out bad princes. Good kings, desire it, as they imagine, continues this pious politician, that their glory will appear the more splendid by the contrast; and the bad desire it, as they consider such kings will serve to countenance their own misdemeanors.

Princes, says Gracian, are willing to be aided, but not crowned; which maxim is thus illustrated.

A Spanish lord having frequently played at chess with Philip II, and won all the games, perceived, when his majesty rose from play, that he was much ruffled with chagrin. He said when he returned home, said to his family.—'My son, we have nothing more to do at court; there we do not expect so favour; for the king is offended at my having won of him every game of chess.'—As chess entirely depends on the genius of the players, and not on fortune, the Philip the chess player conceived he ought to suffer severely.

This appears still clearer by the anecdote told of the Earl of Sunderland, minister to George I, who was partial to the game of chess. He once played with the Laird of Grey, and the learned Cunningham the editor of Horace. Cunningham with too much skill and too much sincerity, lost his lordship. 'The Earl was so fretted at his superiority and surfeit, that he dismissed him without any reward. Chury allowed himself sometimes to be beaten; but that means got his pardon, with something handsome besides.'

In the criticism of Gracian, there is a singular anecdote relative to kings.

A great Polish monarch having quitted his companions when he was hunting, his courtiers found him, a few days after, in a market-place, disguised as a porter, and leading out the use of his shoulders for a few pence. At this they were as much surprised, as they were doubtful at first whether the porter could be his majesty. At length they ventured to express their complaints, that so great a personage should debase himself by so vile an employ. His majesty having heard, answered them.—'Upon my honour, gentlemen, the load which I quitted is by far heavier than the one you see me carry here: the weightiest is but a straw, when compared to that world under which I labour.' I have slept more in four nights than I have during all my reign. I begin to live, and to be king of myself. Elect whom you choose. For me, who am so well, it were madness to return to court.' Another Polish king, who succeeded this philosophic monarch and porter, when they placed the sceptre in his hand, exclaimed.—'I had rather manage an ox.' The vacillating fortunes of the Polish monarchy present several of these anecdotes; their monarchs appear to have frequently been philosophers; and as the world is made, an excellent philosopher proves but an indifferent king.

Two observations on kings were made to a courtier with great naïveté by that experienced politician the Duke of Alva.—'Kings who affect to be familiar with their companions make use of wines as they do of oranges they take oranges to extract their juice; and when they are well sucked they throw them away. Take care the king does not do the same to you; be careful that he does not read all your thoughts; otherwise he will throw you aside to the back of his chest, as a book of which he has read enough. 'The squeezed orange,' the king of Prussia applied in his dispute with Voltaire.

When it was suggested to Dr Johnson that kings must be unhappy because they are deprived of the greatest of all satisfactions, easy and unreserved society, he observed that 'this was an ill-founded notion. Being a king does not exclude a man from such society. Great kings have always been social. The king of Prussia, the only great king at present, (this was the great Frederic) is very social. Charles the Second, the last king of England who was a man of parts, was social; our Henrys and Edwards were all social.'

The Marquis of Halifax in his character of Charles II, has exhibited a trait in the Royal character of a good-natured monarch; that trait, is sauntering. I transcribe this curious observation, which introduces us into a veue.

'There was as much of laziness as of love in all those hours which he passed amongst his mistresses, who served only to fill up his seraglio, while a bewitching kind of pleasure, called Sauntering, was the sultana queen he delighted in.

'The thing called sauntering is a stronger temptation to princes than it is to others. The being galled with importunities, pursued from one room to another with asking faces; the dismal sound of unreasonable complaints and ill-grounded pretences; the deformity of fraud ill-disguised;—all those would make any man run away from them, and I used to think it was the motive for making him walk so fast.'

OF THE TITLES OF ILLUSTRIOUS, HIGHNESS, AND EXCELLENCE.

The title of illustrious was never given, till the reign of Constantine, but to those whose reputation was splendid in arms or in letters. Adulation had not yet adopted this noble word into her vocabulary. Suetonius composed a book to record those who had possessed this title; and, as it was then bestowed, a moderate volume was sufficient to contain their names.

In the time of Constantine, the title of illustrious was given more particularly to those princes who had distinguished themselves in war; but it was not continued to their descendants. At length, it became very common; and every son of a prince was illustrious. It is now a convenient epithet for the poet.

There is a very proper distinction to be made between the epithets of illustrious, and famous.

Nicéron has entitled his celebrated work, Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire des hommes illustres dans la République des Lettres. The epithet illustrious is always received in an honourable sense; yet in these Mémoires are inserted many authors who have only written with the design of combating religion and morality. Such writers as Vassini, Spinoza, Woolston, Toland, &c. had been better characterized under the more general epithet of famous; for it may be said, that the illustrious are famous but that the famous are not always illustrious. In the rage for titles the ancient lawyers in Italy were not satisfied by calling kings illustres; they went a step higher, and would have emperors to be super-illustres, a barbarous coinage of their own.

In Spain, they published a book of titles for their kings, as well as for the Portuguese; but Selden tells us, that 'their Cortesias and giving of titles grew at length, through the affectation of heaping great attributes on their princes, to such an insufferable form, that a remedy was provided against it.' This remedy was an act published by Philip III, which ordained that all the Cortesias, as they termed these strange phrases, they had so servilely and ridiculously invented, should be reduced to a simple subscription, 'To the king our lord,' leaving out those fantastical attributes which every secretary had vied with his predecessors in increasing their number.

It would fill three columns of the present pages to transcribe the titles and attributes of the Grand Signior, which he assumes in a letter to Henry IV. Selden, in his Titles of Honour, first part, p. 140, has preserved it, 'This emperor of victorious emperors,' as he styles himself, at length condescended to agree with the emperor of Germany, in 1606, that in all their letters and instruments they should be only styled father and son: the emperor calling the sultan his son; and the sultan the emperor, in regard, of his years, his father.

Formerly, says Housseia, the title of highness was only given to kings; but now it has become so common, that all the great houses assume it. All the great, says a modern, are desirous of being confounded with princes, and are ready to seize on the privileges of royal dignity. We have already come to highness. The pride of our descendants, I suspect will usurp that of majesty.

Ferdinand, king of Arragon, and his queen Isabella, of Castile, were only treated with the title of highness, Charles was the first who took that of majesty: not in his quality of king of Spain, but as emperor. St Foix informs us, that kings were usually addressed by the titles of most illustrious, or your serenity, or your grace; but that the custom of giving them that of majesty, was only established by Louis XI, a prince the least majestic in all his actions, his manners, and his exterior—a severe monarch, but no ordinary man, the Tiberius of France; whose manners were of the most sordid nature:—in public audiences he dressed like the meanest of the people, and affected to sit on an old broken chair, with a filthy dog on his knees. In an account found of his household, this majestic prince has a charge made him, for two new sleeves sewed on one of his old doublets.

Formerly kings were apostrophized by the title of your grace. Henry VIII was the first, says Housseia, who assumed the title of highness; and at length majesty. It was Francis I, who saluted him with his last title, in their interview in the year 1520, though he called himself only the first gentleman in his kingdom!

So distinct were once the titles of highness and excellence, that, when Don Juan, the brother of Philip II, was permitted to take up the latter title, and the city of Granada saluted him by the title of highness, it occasioned such serious jealousies at court, that had he persisted in it, he would have been condemned for treason.

The usual title of cardinals, about 1600, was seignioria illustrissima; the Duke of Lerma, the Spanish minister and cardinal in his old age, assumed the title of excellencia reverendissima. The church of Rome was in its glory, and to be called reverend was then accounted a higher honour than to be styled the illustrious. But by use illustrious grew familiar, and reverend vulgar, and at last the cardinals were distinguished by the title of eminent.

After all these historical notices respecting these titles, the reader will smile when he is acquainted with the reason of an honest curate, of Montserrat, who refused to bestow the title of highness on the duke of Mantua, because he found in his breviary these words, Tu solus Dominus, tu solus Altissimus; from all which he concluded, that none but the Lord was to be honoured with the title of highness. The 'Titles of Honour' of Selden is a very curious volume, and as the learned Usher told Evelyn, the most valuable work of this great scholar. The best edition is a folio of about 1000 pages. Selden vindicates the right of a king of England to the title of emperor.

'And never yet was title did not move:
And never eke a mind, that title did not love.'

TITLES OF SOVEREIGNS.

In countries where despotism exists in all its force, it is gratified in all its caprices, either the intoxication of power has occasioned sovereigns to assume the most solemn and the most fantastic titles; or the royal duties and functions were considered of so high and extensive a nature that the people expressed their notion of the pure monarchical state, by the most energetic descriptions of oriental fancy.

The chiefs of the Natches are regarded by their people as the children of the sun, and they bear the name of the father.

The titles which some chiefs assume are not always honourable in themselves; it is sufficient if the people respect them. The king of Quiterva calls himself the great lion and for this reason lions are there so much respected, that they are not allowed to kill them, but at certain royal huntings.

The king of Monomotapa is surrounded by musicians and poets, who adulat him by such refined flatteries: lord of the sun and moon; great magician; and great lord.

The Asiatics have bestowed what to us appear as ridiculous titles of honour on their princes. The king of Aracan assumes the following ones; 'Emperor of Aracan, possessor of the white elephant, and the two ear-rings, in virtue of this possession legitimate heir of Pegu of Brama; lord of the twelve provinces of Bengal, and of twelve kings who place their heads under his feet.'

His majesty of Ava is called God; when he writes to foreign sovereign he calls himself the king of kings, while all others should obey, as he is the cause of the preservation of all animals; the regulator of the seasons, the absolute master of the ebb and flow of the sea, brother to the sun, and king of the four and twenty umbrellas! The umbrellas are always carried before him as a mark of his dignity.

The titles of the king of Achem are singular though luminous. The most striking ones are sovereign of the universe, whose body is as luminous as the sun: who God created to be as accomplished as the moon at her plenitude; whose eye glitters like the northern star; who as spiritual as a ball is round; who when he rises sheds all his people; from under whose feet a sweet odour wafts, &c, &c.

Dr Davy, in his recent history of Ceylon, has added to this collection the authentic title of the Kandryan royal reign. He too is called Devo (God). In a deed of god he proclaims his extraordinary attributes. 'The protecter of religion, whose fame is infinite, and of surpassing excellence, exceeding the moon, the unexpanded jessamine buds, the stars, &c; whose feet are as fragrant to the noses of other kings as flowers to bees; our most noble patron and god by custom, &c.'

After a long enumeration of the countries possessed by the king of Persia, they give him some poetical distinctions: the branch of honour; the mirror of virtue; and the rose of delight.

ROYAL DIVINITIES.

There is a curious dissertation in the 'Memoires de l'Academie des inscriptions et Belles Lettres, by the Abbé Mongault, on the divine honours which were paid to the governors of provinces during the Roman republic; and their life-time these originally began in gratitude, and at length degenerated into flattery. These facts curiously show how far the human mind can advance, when led on by customs that operate invisibly on it, and blind us in our superstitions. One of these ceremonies was exquisitely ridiculous. When they voted a statue to a proconsul, they placed among the statues of the gods in the festival called Lustrum; from the ridiculous circumstances of this solemn festival. On that day the gods were invited to a repast which was however spread in various quarters of the city to satiate mouths more mortal. The gods were howled taken down from their pedestals, laid on beds ornamented in their temples; pillows were placed under their heads; and while they reposed in this easy posture they were served with a magnificent repast. When Cæsar conquered Rome, the servile senate put him to dine to the gods! Fatigued by, and ashamed of these honours, desired the senate to erase from his statue in the capital the title they had given him of a semi-god!

We know that the first Roman emperors did not flatterers, and that the adulations they sometimes lavished were extravagant. But perhaps few know that they were so offensive than the flatterers of the third century under Pagan, and of the fourth under the Christian emperors. Here who are acquainted with the character of the age (Augustus, have only to throw their eyes on the one, or the other code, to find an infinite number of passages that had been bearable even in that age. For instance, here is a law of Arcadius and Honorius, published 384:

Let the officers of the palace be warned to abstain from frequenting tumultuous meetings; and that those who, prompted by a sacrilegious temerity, dare to oppose the authority of our divinity, shall be deprived of their employments, and their estates confiscated.' The letters they are holy. When the sons speak of their fathers, it is their father of divine memory; or 'Their divine father,' they call their own laws cracules, and celestial oracles. So they call their subjects address them by the titles of 'Your personality, your eternity.' And it appears by a law of Theodosius the Great, that the emperors at length added this to the titles. It begins, 'If any magistrate after having composed a public work, put his name rather than that of our divinity, let him be judged guilty of high treason. All resemble one of 'the celestial empire' of the Chinese. Whenever the great Mogul made an observation, Berberis tells us that some of the first eunuchs lifted up their hands, crying, 'Wonder! wonder! wonder!' And a proverb current in his dominions, was, 'If the king saith at today it is night, you are to say, behold the moon and the stars?' Such adulation, however, could not alter the moral condition and fortune of this unhappy being, who some a sovereign without knowing what it is to be one. He was brought out of the seraglio to be placed on the throne, and it was he rather than the spectators, who ought have truly used the interjection of astonishment!

DETHRONED MONARCHS.

Fortune never appears in a more extravagant humour when she reduces monarchs to become medics. At the end of a century ago it was not imagined that our own times could have to record many such instances. After having completed kings raised into divinities, we see them now reduced as beggars. Our own times, in two opposite points, may emphatically be distinguished as the age of in Candide or the Optimist, there is an admirable stroke Voltaire's. Eight travellers meet in an obscure inn, and one of them with not sufficient money to pay for a scurvy bed. In the course of conversation, they are discovered to be eight monarchs in Europe, who had been deprived of their crowns!

What added to this exquisite satire was, that there were living monarchs at that moment wanderers on the earth—a circumstance which has since occurred.

At the death of the widow of Lothario king of Italy, one of the most beautiful women in her age, was besieged in Pavia by an emperor, who resolved to constrain her to marry his son. Pavia was taken; she escaped from her prison with an almoner. The archbishop of Reggio had offered her to reach it, she and her almoner travelled on through the country by night, concealing herself in the straw among the corn, while the almoner begged for food and food through the villages.

The Emperor Henry IV, after having been deposed and crowned by his son, Henry V, escaped from prison; he, without aid, he entreated the bishop of Speyer to grant him a lay prebend in his church. 'I have said,' said he, 'and have learned to sing, and may therefore do some service to you.' The request was denied. He died miserably and obscurely at Liege, after having drawn the attention of Europe to his victories and his misdeeds.

Henry of Medicis, the widow of Henry the Great, mother of Louis XIII, mother-in-law of three sovereigns, and queen of France, frequently wanted the necessities of life, and died in Cologne in the utmost misery. The intrigues of the court compelled her to exile herself, and live an unhappy fugitive. Her petition exists with this supplicatory letter: 'Supplie Marie, Reine de France et de Navarre, que depuis le 23 Fevrier, elle auroit été arrestée au chateau de Compiègne, sans être ni accusée, ni jugée, &c.' Lilly, the astrologer, in his life of King Charles the First, presents us with a touching picture of this unfortunate monarch. He has described the person of the old queen mother of

'In the month of August, 1641, I beheld the old queen mother of France departing from London, in company of Thomas earl of Arundel. A sad spectacle of mortality it was, and produced tears from mine eyes and many other beholders, to see an aged, lean, decrepit, poor queen ready for her grave, necessitated to depart hence, having no place of residence in this world left her, but where the courtesy of her hard fortune assigned it. She had been the only stately and magnificent woman of Europe: wife to the greatest king that ever lived in France; mother unto one king and unto two queens.'

In the year 1585, died at Paris, Antonio king of Portugal. His body is interred at the Cordeliers, and his heart deposited at the Ave-Maria. Nothing on earth could compel this prince to renounce his crown. He passed over to England, and Elizabeth assisted him with troops, but at length he died in France in great poverty. This dethroned monarch was happy in one thing, which is indeed rare: in all his miseries he had a servant, who proved a tender and faithful friend, and who only desired to participate in his misfortunes, and to soften his miseries; and for the recompense of his services he only wished to be buried at the feet of his dear master. This hero in loyalty, to whom the ancient Romans would have raised altars, was Don Diego Bothei, one of the greatest lords of the court of Portugal, and who drew his origin from the kings of Bohemia.

Hume supplies me with an anecdote of singular royal distress. He informs us that the queen of England, with her son Charles, had 'a moderate pension assigned her; but it was so ill paid, and her credit ran so low, that one morning when the Cardinal de Retz waited on her, she informed him that her daughter, the princess Henrietta, was obliged to lie a-bed for want of a fire to warm her. To such a condition was reduced, in the midst of Paris, a queen of England, and daughter of Henry IV of France! We find another proof of her excessive poverty. Salmasius, after publishing his celebrated political book, in favour of Charles II, the Defensio Regie, was much blamed by a friend for not having sent a copy to the widowed queen of Charles, who, he writes, though poor, would yet have paid the bearer!

The daughter of James the First, who married the Elector Palatine, in her attempts to get her husband crowned, was reduced to the utmost beggary, and wandered frequently in disguise as a mere vagrant.

A strange anecdote is related of Charles VII, of France. Our Henry V. had shrunk his kingdom into the town of Bourges. It is said that having told a shoemaker after he had just tried a pair of his boots, that he had no money to pay for them, Crispin had such callous feelings that he refused his majesty the boots! 'It is for this reason,' says Comines, 'I praise those princes who are on good terms with the lowest of their people; for they know not at what hour they may want them.'

Many monarchs of this day have probably experienced more than once the truth of the reflection of Comines.

We may add here, that in all conquered countries the descendants of royal families have been found among the drags of the populace. An Irish prince has been discovered in the person of a miserable peasant; and in Mexico, its faithful historian Clavigero notices that he has known a locksmith who was a descendant of its ancient kings, and a tailor of one of its noblest families.

FEUDAL CUSTOMS.

Barbarous as the feudal customs were, they were the first attempts at organizing European society. The northern nations, in their irruptions and settlements in Europe, were barbarians independent of each other, till a sense of public safety induced these hordes to confederate. But the private individual reaped no benefit from the public union; on the contrary, he seems to have lost his wild liberty in the subjugation; he in a short time was compelled to suffer from his chieftain; and the curiosity of the philosopher is excited by contemplating in the feudal customs a barbarous people carrying into their first social institutions their original ferocity. The institution of forming cities into communities at length gradually diminished this military and aristocratic tyranny; and the freedom of cities, originating in the pursuits of commerce, shook off the yoke of insolent lordships. A famous ecclesiastical writer of that day, who had imbibed the feudal prejudices, calls these communities, which were distinguished by the name of libertates (hence probably our municipal term the liberties), as ' execrable inventions, by which, contrary to law and justice, slaves withdrew themselves from that obedience which they owed to their masters.' Such was the expiring voice of aristocratic tyranny! This subject has been ingeniously discussed by Robertson in his preliminary volume to Charles; but the following facts constitute the picture which the historian leaves to be gleaned by the scruter inquirer.

The feudal government introduced a species of servitude which till that time was unknown, and which was called the servitude of the land. The bondmen or serfs, and the villains or country servants, did not reside in the house of the lord; but they entirely depended on his caprice; and he sold them, as he did the animals, with the field where they lived, and which they cultivated.

It is difficult to conceive with what insolence the petty lords of those times tyrannized over their villains; they not only oppressed their slaves with unremitting labour, instigated by a vile cupidity; but their whim and caprice led them to inflict miseries without even any motive of interest.

In Scotland they had a shameful institution of maiden rights; and Malcolm the Third only abolished it, by ordering that they might be redeemed by a quitrent. The truth of this circumstance Dalrymple has attempted, with excusable patriotism, to render doubtful. There seems however to be no doubt of the existence of this custom; since it also spread through Germany, and various parts of Europe; and the French barons extended their domestic tyranny to three nights of involuntary prostitution. Monseigneur is infinitely French, when he could turn this shameful species of tyranny into a bon mot; for he coldly observes on this, 'C'étoit bien ces trois nuits là, qu'il falloir choisir; car pour les autres on n'aurait pas donné beaucoup d'argent.' The legislator in the wit forgot the feelings of his heart.

Others, to preserve this privilege when they could not enjoy it in all its extent, thrust their leg booted into the bed of the new-married couple. This was called the droit de cuisse. When the bride was in bed, the esquire or lord performed this ceremony, and stood there, his thigh in the bed, with a lance in his hand: in this ridiculous attitude he remained till he was tired; and the bridegroom was not suffered to enter the chamber, till his lordship had retired. Such indecent privileges must have originated in the worst of intentions; and when afterwards they advanced a step in more humane manners, the ceremonial was preserved from avaricious motives. Others have compelled their subjects to pass the first night at the top of a tree, and there to consummate their marriage; to pass the bridal hours in a river; or to be bound naked to a cart, and to trace some furrows as they were dragged: or to leap with their feet tied over the horns of stags.

Sometimes their caprice commanded the bridegroom to appear in drawers at their castle, and plunge into a ditch of mud; and sometimes they were compelled to beat the waters of the ponds to hinder the frogs from disturbing the lord!

Wardship, or the privilege of guardianship enjoyed by some lord, was one of the barbarous inventions of the feudal ages; the guardian had both the care of the person, and for his own use the revenue of the estates. This feudal custom was so far abused in England, that the king sold these lordships to strangers; and when the guardian had fixed on a marriage for the infant, if the youth or maiden did not agree to this, they forfeited the value of the marriage; that is, the sum the guardian would have obtained by the other party had it taken place. This cruel custom was a source of domestic unhappiness, particularly in love-affairs, and has served as the ground-work of many a pathetic play by our elder dramatists.

There was a time when the German lords reckoned amongst their privileges, that of robbing on the high ways of their territory; which ended in raising up the famous Hanseatic Union to protect their commerce against rapine and avaricious exactions of toll.

Geoffrey, lord of Coventry, compelled his wife to ride naked on a white pad through the streets of the town; that by this mode he might restore to the inhabitants these privileges of which his wantonness had deprived them. This anecdote some have suspected to be fictitious from its extreme barbarity; but the character of the middle-ages will admit of any kind of wanton barbarism.

When the abbot of Figeac makes his entry into that town, the lord of Montbrun, dressed in a harlequin's coat, and one of his legs naked, is compelled by an ancient custom to conduct him to the door of his abbey leading his horse by the bridle.

The feudal barons frequently combined to share amongst themselves those children of their villains who appeared to be the most healthy and serviceable, or who were remarkable for their talents; and not unfrequently sold them in the markets.

The feudal servitude is not, even in the present enlightened times, abolished in Poland, in Germany, and in Russia. In those countries the bondmen are still entirely dependent on the caprice of their masters. The peasants of Hungary or Bohemia frequently revolt, and attempt to shake off the pressure of feudal tyranny.

An anecdote of comparatively recent date displays the unfeeling caprice. A lord or prince of the northern countries passing through one of his villages, observed a small assembly of peasants and their families amusing themselves with dancing. He commands his domestics to put the men from the women, and confine them in the house. He orders the coats of the women to be drawn up above their heads, and tied with their garters. The men were then liberated, and those who did not recognize their wives in that state received a severe castigation.

Absolute dominion hardens the human heart; as nobles accustomed to command their bondmen will treat their domestics as slaves, as the capricious or inhuman West Indians are known to do their domestic slaves. Those of Siberia punish theirs by a free use of the cudgel or rod. The Abbé Chappes saw two Russian slaves in dress a chambermaid, who had by some trifling negligence given offence to her mistress; after having uncovered as far as her waist, one placed her head betwixt his knees the other held her by the feet: while both armed with two sharp rods, violently lashed her back till it pleased the domestic tyrant to decree it was enough!

After a perusal of these anecdotes of feudal tyranny, we may exclaim with Goldsmith—

'I fly from petty tyrants—to the throne.'

Mr Hallam's recent view of 'the State of Europe during the Middle-ages,' renders this short article superfluous in a philosophical view.

JOAN OF ARC.

Of the Maid of Orleans I have somewhere read that: bundle of faggots was substituted for her, when she was supposed to have been burnt by the Duke of Bedford. None of our historians notice this anecdote: though some have mentioned that after her death an impostor arose and was even married to a French gentleman, by whom she had several children. Whether she deserved to have been distinguished by the appellation of The Maid of Orleans we have great reason to suspect; and some in her days, from her fondness for man's apparel, even doubted her sex. We know little of one so celebrated as to have formed the heroine of epics. The following epitaph on her find in Winstanley's 'Historical Barities,' and which possessing some humour, merits to be rescued from total oblivion.

'Here lies Joan of Arc; the which
Some count saint, and some count witch;
Some count man, and something more;
Some count maid, and some a whore.
Her life 's in question, wrong or right;
Her death 's in doubt, by laws or might.
Oh, Innocence! take heed of it,
How thou too near to guilt dost sit.
(Meantime, France a wonder saw—
A woman rule, 'gainst salique law!)
But, reader, be content to stay
Thy censure till the judgment day;
Then shalt thou know, and not before,
Whether saint, witch, man, maid, or whore.'

GAMING.

Gaming appears to be an universal passion. Some have attempted to deny its universality; they have imagined that it is chiefly prevalent in cold climates, where succession becomes most capable of agitating and gratifying the torpid minds of their inhabitants.

The fatal propensity of gaming is to be discovered well amongst the inhabitants of the frigid and torrid zones as amongst those of the milder climates. The savage, the civilized, the illiterate and the learned, are all created by the hope of accumulating wealth without the hours of industry.

Barbeyrac has written an elaborate treatise on gaming, and we have two quarto volumes by C. Moore, on suicide, gaming, and duelling, which may be put on the shelf by the side of Barbeyrac. All these works are excellent sermons, but a sermon to a gambler, a duellist, or a suicide!—dice-box, a sword and pistol, are the only things that seem to have any power over these unhappy men, for ever lost in a labyrinth of their own construction.

I am much pleased with the following thought. 'The ancients (says the author of Amusemens sérieux et coquins) assembled to see their gladiators kill one another; they classed this among their games! What barbarity! But we are less barbarous, we who call a game an assembly who meet at the faro table where the actors themselves know they only meet to destroy one another?' In both cases the philosopher may perhaps discover their origin in one cause, that of the listless perishing with ennui requiring an immediate impulse of the passions; and very inconsiderate on the fatal means which procures the desired agitation.

The most ancient treatise by a modern on this subject, according to Barbeyrac, was that of a French physician, Jean Echeloo, who published it in 1569, entitled De Alea, de de carentia ludendi in pecunia cupiditate, that is, 'of games of chance, or the malady of playing for money.' The treatise itself is only worth noticing from the circumstance of the author being himself one of the most inveterate gamblers; he wrote this work to convince himself of his folly. But in spite of all his solemn vows, the prayers of his friends, and his own book perpetually quoted before his face, he was a great gamester to his last hour! The same circumstance happened to Sir John Denham. They had not the good sense of old Montaigne, who gives us the reason why he gave over gaming. 'I used to like formerly games of chance with cards and dice; but of that folly I have long been cured; merely because I found that whatever good countenance I put on when I lost I did not feel my vexation the less.' Goldsmith fell a victim to this madness. To play any game well requires serious study, time, and experience. If a man of letters plays deeply, as will be doped even by shallow fellows, or by professed gamblers.

Dice, and that little pugnacious animal the cock, are the chief instruments employed by the numerous nations of the East, to agitate their minds and ruin their fortunes; to which the Chinese, who are desperate gamesters, add the use of cards. When all other property is played away, the Asiatic gambler scruples not to stake his wife or his child, on the cast of a die, or courage and strength of a martial bird. If still unsuccessful, the last venture he stakes is himself.

In the island of Ceylon, cock-fighting is carried to a great height. The Sumatrans are addicted to the use of dice. A strong spirit of play characterizes a Malayan. After having resigned every thing to the good fortune of the winner, he is reduced to a horrid state of desperation; he then incurs a certain lock of hair, which indicates war and destruction to all the raving gamester meets. He intoxicates himself with opium; and working himself up into a fit of pique, he bites and kills every one who comes in his way. But as soon as this lock is seen flowing it is lawful to fire at the person, and to destroy him as fast as possible. I think it is this which our sailors call 'To run a muck.' This Dryden writes—

'Frontless, and setfire-proof, he scours the streets,
And runs an Indian muck at all he meets.'

This also Pope—

'Setfire's my weapon, but I'm too discreet
To run a muck, and die at all I meet.'

Johnson could not discover the derivation of the word muck. 'To run a muck' is an old phrase for attacking madly and indiscriminately: and has since been ascertained to be a Malay word.

To discharge their gambling debts, the Siamese sell their possessions, their families, and at length themselves. The Chinese play night and day, till they have lost all they are worth; and then they usually go and hang themselves. Such is the propensity of the Japanese for high play, that they were compelled to make a law, that, 'Whoever ventures his money at play, shall be put to death.' In the newly-discovered islands of the Pacific Ocean, they venture with their hatchets, which they hold as invaluable acquisitions, on running-matches:—'We saw a man,' says Cook,

'beating his breast and tearing his hair in the violence of rage, for having lost three hatchets at one of these races, and which he had purchased with nearly half his property.'

The ancient nations were not less addicted to gaming; Persians, Grecians, and Romans; the Goths, the Germans, &c. To notice the modern ones were a melancholy task: there is hardly a family in Europe which cannot record, from their own domestic annals, the dreadful prevalence of this passion.

Gamester and cheater were synonymous terms in the time of Shakspeare and Jonson: they have hardly lost much of their double signification in the present day.

The following is a curious picture of a gambling-house, from a contemporary account and appears to be an establishment more systematic than the 'hells' of the present day.

'A list of the officers established in the most notorious gaming-houses,' from the Daily Journal, Jan. 9th, 1731.

1st. A Commissioner, always a proprietor, who looks in of a night; and the week's account is audited by him and two other proprietors.

2d. A Director, who superintends the room.

3d. An Operator, who deals the cards at a cheating game, called Faro.

4th. Two Crowpees, who watch the cards, and gather the money for the bank.

5th. Two Puffs, who have money given them to decoy others to play.

6th. A Clerk, who is a check upon the Puffs, to see that they sink none of the money given them to play with.

7th. A Squib is a puff of lower rank, who serves at half-pay salary while he is learning to deal.

8th. A Flasher, to swear how often the bank has beer stripped.

9th. A Dunner, who goes about to recover money lost at play.

10th. A Waiter, to fill out wine, snuff candles, and attend the gaming-room.

11th. An Attorney, a Newgate solicitor.

12th. A Captain, who is to fight any gentleman who is peevish for losing his money.

13th. An Usher, who lights gentlemen up and down stairs, and gives the word to the porter.

14th. A Porter, who is generally a soldier of the Foot Guards.

15th. An Orderly Man, who walks up and down the outside of the door, to give notice to the porter, and alarm the house at the approach of the constable.

16th. A Runner, who is to get intelligence of the justice's meeting.

17th. Link-boys, Coachmen, Chairmen, or others who bring intelligence of the justices' meetings, or of the constables being out, at a half-a-guinea reward.

18th. Common-bail, Affidavit men, Ruffians, Bravoes, Assassins, cum multis aliis.

The 'Memoirs of the most famous Gamesters from the reign of Charles II to Queen Anne, by T. Lucas, Esq. 1714,' appears to be a bookseller's job; but probably a few traditional stories are preserved.

THE ARABIC CHRONICLE.

The Arabic Chronicle of Jerusalem is only valuable from the time of Mahomet. For such is the stupid superstition of the Arabs that they pride themselves on being ignorant of whatever has passed before the mission of their Prophet. The most curious information it contains is concerning the crusades: according to Longerus, who said he had translated several portions of it, whoever would be versed in the history of the crusades should attend to this chronicle, which appears to have been written with impartiality. It renders justice to the christian heges, and particularly dwells on the gallant actions of the Count de Saint Gilles.

Our historians chiefly write concerning Godfrey de Bouillon; only the learned know that the Count de Saint Gilles acted there so important a character. The stories of the Saracens are just the reverse: they speak little concerning Godfrey, and eminently distinguish Saint Gilles.

Tasso has given into the more vulgar accounts, by making the former so eminent, at the cost of the other heroes, in his Jerusalem Delivered. Thus Virgil transfigured by his magical power the chaste Dido into a lover; and Homer the meretricious Penelope into a mourning matron. It is not requisite for poets to be historians, but historians should not be so frequently poets. The same charge, I have been told, must be made to the Grecian historians. The Persians are viewed to great disadvantage in Grecian history. It would form a curious inquiry, and the result might be unexpected to some, were the Oriental student to comment on the Grecian historians. The Grecians were not the demi-gods they paint themselves to have been, nor those they attacked the contemptible multitudes they describe. These boasted victories might be diminished. The same observation attaches to Caesar's account of his British expedition. He never records the defeats he frequently experienced. The national prejudices of the Roman historians have undoubtedly occasioned us to have a very erroneous conception of the Carthaginians, whose discoveries in navigation and commercial enterprises were the most considerable among the ancients. We must indeed think highly of that people, whose works on agriculture which they had raised into a science, the senate of Rome ordered to be translated into Latin. They must indeed have been a wise and brave people. Yet they are stigmatized by the Romans for faction, cruelty and cowardice; and their bad faith has come down to us in a proverb; but Livy was a Roman! and there is a patriotic malignity!

METEMPSYCHOSIS.

If we except the belief of a future remuneration beyond this life for suffering virtue, and retribution for successful crimes, there is no system so simple, and so little repugnant to our understanding, as that of the metempsychosis. The pains and the pleasures of this life are by this system considered as the recompense or the punishment of our actions in an anterior state: so that, says St Foix we cease to wonder that among men and animals, some enjoy an easy and agreeable life, while others seem born only to suffer all kinds of miseries: preposterous as this system may appear, it has not wanted for advocates in the present age, which indeed has revived every kind of fanciful theories. Mercier, in L'an deus mille quatre cents quarante, seriously maintains the present one.

If we seek for the origin of the opinion of the metempsychosis, or the transmigration of souls into other bodies, we must plunge into the remotest antiquity; and even then we shall find it impossible to fix the epoch of its first author. The notion was long extant in Greece before the time of Pythagoras. Herodotus assures us that the Egyptian priests taught it; but he does not inform us of the time it began to spread. It probably followed the opinion of the immortality of the soul. As soon as the first philosophers had established this dogma, they thought they could not maintain this immortality without a transmigration of souls. The opinion of the metempsychosis spread in almost every region of the earth; and it continues, even to the present time in all its force among those nations who have not yet embraced christianity. The people of Arracan, Peru, Siam, Cambora, Tonquin, Cochinchina, Japan, Java, and Ceylon still entertain that fancy, which also forms the chief article of the Chinese religion. The Druids believed in transmigration. The hardic triads of the Welsh are full of this belief; and a Welsh antiquary insists that by an emigration which formerly took place, it was conveyed to the Bramins of India from Wales! The Welsh bards tell us that the souls of men transmigrate into the bodies of those animals whose habits and characters they most resemble, till after a circuit of such chastising miseries, they are rendered more pure for the celestial presence; for man may be converted into a pig or a wolf, till at length he assumes the inefficiency of the dove.

My learned friend Sharon Turner, the accurate and philosophical historian of our Saxon ancestors, has explained, in his 'Vindication of the ancient British Poems,' p. 231, the Welsh system of the metempsychosis. Their bards mention three circles of existence. The circle of the all-including circle, holds nothing alive or dead but God. The second circle, that of felicity, is that which men are to parade after they have passed through their terrestrial changes. The circle of evil is that in which human nature passes through those varying stages of existence which it must undergo before it is qualified to inhabit the circle of felicity.

The progression of man through the circle of evil is marked by three infelicities: necessity, oblivion, and deaths. The deaths which follow our changes, are so many escapes from their power. Man is a free agent, and has the liberty of choosing; his sufferings and changes cannot be foreseen. By his misconduct he may happen to fall retrograde into the lowest state from which he had emerged. If his conduct in any one state, instead of improving his being, had made it worse, he fell back into a worse condition to commence again his purifying revolutions. Humanity was the limit of the degraded transmutations. All the changes above humanity produced felicity. Humanity is the scene of the contest, and after man has traversed every state of animated existence, and can remember all that he has passed through, that consummation follows which he attains in the circle of felicity. It is on this system of transmigration that Taliessin the Welsh bard, who wrote in the sixth century, gives a recital of his pretended transmigration. He tells how he had been a serpent, a wild ass, a buck, or a crane &c; and this kind of reminiscence of his former state, this recovery of memory, was a proof of the mortal's advance to the happier circle. For to forget what we have been was one of the curses of the circle of evil. Taliessin there fore, adds Mr Turner, as profusely boasts of his recovered reminiscence as any modern secretary can do of his state of grace and election.

In all these wild reveries there seems to be a moral fall in the notion, that the clearer a man recollects what a brut he has been, it is certain proof that he is in an improved state!

According to the Authentic Clavigero, in his history of Mexico, we find the Pythagorean transmigration carried on in the west, and not less fancifully than in the countries of the east. The people of Tlascala believe that the souls of persons of rank went after their death to inhabit the bodies of beautiful and sweet singing birds, and those of the weak quadrupeds; while the souls of inferior persons were supposed to pass into weasels, beetles, and such other mean animals.

There is something not a little ludicrous in the description Plutarch gives at the close of his treatise on 'the debt of heavenly justice.' Thespisus saw at length the soul of those who were condemned to return to life, and who they violently forced to take the form of all kinds of animals. The labourers charged with this transmigration, forge with their instruments certain parts; others, a new form; an made some totally disappear; that these souls might be rendered proper for another kind of life and other habit. Among these he perceived the soul of Nero, which had a ready suffered long torments, and which stuck to the body by nails red from the fire. The workmen seized on him, make a viper of, under which form he was now to live. As he having devoured the breast that had carried him.—But this Plutarch only copies the fine reveries of Plato.

SPANISH ETIQUETTE.

The etiquette or the rules to be observed in the royal palaces is necessary, writes Baron Biefield, for keeping order at court. In Spain it was carried to such lengths as to make martyrs of their kings. Here is an instance, which, in spite of the fatal consequences it produced, we cannot refrain from smiling.

Philip the Third was gravely seated by the fire-side the fire-maker of the court had kindled so great a quantity of wood, that the monarch was nearly suffocated with heat and his grandeur would not suffer him to rise from his chair; the domestics could not presume to enter the apartment, because it was against the etiquette. At length the Marquis de Pota appeared, and the king ordered him to damp the fire: but he excused himself; alleging that it was forbidden by the etiquette to perform such a function for which the duke d'Usceda ought to be called upon, as was his business. The duke was gone out; the fire but fiercer; and the king endured it, rather than derogate from his dignity. But his blood was heated to such a degree that an erysipelas of the head appeared the next day which succeeded by a violent fever, carried him off in 1608 in the twenty-fourth year of his age.

The palace was once on fire; a soldier, who knew the king's sister was in her apartment, and must inevitably have been consumed in a few moments by the flames, at the risk of his life rushed in, and brought her highness safe out in her arms; but the Spanish etiquette was here woefully broken into! The loyal soldier was brought to trial, and as it was impossible to deny that he had entered her apartment, it judges condemned him to die! The Spanish Princess, however condescended in consideration of the circumstances to pardon the soldier, and very benevolently saved his life.

When Isabella, mother of Philip II, was ready to be delivered of him, she commanded that all the lights should be extinguished: that if the violence of her pain should ever in her face to change colour, no one might perceive it. In when the midwife said, 'Madam, cry out, that will be your ease,' she answered in good Spanish, 'How can you give me such advice? I would rather die than yell.'

'Spain gives us pride—which Spain to all the earth
May largely give, nor fear herself a death!'

Churchill.

Philip the Third was a weak bigot, who suffered himself to be governed by his ministers. A patriot wished to save his eyes, but he could not pierce through the crowds of flatterers; besides, that the voice of patriotism heard in a corrupt court would have become a crime never pardoned. He found, however, an ingenious manner of complying to him his censure. He caused to be laid on his table one day, a letter sealed, which bore this address—To the King of Spain, Philip the Third, at present in the service of the Duke of Lerma.'

In a similar manner, Don Carlos, son to Philip the Second, made a book with empty pages, to contain the voyages of his father, which bore this title—'The Great and Admirable Voyages of the King Mr Philip.' All these voyages consisted of going to the Escorial from Madrid, and returning to Madrid from the Escorial. Jests of this kind, at length, cost him his life.

THE GOTHES AND HUMS.

The terrific honours which these ferocious nations paid to their deceased monarchs are recorded in history, by the monument of Attila, king of the Huns; and Alaric, king of the Goths.

Attila died in 453, and was buried in the midst of a vast champagne in a coffin which was inclosed in one of gold, another of silver, and a third of iron. With the body were interred all the spoils of the enemy, harnesses embroidered with gold and studded with jewels; rich silks, and whatever they had taken most precious in the palaces of the kings they had pillaged: and that the place of his interment might for ever remain concealed, the Huns deprived of life all who assisted at his burial!

The Goths had done nearly the same for Alaric in 410, at Kaesarea, a town in Calabria. They turned aside the river Vascotto; and having formed a grave in the midst of its bed where its course was most rapid, they interred this king with prodigious accumulation of riches. After having caused the river to reassume its usual course, they murdered without exception, all those who had been concerned in digging this singular grave.

OF VICARS OF BRAY.

The year of Bray, in Berkshire was a papist under the reign of Henry the Eighth, and a protestant under Edward the Sixth; he was a papist again under Mary, and once more became a protestant in the reign of Elizabeth. When this scandal to the gown was reproached for his versatility of religious creeds, and taxed for being a turncoat and an inconsistent changeling, as Fuller expresses it, he replied, 'Not so neither! for if I changed my religion, I am sure I kept true to my principle; which is, to live and die the vicar of Bray.'

This vivacious and reverend hero has given birth to a proverb peculiar to his county, 'The vicar of Bray will be vicar of Bray still.' But how has it happened that this story should be so notorious, and one in much higher rank, acting the same part should have escaped notice? Dr Kitchen, bishop of Llandaff, from an idle abbot under Henry VIII, was made a busy bishop; protestant under Edward, he returned to his old master under Mary; and at last took the oath of supremacy under Elizabeth, and finished as a parliament protestant. A pun spread the odium of his name; for they said that he had always loved the kitchen better than the church!

DOUGLAS.

It may be recorded as a species of Puritanic savageness and Gothic barbarism, that no later than in the year 1757, a man of genius was persecuted because he had written a tragedy which tended by no means to hurt the morals; and on the contrary, by awakening the piety of domestic spectators with the nobler passions, would rather elevate and purify the mind.

When Home, the author of the tragedy of Douglas, died at Edinburgh, and because some of the gentlemen, his acquaintance, attended the representation, the clergy, with the monastic spirit of the darkest ages, published the present paper, which I shall abridge for the contemplation of the reader, who may wonder to see such a composition written in the eighteenth century.

'On Wednesday, February the 2d, 1757, the Presbytery of Glasgow came to the following resolution. They having seen a printed paper, intitled, 'An admonition and exhortation of the reverend Presbytery of Edinburgh,' which, among other evils prevailing, observing the following melancholy but notorious facts: that one who is a minister of the church of Scotland, did himself write and compose a stage-play, intitled, "The tragedy of Douglas," and got it to be acted at the theatre of Edinburgh; and that he with several other ministers of the church were present; and some of them often than once, at the acting of the said play before a numerous audience. The presbytery being deeply affected with this new and strange appearance, do publish these sentiments, &c. Sentiments with which I will not disgust the reader; but which they appear not yet to have purified and corrected, as they have shown in the case of Logan and other Scotchmen, who have committed the crying sin of composing dramas!

CRITICAL HISTORY OF POVERTY.

Mr. Morin, in the memoirs of the French academy, has formed a little history of Poverty, which I abridge.

The writers on the genealogies of the gods have not noticed this deity's though admitted as such in the pagan heaven, while she has had temples and altars on earth. The allegorical Plato has pleasantly narrated, that at the least which Jupiter gave on the birth of Venus, Poverty modestly stood at the gate of the palace to gather the fragments of the celestial banquet; when she observed the god of riches, inebriated with nectar, roll out of the heavenly residence, and passing into the Olympian gardens, threw himself on a vernal bank. She seized this opportunity to become familiar with the god. The frolicsome deity honoured her with his caresses; and from this amour sprung the god of love who resembles his father in jollity and mirth, and his mother in his audacity. The allegory is ingenious. The union of poverty with riches, must inevitably produce the most delightful of pleasures.

The golden age, however, had but the duration of a flower; when it finished, poverty began to appear. The ancestors of the human race, if they did not meet her face to face, knew her in a partial degree; the vagrant Cain encountered her. She was firmly established in the patriarchal age. We hear of merchants who publicly practised the commerce of vending slaves, which indicates the utmost degree of poverty. She is distinctly marked by Job: this holy man protests that he had nothing to reproach himself with respecting the poor, for he had assisted them in their necessities.

In the scriptures, legislators, paid great attention to their relief. Moses, by his wise precautions, endeavoured to soften the rigours of this unhappy state. The division of lands, by tribes and families: the septennial jubilees; the regulation to bestow at the harvest time a certain portion of all the fruits of the earth for those families who were in want; and the obligation of his moral law to love one's neighbour as one's self; were so many wounds erected against the inundations of poverty. The Jews under their Theocracy had few or no mendicants. Their kings were unjust; and rapaciously seizing on inheritances which were not their right, increased the numbers of the poor. From the reign of David there were oppressive governors, who devoured the people as their bread. It was still worse under the foreign powers of Babylon, of Persia, and the Roman emperors. Such were the extortions of their publicans, and the avarice of their governors, that the number of mendicants dreadfully augmented; and it was probably for that reason that the opulent families consecrated a tenth part of their property for their succour, as appears in the time of the evangelists. In the preceding ages no more was given, as their casuists assure us, than the fortieth or thirtieth part; a custom which this unfortunate nation still practise. If there are no poor of their nation where they reside, they send it to the most distant parts. The Jewish merchants make this charity a regular charge in their transactions with each other; and at the close of the year render an account to the poor of their nation.

By the example of Moses, the ancient legislators were taught to pay a similar attention to the poor. Like him they published laws respecting the division of lands; and many ordinances were made for the benefit of those whose fires, inundations, wars, or bad harvests had reduced to want. Convinced that idleness more inevitably introduced poverty than any other cause, it was rigorously punished; the Egyptians made it criminal, and no vagabonds or mendicants were suffered under any pretence whatever. Those who were convicted of slothfulness, and still refused to labour for the public when labour was offered to them, were punished with death. The Egyptian taskmasters observed that the Israelites were an idle nation, and obliged them to furnish bricks for the erection of those famous pyramids, which are probably the works of men who otherwise had remained vagabonds and mendicants.

The same spirit inspired Greece. Lycurgus would not have in his republic either poor or rich: they lived and laboured in common. As in the present times, every family has its stores and cellars, so they had public ones, and distributed the provisions according to the ages and constitutions of the people. If the same regulation was not precisely observed by the Athenians, the Corinthians and the other people of Greece, the same maxim existed in full force against idleness.

According to the laws of Draco, Solon, &c, a conviction of wilful poverty was punished with the loss of life. Plato, more gentle in his manners, would have them only banished. He calls them enemies of the state; and pronounces as a maxim, that where there are great numbers of mendicants, fatal revolutions will happen; for as these people have nothing to lose, they plan opportunities to disturb the public repose.

The ancient Romans, whose universal object was the public prosperity, were not indebted to Greece on this head. One of the principal occupations of their censors was to keep watch on the vagabonds. Those who were condemned as incorrigible sluggards were sent to the mines, or made to labour on the public edifices. The Romans of those times, unlike the present race, did not consider the far niente as an occupation: they were convinced that their liberalities were ill-placed in bestowing them on such men. The little republics of the bees and the ants were often held out as an example; and the last, particularly where Virgil says, that they have elected overseers who correct the sluggards.

' Pars agmina cogunt,
Castigantque moras.'

Virgil.

And if we may trust the narratives of our travellers, the beavers pursue this regulation more rigorously and exactly than even these industrious societies. But their rigour, although but animals, is not so barbarous as that of the ancient Germans; who Tacitus informs us, plunged the idlers and vagabonds in the thickest mire of their marshes, and left them to perish by a kind of death which resembled their inactive dispositions.

Yet, after all, it was not inhumanity that prompted the ancients thus severely to chastise idleness: they were induced to it by a strict equity; and it would be doing them injustice to suppose, that it was thus they treated those unfortunate poor, whose indigence was occasioned by infirmities, by age or unforeseen calamities. Every family constantly assisted its branches to save them from being reduced to beggary; which to them appeared worse than death. The magistrates protected those who were destitute of friends, or incapable of labour. When Ulysses was disguised as a mendicant, and presented himself to Eurymachus, this prince observing him to be robust and healthy, offered to give him employment, or otherwise to leave him to his ill-fortune. When the Roman emperors, even in the reigns of Nero and Tiberius, bestowed their largesses, the distributors were ordered to except those from receiving a share whose bad conduct kept them in misery; for that it was better the lazy should die with hunger than be fed in idleness.

Whether the policy of the ancients was more exact, or whether they were more attentive to practise the duties of humanity, or that slavery served as an efficacious corrective of idleness; it clearly appears how little was the misery, and how few the numbers of their poor. This they did too, without having recourse to hospitals.

At the establishment of christianity, when the apostles commanded a community of wealth among their disciples, the miseries of the poor became alleviated in a greater degree. If they did not absolutely live together, as we have seen religious orders, yet the rich continually supplied their distressed brethren: but matters greatly changed under Constantine. This prince published edicts in favour of those christians who had been condemned in the preceding reigns to slavery, to the mines, the galleys, or prisons. The church felt an inundation of prodigious crowds of these miserable men, who brought with them urgent wants and corporeal infirmities. The christian families were then not numerous; they could not satisfy these claimants. The magistrates protected them; they built spacious hospitals, under different titles, for the sick, the aged, the invalids, the widows, and orphans. The emperors and the most eminent personages, were seen in these hospitals examining the patients; they assisted the helpless; they dressed the wounded. This did so much honour to the new religion that Julian the Apostate introduced this custom among the pagans. But the best things are soon customally perverted.

These retreats were found insufficient. Many slaves proud of the liberty they had just recovered, looked at them as prisons; and under various pretexts, wandered about the country. They displayed with art the scars of their former wounds, and exposed the imprinted marks of their chains. They found thus a lucrative profession in begging, which had been interdicted by the laws. The profession did not finish with them: men of an untoward, turbulent, and licentious disposition, gladly embraced it. It spread so wide that the succeeding emperors were obliged to institute new laws; and individuals were allowed to seize on these mendicants for their slaves and perpetual vassals: a powerful preservative against this disorder. It is observed in almost every part of the world, but ours and prevents that populace of beggary which disgraces Europe. China presents us with a nobler example. No beggars are seen loitering in that country. All the world is occupied, even to the blind and the lame; and only those who are incapable of labour, live at the public expense. What is done there may also be performed here. Instead of that hideous, importunate, idle, licentious poverty, a pernicious to the police as to morality, we should see the poverty of the earlier ages, humble, modest, frugal, industrious, and laborious. Then, indeed, the Utopia of Plato might be realised: Poverty may be embraced by the god of Riches; and if she did not produce the voluptuous offspring of Love, she would become the fertile mother of Agriculture, and the ingenious mother of the Arts and Manufactures.

SOLOMON AND SHEBA.

A Rabbins once told me of an ingenious invention which in the Talmud is attributed to Solomon; and this story shows that there are some pleasing tales in that immense compilation.

The power of the monarch had spread his wisdom to the remotest part of the known world. Queen Sheba, attracted by the splendour of his reputation, visited this powerful king at his own court; there, one day to exercise the sagacity of the monarch, Sheba presented herself at the foot of the throne; in each hand she held a wreath: the one was composed of natural, and the other of artificial flowers. Art, in the labour of the mimetic wreath, exquisitely emulated the lively hues of nature; so that the distance it was held by the queen for the inspection of the king, it was deemed impossible for him to decide. Her question imported, which wreath was the product of nature, and which the work of art. The sagacious Solomon seemed perplexed; yet to be vanquished, though a trifle, by a trifling woman, irritated his pride. The king of David, he who had written treatises on the vegetable productions 'from the cedar to the hyssop,' to acknowledge himself outwitted by a woman, with shreds of paper as glazed paintings! The honour of the monarch's reputation for divine sagacity seemed diminished, and the whole Jewish court looked solemn and melancholy. At length an expedient presented itself to the king; and it must I confessed worthy of the naturalist. Observing a clut of bees hovering about a window, he commanded that should be opened: it was opened; the bees rushed in the court, and alighted immediately on one of the wreaths while not a single one fixed on the other. The king Sheba had one more reason to be astonished at the wisdom of Solomon.

This would make a pretty poetical tale. It would give an elegant description, and a pleasing moral; that but only rests on the natural beauties, and never flashes as painted flowers, however imitatively the colours may!

den. Applied to the ladies, this would give it pungency. The 'Practical Education' of the Edgeworths, the reader will find a very ingenious conversation of the children out this story.

MELL.

Oldham, in his 'Satires upon the Jesuits,' a work which well admit of a curious commentary, alludes to their 'pious legends,' and the innumerable impositions they rested on the credulous. I quote a few lines in which he has collected some of those legendary miracles, which I have noticed in the article on Legends, and the scenes of the Virgin Mary, are detailed in Religious Imaginations.

Tell, how blessed Virgin to come down was seen
Like play-house punk descending in machine,
How she wit billet-doux and love discourse,
Made assignations, visits, and amours;
How boss distressed, her smock for banner wore
Which vanquished foes:—

—how flash in convecticles met,
And mackerel were with bask of doctrine caught:
How caule have judicious hearers been!
How consecrated hives with bells were hung,
And bees kept mass and holy anthems sung!
How pigs to th' rosary knesel'd, and sheep were taught
To bleat Te Deum and Magnificat;
How fly-flap, of church-censure houses rid
Of insects, which at curse of friar died.
How ferrying cows religious pilgrims bore
O'er waves, without the help of sail or oar;
How zealous crab, the sacred image bore,
And swam a catholic to the distant shore,
With stams like these the giddy rout mislead,
Their folly and their superstition feed.

All these are allusions to the extravagant fictions in the 'Golden Legend.' Among other gross impositions to deceive the mob, Oldham likewise attacks them for certain publications on topics not less singular. The tales he has mentioned, Oldham says, are only baits for children, like ape at a fair; but they have their profounder and higher lessons for the learned and inquisitive. He goes on:

One undertakes by scales of miles to tell
The bounds, dimensions, and extent of Hell;
How many German leagues that realm contains;
How many chaldrons Hell each year expends
In coals for roasting Hugonots and friends.
Another frights the rout with useful stories
Of wild Chimeræ, limbo's Purgatories;
Where blasted souls, in smoky durance hung,
Like a Westphalia gammon or neat's tongue,
To be redeemed with masses and a song.

Satyr IV.

The readers of Oldham, for Oldham must ever have read among the curious in our poetry, have been greatly disappointed in the pompous edition of a Captain Thompson, which illustrates none of his allusions. In the above Oldham alludes to some singular works.

Treatises and topographical descriptions of Hell, Purgatory, and even Heaven, were once the favourite research among certain zealous defenders of the Romish church, who exhausted their ink-horns in building up a Hell to their own taste, or for their particular purpose. We have the treatise of Cardinal Bellarmine, a jesuit, on Purgatory; he seems to have the science of a surveyor, among all the street tracks and the formidable divisions of 'the bottomless pit.'

Bellarmino informs us that there are beneath the earth different places, or a profound place divided into four parts. The deepest of these places is Hell; it contains the souls of the damned, where will be also their bodies at the resurrection, and likewise all the demons. The nearest Hell is Purgatory, where souls are purged, rather where they appease the anger of God by their torments. He says, that the same fires and the same torments are alike in both these places, the only difference between Hell and Purgatory consisting in their duration. Purgatory is the limbo of those infants who die without having received the sacrament; and the fourth is the limbo of the fathers; that is to say, of those men who died before the death of Christ. But since the day of the Redeemer, this last division is empty, like a department to be let. A later catholic theologian, the same Tillamont, condemns all the illustrious pagans to eternal torments of Hell! because they lived before the time of Jesus, and therefore could not be benefited by the redemption! Speaking of young Tiberius, who was compelled to fall on his own sword, Tillamont adds, 'Thus by his own hand he ended his miserable life, to begin another, the misery of which will never end!' Yet history records nothing bad of this prince. Jortin observes that he added this reflection in this latter edition, so that the good man as he grew older grew more uncharitable in his religious notions. It is in this manner too that the Benedictine editor of Justin Martyr speaks of the illustrious pagans. This father, after highly applauding Socrates, and a few more who resembled him inclines to think that they are not fixed in Hell. But the Benedictine editor takes great pains to clear the good father from the shameful imputation of supposing that a virtuous pagan might be saved as well as a Benedictine monk! For a curious specimen of this odium theologium, see the censure of the Sorbonne on Marmontel's Belisarius.

The adverse party, who were either philosophers or reformers, received all such information with great suspicion. Anthony Cornelli, a lawyer in the 16th century, wrote a small tract, which was so effectually suppressed, as a monster of atheism, that a copy is now only to be found in the hands of the curious. This author ridiculed the absurd and horrid doctrine of infant damnation, and was instantly decried as an atheist, and the printer prosecuted to his ruin! Cælius Secundus Curio, a noble Italian, published a treatise De Amplitudine beati regni Dei, to prove that Heaven has more inhabitants than Hell, or in his own phrase that the elect are more numerous than the reprobate. However we may incline to smile at these works, their design was benevolent. They were the first streaks of the morning light of the Reformation. Even such works assisted mankind to examine more closely, and hold in greater contempt, the extravagant and pernicious doctrines of the domineering papistical church.

THE ABSENT MAN.

With the character of Bruyere's Absent Man the reader is well acquainted. It is translated in the Spectator, and it has been exhibited on the theatre. The general opinion runs that it is a fictitious character, or at least one the author has too highly coloured. It was well known however to his contemporaries to be the Count De Brancas. The present anecdotes concerning the same person have been unknown to, or forgotten by, Bruyere; and are to the full as extraordinary as those which characterize Ménelas, or the Absent Man.

The count was reading by the fire-side, (but Heaven knows with what degree of attention,) when the nurse brought him his infant child. He throws down the book; he takes the child in his arms. He was playing with her, when an important visitor was announced. Having forgot he had quitted his book, and that it was his child he held in his hands, he hastily flung the squalling innocent on the table.

The Count was walking in the street, and the Duke de la Rochefoucault crossed the way to speak to him. 'God bless thee, poor man!' exclaimed the count. Rochefoucault smiled, and was beginning to address him:—'Is it not enough,' cried the count, interrupting him, and somewhat in a passion; 'it is not enough that I have said, at first, I have nothing for you? such lazy beggars as you hinder a gentleman from walking the streets.' Rochefoucault burst into a loud laugh, and awakening the Absent Man from his lethargy, he was not a little surprised, himself, that he should have taken his friend for an importunate mendicant! La Fontaine is recorded to have been one of the most absent of men; and Furetiere relates a circumstance which, if true, is one of the most singular distractions possible. La Fontaine attended the burial of one of his friends, and sometime afterwards he called to visit him. At first he was shocked at the information of his death, but recovering from his surprise, he observed—'It is true enough! for now I recollect I went to his funeral.'

WAX-WORK.

We have heard of many curious deceptions occasioned by the imitative powers of wax-work. A series of anatomical sculptures in coloured wax projected by the Grand Duke of Tuscany, under the direction of Fontana. Twenty apartments have been filled with these curious imitations. They represent in every possible detail, and in each successive stage of denudation, the organs of sense and production; the muscular, the vascular, the nervous, and the bony system. They imitate equally well the form, and more exactly the colouring of nature than injected preparations; and they have been employed to perpetuate many transient phenomena of disease, of which no other court could have made so lively a record.

There is a species of wax-work, which, though it can hardly claim the honours of the fine arts, is adapted to afford much pleasure. I mean figures of wax, which may be modelled with the great truth of character.

Ménage has noticed a work of this kind. In the year 1675, the Duke de Maine received a gilt cabinet, about the size of a moderate table. On the door was inscribed, 'The apartment of Wit.' The inside exhibited an alcove and a long gallery. In an arm-chair was seated the figure of the duke himself composed of wax, the resemblance the most perfect imaginable. On one side stood the Duke de la Rochefoucault, to whom he presented a paper of verses for his examination. Mr de Marcellac and Boesuet Bishop of Meaux, were standing near the arm-chair. In the alcove, Madame de Thiangues and Madame de la Fayette sat retired reading a book. Boileau, the satirist stood at the door of the gallery, hindering seven or eight bad poets from entering. Near Boileau stood Racine who seemed to beckon to La Fontaine to come forward. All these figures were formed of wax; and this philosophical baby-house, interesting for the personages it imitated, might induce a wish in some philosophers to play once more with one.

There was lately an old canon at Cologne who made a collection of small wax models of characteristic figures, such as, personifications of misery, in a haggard old man with a scanty crust and a brown jug before him: or of avarice in a keen looking Jew miser counting his gold, which were done with such a spirit and reality that a Flemish painter a Hogarth or Wilkie, could hardly have worked up the feeling of the figure more impressively. All these were done with a truth and expression which I could not have imagined the wax capable of exhibiting, says the lively writer of 'an Autumn on the Rhine.' There is something very infantine in this taste; but I have preserved it long in life, and only lament that it is very rarely gratified by such close copiers of nature as was this old canon of Cologne.

PASQUIN AND MARFORIO.

All the world have heard of these statues: they have served as vehicles for the keenest satire in a land of the most uncontrolled despotism. The statue of Pasquin (from whence the word pasquinade) and that of Marforio are placed in Rome in two different quarters. Marforio's is an ancient statue that lies at its whole length: either Panarium Jovum; or the river Rhine. That of Pasquin is a marble statue, greatly mutilated, which stands at the corner of the palace of the Ursinos supposed to be the figure of a gladiator. Whatever they may have been is now of little consequence; to one or other of these statues, during the concealment of the night are affixed those satires or lampoons which the authors wish should be dispersed about Rome without any danger to themselves. When Marforio is attacked, Pasquin comes to his succour and when Pasquin is the sufferer he finds in Marforio a constant defender. Thus, by a thrust and a parry, the most serious matters are disclosed; and the most illustrious personages are attacked by their enemies, and defended by their friends.

Misson in his travels in Italy, gives the following account of the origin of the name of the statue of Pasquin:—

A satirical tailor, who lived at Rome, and whose name was Pasquin, amused himself with severe railery, liberally bestowed on those who passed by his shop; which in time became the lounge of the news-mongers. The tailor had precisely the talent to head a regiment of satirical wits, and had he had time to publish, he would have been the Peter Pindar of his day; but his genius seems to have been satisfied to rest cross-legged on his shop-board. When any lampoons or amusing bon-mots were current in Rome, they were usually called from his shop, pasquinades. After his death this statue of an ancient gladiator was found under the pavement of his shop. It was soon set up; and by universal consent was inscribed with his name; and they still attempt to raise him from the dead, and keep the caustic tailor alive, in the marble gladiator of wit.

There is a very rare work, with this title:—'Pasquillorum, Tomi Duo.' The first containing the verse, and the second the prose pasquinades published at Basle, 1564.

The rarity of this collection of satirical pieces is entirely owing to the arts of suppression practised by the papal government. Sallengre, in his Literary Memoirs, gives an account of this work; his own copy had formerly belonged to Daniel Heinsius, who, in two verses, written in his hand, describes its rarity and the price it cost.

Roma meos fratres igni dedidit, unica Phoenix
Vivo, auriusque venio centum Henio.

'Rome gave my brothers to the flames, but I survive a solitary Phoenix. Heinsius bought me for a hundred gold ducats.'

This collection contains a great number of pieces composed at different times, against the popes, cardinals, &c. They are not indeed materials for the historian, and they must be taken with grains of allowance; but Mr Roscoe might have discovered in these epigrams and puns, that his hero Leo X., and the more than infamous Lucretius Alexander VI.; even the corrupt Romans of the day were capable of expressing themselves with the utmost freedom.* Of these three respectable personages we find several epitaphs. Of Alexander VI we have an apostrophe for his conduct.

Vendit Alexander Claves, altaris, Christum, Emerat ille prius, venders jure potest.

'Alexander sells the keys, the altars, and Christ; As he bought them first, he had a right to sell them?'

On Lucretia:—

Hoc tumultu dormit Lucretia nomine, sed re
Thais; Alexandri filia, sponsa, nurus!

'Beneath this stone sleeps Lucretia by name, but by nature Thais; the daughter, the wife, the daughter-in-law: Alexander!'

Leo X was a frequent butt for the arrows of Pasquin:—

Sacra sub extrema, si forte requiritis, hora
Cur Leo non potuit sumere; vendidit.

'Do you ask why the Lion did not take the sacrament at his death-bed?—How could he? He had sold it.'

Many of these satirical touches depend on puns. Urban VII., one of the Barberini family, pillaged the pantheons of brass to make cannon, on which occasion Pasquin was made to say—

Quod non fecerunt Barbari Romæ, fecit Barberini.

On Clement VII., whose death was said to be occasioned by the prescriptions of his Physician:

Curtius occidit Clementem, Curtius euro
Donandus, per quem publica parva salus.

'Dr Curtius has killed the pope by his remedies; he ought to be paid as a man who deserves well of the state.'

Another calls Dr Curtius, 'The Lamb of God who a nuls or takes away all worldly sins.'

The following, on Paul III., are singular conceptions:—

Papa Medusæum caput est, coma turba Nepotum;
Perseus cæcis caput, Cæsaries perit.

'The pope is the head of Medusa; the horrid tresses are his nephews; Perseus, cut off the head, and then we shall be rid of these serpent-locks.'

Another is sarcastic—

Ut canerent data multa olim sunt Vastibus æra:
Ut taceam, quantum tu mihi, Paule, dabis?

'Heretofore money was given to poets that they might sing how much will you give me, Paul, to be silent?'

The collection contains, among other classes, passages from the Scriptures which have been applied to the court of Rome; to different nations and persons; and one of 'Sætes Virgiliana per Pasquillum collecta.'—passages from Virgil frequently happily applied and those who are curious in the history of those times, will find this portion interesting. The work itself not quite so rare as D

* It appears by a note in Mr Roscoe's catalogue of his library, that three of the satirical epigrams here cited, are given in the Life of Leo X. At this distance of time I cannot account for my own inadvertency. It has been, however, the occasion of calling down from Mr Roscoe an admirable reflection which I am desirous of preserving, as a caution of criticism. 'It is much safer, in general, to speak of the contents of books positively than negatively, as the latter requires that it should first be read.' I regret that our elegant and nerve waiter should have considered a casual inadvertence as worth his attention.

not Hainseius imagined; the price might now reach from five to ten guineas.

Marforio is a statue of Mars, found in the Forum; which the people have corrupted into Mar forio. These statues are placed at opposite ends of the town, so that there is always sufficient time to make Marforio reply to the gibes and jeers of Pasquin, in walking from one to the other. I am obliged for the information to my friend Mr Daps, the elegant biographer of Michael Angelo.

FEMALE BEAUTY AND ORNAMENTS.

The ladies in Japan dig their teeth; and those of the Javes paint them red. The pearl of teeth must be dyed black to be beautiful in Guzurat. In Greenland the women colour their faces with blue and yellow. However such the complexion of a Muscovite may be, she would think herself very ugly if she was not plastered over with paint. The Chinese must have their feet as diminutive as those of the she goats; and to render them thus, their youth is passed in tortures. In ancient Persia, an aquiline nose was often thought worthy of the crown; and if there was any conception between two princes, the people generally went by this criterion of majesty. In some countries, the mothers break the noses of their children; and in other press the head between two boards, that it may become square. The modern Persians have a strong aversion to red hair; the Turks, on the contrary, are warm admirers of it. The female Hottentot receives from the hand of her lover, not silk or wreaths of flowers, but warm guts and recking tripe, to dress herself with enviable ornaments.

In China small round eyes are liked; and the girls are customarily plucking their eye-brows that they may be thin and long. The Turkish women dip a gold brush in the mixture of a black drug, which they pass over their eye-brows. It is too visible by day, but looks shining by night. They tinge their nails with a rose-colour: An African beauty must have small eyes, thick lips, a large flat nose, and a skin beautifully black. The Emperor of Monomotapa would not change his amiable negress for the most brilliant European beauty.

An ornament for the nose appears to us perfectly unnecessary. The Peruvians, however, think otherwise; and they hang on it a weighty ring, the thickness of which is proportioned by the rank of their husbands. The custom of boring it, as our ladies do their ears, is very common in several nations. Through the perforation are hung various materials; such as green crystal, gold stones, a single and sometimes a great number of gold rings. This is rather troublesome to them in blowing their noses; and the fact is, some have informed us, that the Indian ladies never perform this very useful operation.

The female head-dress is carried in some countries to singular extravagance. The Chinese fair carries on her head the figure of a certain bird. This bird is composed of copper, or of gold, according to the quality of the person: The wings spread out, fall over the front of the head-dress, and conceal the temples. The tail, long and open, forms a beautiful tuft of feathers. The beak covers the top of the nose; the neck is fastened to the body of the artificial animal by a spring, that it may the more freely play, and tremble at the slightest motion.

The extravagance of the Myntasos is far more ridiculous than the above. They carry on their heads a slight board, rather longer than a foot, and about six inches broad: with this they cover their hair, and seal it with wax. They cannot lie down, nor lean, without keeping the neck straight; and the country being very woody, it is not uncommon to find them with their head-dress entangled in the trees; whenever they comb their hair, they pass an hour by the slow in melting the wax; but this combing is only performed once or twice a year.

The inhabitants of the land of Natal wear caps, or bonnets, from six to ten inches high composed of the fat of cows. They then gradually anoint the head with a purer essence, which mixing with the hair, fastens the bonnets to their lives.

MODERN PLATONISM.

Erasmus in his age of religious revolution expressed an opinion, which in some shape has been since realized. He strongly, yet acutely observes, that 'literature began to make a great and happy progress; but,' he adds, 'I fear two things, that the study of Hebrew will promote Judaism, and the study of philology will revive Paganism.' He speaks to the same purpose in the Adages, c. 169 as Jortin observes, p. 90. Blackwell in his curious Life of Homer, after showing that the ancient oracles were the fountains of knowledge, and that the god of Delphi actually was believed by the votaries, from the oracle's perfect acquaintance with the country, parentage, and fortunes of the suppliant, and many predictions having been verified; that besides all this, the oracles that have reached us discover a wide knowledge of every thing relating to Greece;—he is at a loss to account for a knowledge that he thinks has something divine in it: it was a knowledge to be found nowhere in Greece but among the oracles. He would account for this phenomenon, by supposing there existed a succession of learned men devoted to this purpose. He says, 'Either we must admit the knowledge of the priests, or turn converts to the ancients, and believe in the omniscience of Apollo, which in this age I know nobody in hazard of. Yet to the astonishment of this writer, were he now living, he would have witnessed this incredible fact! Even Erasmus himself might have wondered.

We discover the origin of modern platonism, as it may be distinguished among the Italians. About the middle of the fifteenth century, some time before the Turks had become masters of Constantinople, a great number of philosophers flourished. Gemisthus Pletho was once distinguished by his genius, his erudition, and his fervent passion for platonism. Mr Roscoe notices Pletho; 'His discourses had so powerful an effect upon Cosmo de Medici, who was his constant auditor, that he established an academy at Florence for the sole purpose of cultivating this new and more elevated species of philosophy.' The learned Marsilio Ficino translated Plotinus, that great archmage of platonic mysticism. Such were Pletho's eminent abilities, that in his old age those whom his novel system had greatly irritated, either feared or respected him. He had scarcely breathed his last when they began to abuse Plato and our Pletho. The following account is written by George of Trebizond.

'Lately has arisen amongst us a second Mahomet: and this second, if we do not take care, will exceed in greatness the first, by the dreadful consequences of his wicked doctrine, as the first has exceeded Plato. A disciple and rival of this philosopher in philosophy, in eloquence, and in science, he had fixed his residence in the Peloponnese. His common name was Gemisthus, but he assumed that of Pletho. Perhaps Gemisthus, to make us believe more easily that he was descended from heaven, and to engage us to receive more readily his doctrine and his new law, wished to change his name, according to the manner of the ancient patriarchs; of whom it is said, that at the time the name was changed they were called to the greatest things. He has written with no vulgar art, and with no common elegance. He has given new rules for the conduct of life, and for the regulation of human affairs; and at the same time has vomited forth a great number of blasphemies against the catholic religion. He was so zealous a platonist that he entertained no other sentiments than those of Plato, concerning the nature of the gods, souls, sacrifices, &c. I have heard him myself, when we were together at Florence, say, that in a few years all men on the face of the earth would embrace with one common consent, and with one mind, a single and simple religion, at the first instructions which should be given by a single preaching. And when I asked him if it would be the religion of Jesus Christ, or that of Mahomet? he answered, "Neither one nor the other; but a third, which will not greatly differ from paganism." These words I heard with so much indignation, that since that time I have always hated him: I look upon him as a dangerous viper; and I cannot think of him without abhorrence.'

The pious writer of this account is too violently agitated: he might perhaps, have bestowed a smile of pity or contempt; but the bigots and fanatics are not less insane than the impious themselves.

It was when Pletho died full of years and honours, that the malice of his enemies collected all its venom. A circumstance that seems to prove that his abilities must have been great indeed to have kept such crowds silent: and it is not improbable, this scheme of impiety was less impious than some people imagined. Not a few catholic writers lament that his book was burnt, and greatly regret the loss of Pletho's work; which, they say, was not meant to subvert the christian religion, but only to unfold the system of Plato and to collect what he and other philosophers had written on religion and politics.

Of his religious scheme, the reader may judge by this summary account. The general title of the volume ran thus: 'This book treats of the laws of the best form of government, and what all men must observe in their public and private stations, to live together in the most perfect, the most innocent, and the most happy manner.' The whole was divided into three books. The titles of the chapters where paganism was openly inculcated, are reported by Gennadius, who condemned it to the flames, but who has not thought proper to enter into the manner of his arguments, &c. The impiety and the extravagance of this new legislator appeared above all, in the articles which concerned religion. He acknowledges a plurality of gods; some superior, whom he placed above the heavens; and the others inferior, on this side the heavens. The first existing from the remotest antiquity; the others younger, and of different ages. He gave a king to all these gods; and he called him ZEYU, or Jupiter, as the pagans named this power formerly. According to him, the stars had a soul; the demons were not malignant spirits; and the world was eternal. He established polygamy, and was even inclined to a community of women. All his work was filled with such reveries, and with not a few impieties, which my pious author will not venture to give.

What the intentions of Pletho were, it would be rash to determine. If the work was only an arrangement of paganism, or the platonic philosophy, it might have been an innocent, if not a curious volume. He was learned and humane, and had not passed his life entirely in the solitary recesses of his study.

To strain human curiosity to the utmost limits of human credibility, a modern Pletho has arisen in Mr Thomas Taylor, who, consonant to the platonic philosophy, at the present day religiously professes polytheism! At the close of the eighteenth century, he it recorded, were published many volumes, in which the author affects to avow himself a zealous Platonist, and asserts he can prove that the christian religion is a 'bastardized and barbarized Platonism!' The divinities of Plato are the divinities to be adored, and we are to be taught to call God Jupiter: the Virgin, Venus; and Christ, Cupid! And the Iliad of Homer allegorized, is converted into a Greek bible of the arcana of nature! Extraordinary as this literary lunacy may appear, we must observe, that it stands not singular in the annals of the history of the human mind. The Florentine academy which Cosmo founded, had, no doubt, some classical enthusiasts; but who, perhaps according to the political character of their country, were prudent and reserved. The platonic furor, however, appears to have reached other countries. The following remarkable anecdote has been given by St. Foix, in his 'Essais historiques sur Paris.' In the reign of Louis XII, a scholar named Hemon de la Fosse, a native of Abbeville, by continually reading and admiring the Greek and Latin writers, became mad enough to persuade himself that it was impossible that the religion of such great geniuses as Homer, Cicero, and Virgil was a false one. On the 25th of August, 1503, being at church, he suddenly snatched the host from the hands of the priest, at the moment it was raised, exclaiming; 'what! always this folly!' He was immediately seized and put in prison. In the hope that he would abjure his extravagant errors, they delayed his punishment; but no exhortation nor intreaties availed. He persisted in maintaining that Jupiter was the sovereign God of the universe, and that there was no other paradise than the Elysian fields. He was burnt alive, after having first had his tongue pierced, and his hand cut off. Thus perished an ardent and learned youth, who ought only to have been condemned as a Bedlamite.

Dr More, the most rational of our modern Platonists, abounds, however, with the most extravagant reveries, and was inflated with egotism and enthusiasm, as much as any of his mystic predecessors. He conceived that he had an intercourse with the divinity itself! that he had been shot as a fiery dart into the world, and he hoped he had hit the mark. He carried his self-conceit to such extravagance, that he thought his urine smelt like violets, and his body in the spring season had a sweet odour; a perfection peculiar to himself. These visionaries indulge the most fanciful vanity.

ANECDOTES OF FASHION.

ing, and perhaps more capriciously grotesque, though infinitely less taste than the present generation. When philosopher and an artist, as well as an antiquary, to compose such a work, much diversified entertainment, & some curious investigation of the progress of the arts & taste, would doubtless be the result: the subject otherwise appears of trifling value; the very farthing pieces of history.

The origin of many fashions was in the endeavor to conceal some deformity of the inventor; hence the cushion ruffs, hoops, and other monstrous devices. If a reigning beauty chanced to have an unequal hip, those who were very handsome hips, would load them with that false ruff which the other was compelled by the unkindness of a tutor to substitute. Patches were invented in England: the reign of Edward VI by a foreign lady, who in that manner ingeniously covered a wen on her neck. When the Spectator wrote, full-bottomed wigs were invented by a French barber, one DuViller, whose name they perpetuated, for the purpose of concealing an elevation in the shoulder of the Dauphin. Charles VII of France introduced long coats to hide his ill-made legs. Shoes were very long points, full two feet in length, were invented by Henry Plantagenet Duke of Anjou, to conceal a large increase on one of his feet. When Francis I was obliged to wear his short hair, owing to a wound he received in his head, it became a prevailing fashion at court. Other on the contrary adapted fashions to set off their peculiar beauties, as Isabella of Bavaria, remarkable for her gallantry, and the fairness of her complexion, introduced the fashion of leaving the shoulders and part of the neck uncovered.

Fashions have frequently originated from circumstance as silly as the following one. Isabella, daughter of Philip II, and wife of the Archduke Albert, vowed not to change her linen till Ostend was taken; this siege, unluckily for her comfort, lasted three years; and the supposed colour of the archduchess's linen gave rise to a fashionable colour hence called L'Isabeau, or the Isabella; a kind of whitish yellow-dingy. Or sometimes they originate in some temporary event; as after the battle of Steenkirke, where the allies wore large cravats, by which the French frequently seized hold of them, a circumstance perpetuated on the medals of Louis XIV, cravats were called Steenkirks; and after the battle of Ramillies, wigs received that denomination.

The court in all ages and in every country are the modelers of fashions, so that all the ridicule, of which they are so susceptible, must fall on them, and not upon their servile imitators the citizens. This complaint is made even so far back as in 1586, by Jean des Caures, an old French moralist, who, in declaiming against the fashions of his day, notices one, of the ladies carrying mirrors fixed to their waists, which seemed to employ their eyes in perpetual activity. From this mode will result, according to honest Des Caures, their eternal damnation. 'Alas (he exclaims,) in what an age do we live; to see such depravity which we see, that induces them even to bring into church these scandalous mirrors hanging about their waist! Let all histories divine, human, and profane be consulted; never will it be found that these objects of vanity were ever thus brought into public by the most meretricious of the sex. It is true, at present none but the ladies of the court venture to wear them; but long it will not be before every citizen's daughter, and every female servant, will wear them!' Such in all times has been the rise and decline of fashion; and the absurd mimicry of the citizens, even of the low-st class, to their very ruin, in straining to rival the newest fashion, has mortified and galled the courtier.

On this subject old Camden, in his remains, relates a story of a trick played off on a citizen, which I give in the plainness of his own venerable style. 'Sir Philip Calthorpe, purged John Drakes, the shoemaker of Norwich, in the time of King Henry VIII, of the proud humour which our people have to be of the gentleman's cut. This knight bought on a time as much fine French tawny cloth as should make him a gown, and sent it to the tailor's to be made. John Drakes, a shoemaker of that town, coming to this said tailor's, and seeing the knight's gown cloth laying there, liking it well, caused the tailor to buy him as much of the same cloth and price to the same extent, and further bade him to make it of the same fashion, that the knight would have his made of. Not long after, the knight coming to the tailor's to take the measure of his gown, perceiving the like cloth lying there, asked of the tailor whose it was? Quoth the tailor, it is John Drakes the shoemaker, who will have it made of the self-same fashion that yours is made

"Well!" said the knight, "in good time be it! I will have mine made as full of cuts as the shears can make." "It shall be done!" said the tailor; whereupon, because the time drew near, he made haste to finish both their garments. John Drakes had no time to go to the tailor's till Christmas day, for serving his customers, when he hoped to have worn his gown; perceiving the same to be full of cuts, began to swear at the tailor, for the making his gown after that sort. "I have done nothing," quoth the tailor, "but that you bid me, for as Sir Philip Calisher's garment is, even so have I made yours!" "By my larch!" quoth John Drakes, "I will never wear gentlemen's fashions again."

Sometimes fashions are quite reversed in their use in one age from another. Bags, when first in fashion in France, were only worn as dishabille; in visits of ceremony, the hair was tied by a riband and floated over the shoulders, which is exactly reversed in the present fashion. In the year 1755 the men had no hats but a little chapeau de bras; in 1745 they wore a very small hat; in 1755 they wore an enormous one, as may be seen in Jeffrey's curious 'Collection of Habits in all Nations.' Old Puttenham, in his very rare work, 'The Arts of Poesie,' p. 239, on the present topic gives some curious information. Henry VIII caused his own head, and all his courtiers to be pulled, and his beard to be cut short; before that time it was thought more decent, both for old men and young, to be all shaven, and wear long hair, either rounded or square. Now again at this time (Elizabeth's reign), the young gentlemen of the court have taken up the long hair, laying on their shoulders, and think this more decent; for what respect I would be glad to know."

When the fair sex were accustomed to behold their lovers with beards, the sight of a shaved chin excited feelings of horror and aversion; as much indeed as, in this less heroic age, would a gallant whose luxurious beard should

'Stream like a meteor to the troubled air.'

When Louis VII, to obey the injunctions of his bishops, shaved his hair, and shaved his beard, Eleanor, his consort, loathed him, with this unusual appearance, very ridiculous, and soon very contemptible. She revenged herself by the thought proper, and the poor shaved king obtained a divorce. She then married the Count of Anjou, afterwards our Henry II. She had for her marriage dower the rich provinces of Poitou and Guyenne, and this was the origin of those wars which for three hundred years ravaged France, and cost the French three millions of lives. All which, probably, had never occurred, had Louis VII not been so rash as to crop his head and shave his beard, by which he became so disgusting in the eyes of the Queen Eleanor.

We cannot perhaps sympathize with the feelings of horror, though at Constantinople she might not have been considered quite unreasonable. There must be something more powerful in beards and mustachios than we are quite aware of; for when these were in fashion, with what enthusiasm were they not contemplated! When mustachios were in general use, an author, in his Elements of Education, published in 1640, thinks that 'hairy Excrements,' as Armand in 'Love's Labour Lost' calls it, contributed to make men valorous. He says, 'I have a favorable opinion of that young gentleman who is curious in his mustachios.' The time he employs in adjusting, dressing, and curling them, is no lost time; for the more he contemplates his mustachios, the more his mind will flourish, and be animated by masculine and courageous notions. The best reason that could be given for wearing the longest and largest beard of any Englishman, was that of a worthy clergyman in Elizabeth's reign, 'that no act of his life might be unworthy of the gravity of his appearance.'

The grandfather of the Mrs Thomas, the Corinna of Cowell, the literary friend of Pope, by her account, was very nice in the mode of that age, his valet being sent every morning in starching his beard, and curling his whiskers; during which time he was always reading Taylor, the water poet, humorously describes the great variety of beards in his time, which extract may be found in Grey's Hudibras, Vol. I, p. 300. The beard, says Granger, dwindled gradually under the two Charles's, it was reduced into whiskers, and became extinct in the reign of James II, as if its fatality had been connected with that of the house of Stuart.

The hair has in all ages been an endless topic of the declamation of the moralist, and the favourite object of fashion. If the beau monde wore their hair luxuriant, or their wig enormous, the preachers, as in Charles the Second's reign, instantly were seen in the pulpit with their hair cut shorter, and their sermon longer, in consequence; respect was however paid by the world to the size of the wig, in spite of the hair-cutter in the pulpit. Our judges, and till lately our physicians, well knew its magical effect. In the reign of Charles II the hair-dress of the ladies was very elaborate; it was not only curled and frizzed with the nicest art, but set off with certain artificial curls, then too emphatically known by the pathetic term of hair-breakers and love-locks. So late as William and Mary, ladies, and even children wore wigs; and if they had not wigs, they curled their hair to resemble this fashionable ornament. Women then were the hair-dressers.

It is observed by the lively Vigneul de Marville, that there are flagrant follies in fashion which must be endured while they reign, and which never appear ridiculous till they are out of fashion. In the reign of Henry III of France, they could not exist without an abundant use of comfits. All the world, the grave and the gay, carried in their pocket a comfit-box as we do snuff-boxes. They used them even on the most solemn occasions: when the Duke of Guise was shot at Blois, he was found with his comfit-box in his hand. Fashions indeed have been carried to so extravagant a length as to have become a public offence, and to have required the interference of government. Short and tight breeches were so much the rage in France, that Charles V was compelled to banish this disgusting mode by edicts which may be found in Mezeray. An Italian author of the fifteenth century supposes an Italian traveller of nice modesty would not pass through France, that he might not be offended by seeing men whose clothes rather exposed their nakedness than hid it. It is curious that the very same fashion was the complaint in the remoter period of our Chaucer, in his Parson's Tale.

In the reign of our Elizabeth the reverse of all this took place; then the mode of enormous breeches was pushed to a most laughable excess. The beaus of that day stuffed out their breeches with rags, feathers, and other light matters, till they brought them out to a most enormous size. They resembled wool-sacks, and in a public spectacle, they were obliged to raise scaffolds for the seats of those ponderous beaus. To accord with this fantastical taste the ladies invented large hoop farthingales. Two lovers aside could surely never have taken one another by the hand. In a preceding reign the fashion ran on square-toes; inasmuch that a proclamation was issued that no person should wear shoes above six inches square at the toes! Then succeeded picked-pointed shoes! The nation was again, in the reign of Elizabeth, put under the royal authority. 'In that time,' says honest John Stowe, 'he was held the greatest gallant that had the deepest ruffe and longest rapier: the offence to the eye of the one and hurt unto the life of the subject that come by the other: this caused her Majesty to make proclamation against them both, and to place selected grave citizens at every gate to cut the ruffes, and break the rapier points of all passengers that exceeded a yard in length of their rapiers, and a naylor of a yard in depth of their ruffes.' These 'grave citizens,' at every gate cutting the ruffes and breaking the rapiers, must doubtless have encountered in their ludicrous employment some stubborn opposition; but this regulation was, in the spirit of that age, despotic and effectual. The late Emperor of Russia ordered the soldiers to stop every passenger who wore pantaloons, and with their hangers to cut off, upon the leg, the offending part of these superfluous breeches; so that a man's legs depended greatly on the adroitness and humanity of a Russ or a Cossack; however this war against pantaloons was very successful, and obtained a complete triumph in favour of the breeches in the course of the week.

A shameful extravagance in dress has been a most venerable folly. In the reign of Richard II, their dress was sumptuous beyond belief. Sir John Arundel had a change of no less than 52 new suits of cloth of gold tissue. The prelates indulged in all the ostentatious luxury of dress. Chaucer says, they had 'chaunge of clothing everie daie.' Brantome records of Elizabeth, Queen of Philip II, of Spain, that she never wore a gown twice; it was told him by her majesty's own tailleur, who from a poor man soon became as rich as any one he knew. Our own Elizabeth left no less than three thousand different habits in her wardrobe.

robe when she died. She was possessed of the dresses of all countries.

The catholic religion has ever considered the pomp of the clerical habit as not the slightest part of its religious ceremonies; their devotion is addressed to the eye of the people. In the reign of our catholic Queen Mary, the dress of a priest was costly indeed; and the sarcastic and good-humoured Fuller gives, in his Worthies, the will of a priest, to show the wardrobe of men of his order, and desires that the priest may not be jeered for the gallantry of his splendid apparel. He bequeaths to various parish churches and persons, 'My vestment of crimson satin—my vestment of crimson velvet—my stole and fannon set with pearl—my black gown faced with taffeta, &c.'

Chaucer has minutely detailed in 'The Person's Tale,' the grotesque and the costly fashions of his day; and the simplicity of the venerable satirist will interest the antiquary and the philosopher. Much, and curiously, have his caustic severity or lenient humour descended on the moche superfluitiee, and 'wast of cloth in vanities,' as well as 'the disordinate scantnesse.' In the spirit of the good old times he calculates 'the cooste of the embrouding or embroidering; endenting or baring; ouniding or wavy; paling or imitating pales; and winding or bending; the costlewre furring in the gounes; so much poussouning of chesol to maken holes (that is punched with a bodkin); so moche dagging of sheres (cutting into slips); with the superfluitiee in length of the gounes trailing in the dong and in the myrre, on horse and eke on foot, as wel of man as of woman—that all thilke trailing,' he verily believes, which wastes, consumes, wears threadbare, and is rotten with dung, are all to the damage of 'the poor folk,' who might be clothed only out of the founcces and draggo-tails of these children of vanity. But then his Parson is not less bitter against 'the horrible disordinate scantnesse of clothing,' and very copiously he describes, though perhaps in terms, and with a humour too coarse for me to transcribe, the consequences of these very tight dresses. Of these persons, among other offensive matters, he sees 'the buttockes behind as if they were the hinder part of a sheape in the ful of the mone.' He notices one of the most grotesque of all modes; that one they then had of wearing a parti-coloured dress; one stocking, part white and part red; so that they looked as if they had been flayed; or white and blue; or white and black; or black and red; that this variety of colours seems as if their members had been corrupted by St Anthony's fire, or by cancer, or other mischance!

The modes of dress during the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries were so various and ridiculous, that they afforded perpetual food for the eager satirist. Extravagant as some of our fashions are, they are regulated by a better taste.

The conquests of Edward III introduced the French fashions into England; and the Scotch adopted them by their alliances with the French court, and close intercourse with that nation.

Walsingham dates the introduction of French fashions among us, from the taking of Calais in 1347; but we appear to have possessed such a rage for imitation in dress, that an English beau was actually a fantastical compound of all the fashions of Europe, and even Asia, in the reign of Elizabeth. In Chaucer's time the prevalence of French fashions was a common topic with our satirist; and he notices the affectation of our female citizens in speaking the French language: a stroke of satire which, after more than four centuries, is not yet obsolete. A superior education, and a residence at the west end of the town, begin however, to give another character to the daughters of our citizens. In the prologue to the Prioresse, Chaucer has these humorous lines:—

Entwined in her voice full seemly,
And French she spake full feotously;
After the scole of Stratford at Bowe,
The French of Paris was to her unknowne.

A beau of the reign of Henry IV has been made out by the laborious Henry. I shall only observe, that they wore then long-pointed shoes to such an immoderate length, that they could not walk till they were fastened to their knees with chains. Luxury improving on this ridiculous mode, these chains the English beau of the fourteenth century had made of gold and silver; but the grotesque fashion did not finish here; for the tops of their shoes were carved in the manner of a church window. The ladies of that period were not less fantastical.

The wild variety of dresses worn in the reign of Henry VIII, is alluded to in a print of a naked Englishman holding a piece of cloth hanging on his right arm, and a pair of shears in his left hand. It was invented by Andre Borde, a facetious wit of those days. The print bears the following inscription:—

I am an Englishman, and naked I stand here,
Musing in my mind, what rayment I shall weare.
For now I will were this, and now I will were that,
And now I will were, what I cannot tell what.

At a lower period, about the reign of Elizabeth, we are presented with a curious picture of a man of fashion. I make this extract from Puttenham's very scarce work The Art of Poetry, p. 250. This author was a traveller, courtier, and has interspersed his curious work with many lively anecdotes, and correct pictures of the times.—This is his fantastical beau in the reign of Elizabeth. 'May I not seeme enough for a courtier to know how to weare: feather and set his cappe afloat; his chain en echappe; straight buskin, all Ingless; a loosee a la Turquesque; the cape alla Spaniola; the breech a la Françoise; and by twentie manner of new-fashioned garments, to disguise his body and his face with as many countenances, whereof it seems there be many that make a very arte and stodie who can show himselfe most fine, I will not say most foolish or ridiculous.' So that a beau of those times wore the same dress a grotesque mixture of all the fashions of the world. About the same period the law ran in a different course in France. There, fashion consisted in an affected negligence of dress; for Montaigne honestly comments in Book i, Cap. 25—I have never yet been apt to imitate the negligent garb which is yet observable among the young men of our time; to wear my cloak on one shoulder, my bonnet on one side, and one stocking in something more disorder than the other, meant to express a manly disdain of such exotic ornaments, and a contempt of art.'

The fashions of the Elizabethan age have been chronicled by honest John Stowe. Stowe was originally a tailor, and when he laid down the shears and took up the pen the taste and curiosity for dress was still retained. He is the grave chronicler of matters not grave. The chronology of ruffs, and tufted taffetas; the revolution of steel pinning-sticks, instead of the bone or wood used by the laundresses; the invasion of shoe buckles, and the total ruin of shoe roses; that grand adventure of a certain Flemish lady, who introduced the art of starching the ruffs with a yellow tinge into Britain; while Mrs Mountague commended her in the royal favour, by presenting her highness the queen with a pair of black silk stockings, instead of her cloth hose, which her majesty now forever rejected the heroic achievements of the Right Honourable Edward de Vere, Earl of Oxford, who first brought from Italy the whole mystery and craft of perfumery, and cost washes; and among other pleasant things besides, a perfumed jerkin, a pair of perfumed gloves trimmed with roses, in which the queen took such delight, that she was actually pictured with those gloves on her royal hands, as for many years after, the scent was called the Earl of Oxford's Perfume. These, and other occurrences as memorable, receive a pleasant kind of historical pomp in the important, and not incurious, narrative of the antiquary as the tailor. The toilet of Elizabeth was indeed an altar of devotion, of which she was the idol, and all her ministers were her votaries; it was the reign of coquetry, and a golden age of millinery! But of grace and elegance, she had not the slightest feeling! There is a print by Vertue of Queen Elizabeth going in a procession to Lord Humdon. This procession is led by Lady Hunedon, who I doubt was the leader likewise of the fashions; but it is impossible, with our ideas of grace and comfort, not to commiserate this unfortunate lady, whose standing-up wig ruff, rising above her head; whose stays or bodices, long waisted as to reach to her knees, and the circumference of her large hoop farthingale, which seems to enclose her in a capacious tub, mark her out as one of the most pitiable martyrs of ancient modes. The amorous Sir Walter Raleigh must have found some of her maids honour the most impregnable fortification his gallant spirit ever assailed: a coup de main was impossible.

I shall transcribe from old Stowe a few extracts, which may amuse the reader:

'In the second yeere of Queen Elizabeth 1580, b

the women, Mistress Mountague, presented her majesty a new year's gift, a pair of black silk knit stockings, which, after a few days wearing, pleased her highness so well, that she sent for Mistress Mountague, and asked where she had them, and if she could help her to any more, who answered, "I made them very carefully of my own for your majesty, and seeing these please so well, I will presently set more in hand." "Do so, said the queen,") for indeed I like silke stockings so well, that more they are pleasant, fine, and delicate, that henceforth I will wear no more cloth stockins"—and from that time unto the death the queen never wore any more cloth hose, but only silke stockins; for you shall understand that King Henry the Eighth did wear only cloth hose, or hose cut of a cloth-brode taffaty, or that by great chance there was a pair of Spanish silke stockins from Spain. King Edward the Sixth had a payre of long Spanish silke stockins sent him for a great present. Duke's daughters then wore gowns of saiten of Bridges (Bruges) upon solemn days. Cushens, and window pillows of welvet and damask, formerly only princely furniture, now be very plentiful in most citizens' houses.

'Milliners or haberdashers had not then any gloves imported, or trimmed with gold, or silke; neither gold embroidered girdles and hangers, neither could they do any costly work or perfume, until about the fiftieth year of the queen, the Right Honourable Edward de Vere, Earl of Oxford, came from Italy, and brought with him gloves, sweete bagges, a perfumed leather jerkin, and other pleasant things; and that yeere the queen had a pair of perfumed gloves trimmed onely with four tuffes, or tufts of coloured silke. The queenne tooke such pleasure in these gloves, that she was pictured with those gloves upon her hands, and for many yeares after, it was called "The Earl of Oxford's perfume."

In such a chronology of fashions, an event not less important surely, was the origin of starching; and here we find it treated with the utmost historical dignity.

In the year 1564, Mistress Dinghen Van den Plasse, late at Tienen in Flanders, daughter to a worshipful knight of that province, with her husband came to London for their better safeties, and there professed herself a broker, wherein she excelled, unto whom her owne nation usually repaired, and payed her very liberally for her wile. Some very few of the best and most curious uses of that time, observing the neatness and delicacy of a Dutch for whiteness and fine wearing of linen, made her cambricke ruffles, and sent them to Mistress Dinghen starche, and after awhile they made them ruffles of lawn, which was at that time a stuff most strange, and wonderful, and thereupon arose a general scoffe or by-word, that truly they would make ruffles of a spider's web; and then they began to send their daughters and nearest kinswomen to Mistress Dinghen to learne how to starche; her usual fee was at that time, foure or five pound, to teach them how to starche, and twenty shillings how to seeth starche. Two Italy, Holland, and France, supplied us with the fashions and refinements. But in those days they were, as I have shown from Pottenham, as extravagant masters as any of their present suppose degenerate descendants. Stowe affords us another curious extract. These noble personages made them ruffles, a full quarter's yeerde deepe, and two lengthe in one ruffe. This fashion in London was called the French fashion: but when gentlemen came to Paris the French knew it not, and in France called it the English monster. An exact parallel is of many of our own Parisian modes in the present day; and a circumstance which shows the same rivalry between the reigns of Elizabeth, as in that of George the Fourth.

This was the golden period of cosmetics. The beaux of that day, it is evident, used the abominable art of painting their faces as well as the women. Our old comedies abound with perpetual allusions to oils, tinctures, quintessences, pomatums, perfumes, paint, white and red, &c. &c. of their prime cosmetics was a frequent use of the oil, and the application of wine. Strutt quotes from an old recipe to make the face of a beautiful red colour. The person was to be in a bath that he might perspire. & afterwards wash his face with wine, and 'so should both faire and roddy.' In Mr Lodge's 'Illustrations of British History,' I observe a letter from the Earl of Northumberland, who had the keeping of the unfortunate Mary of Scots. The earl notices that the queen bathed much, and complained of the expense, and requires a further allowance. A learned Scotch professor informed me, on my pointing out this passage, that white wine was used for these purposes. They also made a bath of milk. Elder beauties bathed in wine, to get rid of their wrinkles; and perhaps not without reason, wine being a great astringent. Unwrinkled beauties bathed in milk, to preserve the softness and sleekness of the skin. Our venerable beauties of the Elizabethan age were initiated coquettes; and the mysteries of their toilette might be worth unveiling.

The reign of Charles II was the dominion of French fashions. In some respects the taste was a little lighter, but the moral effect of dress, and which no doubt it has, was much worse. The dress of this French queen was very inflammatory; and the nudity of the beauties of the portrait painter, Sir Peter Lely, has been observed. The queen of Charles II exposed her breast and shoulders without even the glass of the lightest gauze; and the tucker instead of standing up on her bosom, is with licentious boldness turned down, and lies upon her stays. This custom of baring the bosom was much exclaimed against by the authors of that age. That honest divine, Richard Baxter, wrote a preface to a book, entitled, 'A just and seasonable reprehension of naked breasts and shoulders.' In 1672 a book was published, entitled, 'New instructions unto youth for their behaviour, and also a discourse upon some innovations of habits and dressing; against powdering of hair, naked breasts, black spots, (or patches,) and other unseemly customs.' A whimsical fashion now prevailed among the ladies, of strangely ornamenting their faces with abundance of black patches cut into grotesque forms, such as a coach and horses, owls, rings, suns, moons, crowns, crosses and crosslets. The author has prefixed two ladies' heads; the one representing Virtue, and the other Vice. Virtue is a lady modestly habited, with a black velvet hood, and plain white kerchief on her neck, with a border. Vice wears no handkerchief, her stays cut low, so that they display great part of the breasts; and a variety of fantastical patches on her face.

The innovation of fashions in the reign of Charles II, were watched with a jealous eye by the remains of those strict puritans, who now could only pour out their bile in such solemn admonitions. They affected all possible plainness and sanctity. When courtiers wore monstrous wigs, they cut their hair short; when they adopted hats, with broad plumes, they clapped on round black caps, and screwed up their pale religious faces; and when rhoe-buckles were revived, they wore strings to their shoes. The sublime Milton, perhaps, exulted in his intrepidity of still wearing latches! The Taller ridicules Sir William Whitlocke for his singularity in still affecting them. 'Thou dear Will Shoestring, how shall I draw thee? Thou dear outside, will you be combing your wig, playing with your box, or picking your teeth, &c. Wigs and snuff-boxes were then the rage. Steele's own wig, it is recorded made at one time a considerable part of his annual expenditure. His large black periwig cost him, even at that day, not less than forty guineas!—We wear nothing at present in this degree of extravagance. But such a wig was the idol of fashion, and they were performing perpetually their worship with infinite self-complacency; then combing their wigs in public was the very spirit of gallantry and rank. The hero of Richardson, youthful and elegant as he wished him to be, is represented waiting at an assignation, and describing his sufferings in bad weather by lamenting that 'his wig and his linen were dripping with the hoar frost dissolving on them.' Even Betty, Clariissa's lady's maid, is described as 'tapping on her snuff-box,' and frequently taking snuff. At this time nothing was so monstrous as the head-dresses of the ladies in Queen Anne's reign: they formed a kind of edifice of three stories high; and a fashionable lady of that day much resembles the mythological figure of Cybele, the mother of the gods, with three towers on her head.

It is not worth noticing the changes in fashion, unless to ridicule them. However, there are some who find amusement in these records of luxurious idleness; these thousand and one follies! Modern fashions, till very lately a purer taste has obtained among our females, were generally mere copies of obsolete ones, and rarely originally fantastical. The dress of some of our beaux will only be known in a few years hence by their caricatures. In 1761 the dress of a dandy is described in the Inspector. A black velvet coat, a green and silver waistcoat, yellow velvet breeches, and blue stockings. This too was the era of black silk breeches; an extraordinary novelty, against which 'some frowny people attempted to raise up worsted in emulation.' A satirical writer has described a buck about forty years ago; one could hardly have suspected such a gentleman to have been one of our contemporaries. 'A coat of light green, with sleeves too small for the arms, and buttons too big for the sleeves; a pair of Manchester fine stuff breeches, without money in the pockets; clouded silk stockings, but no legs: a club of hair behind larger than the head that carries it; a hat of the size of sixpence on a block not worth a farthing.'

As this article may probably arrest the volatile eyes of my fair readers, let me be permitted to felicitate them on their improvement in elegance in the forms of their dress; and the taste and knowledge of art which they frequently exhibit. But let me remind them that there are certain principles independent of all fashions, which must be cherished at all times. Tacitus remarks of Poppea, the consort of Nero, that she concealed a part of her face; to the end that, the imagination having fuller play by irritating curiosity, they might think higher of her beauty, than if the whole of her face had been exposed. The sentiment is beautifully expressed by Tasso, and it will not be difficult to remember it:—

'Non copre sue bellezze, e non l'espose.'

I conclude by preserving a poem, written in my youth, not only because the great poet of this age has honoured it by placing it in 'The English Minstrelsy,' but as a memorial of some fashion which has become extinct in my own days.

STANZAS,

Addressed to Laura, entreating her not to Paint, to Powder or to Gamble, but to retreat into the Country.

Ah, Laura! quit the noisy town,
And Fashion's persecuting reign;
Health wanders on the breezy down,
And Science on the silent plain.
How long from Art's reflected hues
Shalt thou a mimic charm receive?
Believe, my fair! the faithful muse,
They spoil the blush they cannot give.
Must ruthless art, with torturous steel,
Thy artless locks of gold deface,
In serpent folds their charms conceal,
And spoil, at every touch, a grace.
Too sweet thy youth's enchanting bloom,
To waste on midnight's sordid crews:
Let wrinkled age the night consume:
For age has but its hoards to lose!
Sacred to love and sweet repose,
Behold that trolle'd bower is nigh!
That bower the lilac walls enclose,
Safe from pursuing Scandal's eye.
There, as in every lock of gold
Some flower of pleasing hue I weave,
A goddess shall the muse behold,
And many a votive sigh shall heave.
So the rude Tartar's holy rite
A feeble mortal once array'd;
Then trembled at that mortal's sight,
And own'd divine the power he made.*

A SENATE OF JESUITS.

In a book intitled 'Intérêts et Maximes des Princes et des Etats Souverains, par M. Le Duc de Rohan; Cologne, 1668,' an anecdote is recorded concerning the jesuits; so much the more curious, as neither Puffendorf nor Vertot have noticed it in their histories, though its authority cannot be higher.

When Sigismond, king of Sweden, was elected king of Poland, he made a treaty with the states of Sweden, by which he obliged himself to pass every fifth year in that kingdom. By his wars with the Ottoman court, with Muscovy, and Tartary, and to remain in Poland to encounter such powerful enemies, he failed, during fifteen years, of accomplishing his promise. To remedy this in some shape, by the advice of the jesuits, who had gained the ascendancy over him, he created a senate to reside at

* The Lama, or God of the Tartars, is composed of such frail materials as mere mortality; contrived, however, by the power of priestcraft, to appear immortal; the succession of Lamas never failing:

Stockholm, composed of forty chosen jesuits, to decide every affair of state. He published a declaration in that favour, presented them with letters-patent, and invested them with the royal authority.

While this senate of jesuits was at Dantzic waiting for a fair wind to set sail for Stockholm, he published an edict that they should receive them as his own royal persons. A public council was immediately held. Charles, the uncle of Sigismond, the prelates, and the lords, resolved to prepare for them a splendid and magnificent entry.

But in a private council, they came to very contrary resolutions: for the prince said, he could not bear that the senate of priests should command, in preference to all that honours and authority of so many princes and lords, natives of the country. All the others agreed with him in rejecting this holy senate. The archbishop rose, and said, 'Since Sigismond has disdained to be our king, we also must not acknowledge him as such; and from this moment we should no longer consider ourselves as his subjects. His authority is in suspensio, because he has bestowed it on the jesuits who form this senate. The people have not yet acknowledged them. In this interval of resignation on the one side, and assumption of the other I absolve you all of the fidelity the king may claim from you as his Swedish subjects.' When he had said this, the Prince of Bithynia addressing himself to Prince Charles, uncle of the king, said, 'I own no other king than you, and I believe you are now obliged to receive us as your affectionate subjects, and to assist us to hunt these vermin from the state.' All the others joined him, and acknowledged Charles as their lawful monarch.

Having resolved to keep their declaration for some time secret, they deliberated in what manner they were to receive and to precede this senate in their entry into the harbour, who were now on board a great galleon, which had anchored two leagues from Stockholm that they might enter more magnificently in the night, when the fireworks they had prepared would appear to the greatest advantage. About the time of their reception, Prince Charles, accompanied by twenty-five or thirty vessels, appeared before the senate. Wheeling about and forming a caracol of ships, they discharged a volley, and emptied all their cannon on the galleon of this senate, which had its sides pierced through with the balls. The galleon immediately filled with water and sunk, without one of the unfortunate jesuits being assisted; on the contrary, their assailants cried to them that this was the time to perform some miracle, such as they were accustomed to do in India and Japan; and if they chose, they could walk on the waters!

The report of the cannon and the smoke which the powder occasioned, prevented either the cries or the submersion of the holy fathers from being observed; and as if they were conducting the senate to the town, Charles entered triumphantly; went into the church, where they sung Te Deum; and to conclude the night, he partook of the entertainment which had been prepared for this ill-fated senate.

The jesuits of the city of Stockholm having come, about midnight, to pay their respects to the fathers of the senate, perceived their loss. They directly posted up placards of excommunication against Charles and his adherents, who had caused the senate of jesuits to perish. They solicited the people to rebel: but they were soon expelled the city, and Charles made a public profession of Lutheranism.

Sigismond, king of Poland, began a war with Charles in 1604, which lasted two years. Disturbed by the invasions of the Tartars, the Muscovites, and the Cossacks, a truce was concluded; but Sigismond lost both his crowns, by his bigoted attachment to Roman Catholicism.

THE LOVER'S HEART.

The following tale is recorded in the Historia. Memoirs of Champagne, by Bouquier. It has been a favourite narrative with the old romance writers; and the principal incident, however objectionable, has been displayed in several modern poems. It is probable, that the true history will be acceptable for its tender and amorous incident, to the fair reader.

I find it in some shape related by Howel, in his 'Familiar Letters,' in one addressed to Ben Jonson. He recommends it to him as a subject 'which peradventure you may make use of in your way;' and concludes by saying, 'In my opinion, which vails to yours, this is choice and rich if for you to put upon your loom and make a curious b of'

The Lord De Coucy, vassal to the Count De Champagne, was one of the most accomplished youths of his age. He loved, with an excess of passion, the lady of the name Du Fayel, who felt a reciprocal affection. With the most poignant grief this lady heard from her lover, that he resolved to accompany the king and the Count De Champagne to the wars of the Holy Land; but she would oppose his wishes, because she hoped that his absence might dissipate the jealousy of her husband. The time of departure having come, these two lovers parted with tears of the most lively tenderness. The lady, in quitting her lover, presented him with some rings, some diamonds, and with a string that she had woven herself of his hair, intermixed with silk and buttons of large pearls, serve him, according to the fashion of those days, to tie the magnificent hood which covered his helmet. This he gratefully accepted.

In Palestine, at the siege of Acre, in 1191, in gloriously leading the ramparts, he received a wound, which was deemed mortal. He employed the few moments he had left in writing to the Lady Du Fayel; and he poured forth the fervour of his soul. He ordered his squire to strew his heart after his death, and to convey it to his devoted mistress, with the presents he had received from her hands in quitting her.

The squire, faithful to the dying injunction of his master, returned to France, to present the heart and the presents to the lady of Du Fayel. But when he approached the castle of this lady, he concealed himself in the neighbouring wood, till he could find some favourable moment to complete his promise. He had the misfortune to be observed by the husband of this lady, who recognized him, and who immediately suspected he came in search of his wife with some message from his master. He threatened to deprive him of his life, if he did not divulge the occasion of his return. The squire assured him that his master was dead; but Du Fayel not believing it, drew his sword on him. This man, frightened at the peril in which he had put himself, confessed every thing; and put into his hands the heart and letter of his master. Du Fayel, prompted by the fiercest revenge, ordered his cook to mince the heart; and having mixed it with meat, he caused a feast to be made, which he knew pleased the taste of his wife, and had it served to her. The lady ate heartily of the dish. After the repast, Du Fayel inquired of his wife what she had found the ragout according to her taste; she answered him that she had found it excellent. 'It is for this reason, that I caused it to be served to you, for it is a bit of meat which you very much liked. You have, Madam,' the savage Du Fayel continued, eaten the heart of the Lord De Coucy.' But this she would not believe, till he showed her the letter of her lover, with the string of his hair, and the diamonds she had given him. Then shuddering in the anguish of her sensations, and urged by the fiercest despair, she told him—'It is true that I loved that man, because it merited to be loved; for never could it be so superior; and since I have eaten of so noble a bit, and that my stomach is the tomb of so precious a bit, I will take care that nothing of inferior worth shall be mixed with it.' Grief and passion choked her voice. She retired to her chamber; she closed the door for ever; and refusing to accept of consolation or food, the miserable victim expired on the fourth day.

THE HISTORY OF GLOVES.

The present learned and curious dissertation is compiled from the papers of an ingenious antiquary, from the Journal des Savants, the Revue des Deux Mondes, &c. Vol. X, p.

The antiquary of this part of dress, will form our first object; and we shall then show its various uses in the different ages of the world.

It has been imagined that gloves are noticed in the 108th psalm, where the royal prophet declares, he will cast his sword Edom; and still farther back, supposing them to have been in the times of the Judges, Ruth iv, 7, where the heroine is noticed of a man taking off his shoe and giving it to her neighbour, as a pledge for redeeming or exchanging a field. The word in these two texts usually translated by the Chaldee paraphrast in the latter, is rendered shoan. Comment on is of opinion that gloves were worn by the Chaldeans, from the word here mentioned being explained in the Talmud Lexicon, the clothing of the hand.

But are not these mere conjectures, and has not the Chaldee paraphrast taken a liberty in his version?

Xenophon gives a clear and distinct account of gloves. Speaking of the manners of the Persians, as a proof of their effeminacy, he observes, that not satisfied with covering their head and their feet, they also guarded their hands against the cold with thick gloves. Homer, describing Laertes at work in his garden, represents him with gloves on his hands, to secure them from the thorns. Varro, an ancient writer is an evidence in favour of their antiquity among the Romans. In lib. ii, cap. 55, de Re Rustica, he says, that olives gathered by the naked hand, are preferable to those gathered with gloves. Athenæus speaks of a celebrated glutton who always came to table with gloves on his hands, that he might be able to handle and eat the meat while hot, and devour more than the rest of the company.

These authorities show, that the ancients were not strangers to the use of gloves, though their use was not common. In a hot climate to wear gloves implies a considerable degree of effeminacy. We can more clearly trace the early use of gloves in northern than in southern nations. When the ancient severity of manners declined, the use of gloves prevailed among the Romans; but not without some opposition from the philosophers. Musonius, a philosopher, who lived at the close of the first century of christianity, among other invectives against the corruption of the age, says It is shameful that persons in perfect health should clothe their hands and feet with soft and hairy coverings. Their convenience, however, soon made the use general. Pliny the younger informs us, in his account of his uncle's journey to Vesuvius, that his secretary sat by him ready to write down whatever occurred remarkable; and that he had gloves on his hands, that the coldness of the weather might not impede his business.

In the beginning of the ninth century, the use of gloves was become so universal, that even the church thought a regulation in that part of dress necessary. In the reign of Lewis le Debonnaire, the council of Aix ordered that the monks should only wear gloves made of sheep-skin.

That time had made alterations in the form of this, as in all other apparel, appears from the old pictures and monuments.

Gloves, besides their original design for a covering of the hand, have been employed on several great and solemn occasions; as in the ceremony of investitures, in bestowing lands, or in conferring dignities. Giving possession, by the delivery of a glove, prevailed in several parts of Christendom in later ages. In the year 1002, the bishops of Paderborn and Moncerro were put into possession of their sees by receiving a glove. It was thought so essential a part of the episcopal habit, that some abbots in France presuming to wear gloves, the council of Poitiers interposed in the affair, and forbade them the use, on the same principle as the ring and sandals; these being peculiar to bishops, who frequently wore them richly adorned on their backs with jewels.

Favin observes, that the custom of blessing gloves at the coronation of the kings of France, which still subsists, is a remain of the eastern practice of investiture by a glove. A remarkable instance of this ceremony is recorded. The unfortunate Conradin was deprived of his crown and his life by the usurper Mainfroy. When having ascended the scaffold, the injured prince lamenting his hard fate, asserted his right to the crown, and as a token of investiture, threw his glove among the crowd, entreating it might be conveyed to some of his relations, who would revenge his death. It was taken up by a knight, and brought to Peter King of Arragon, who in virtue of this glove was afterwards crowned at Palermo.

As the delivery of gloves was once a part of the ceremony used in giving possession, so the depriving a person of them was a mark of divesting him of his office, and of degradation. The Earl of Carlisle, in the reign of Edward the Second, impeached of holding a correspondence with the Scots, was condemned to die as a traitor. Walsingham, relating other circumstances of his degradation, says, 'His spurs were cut off with a hatchet; and his gloves and shoes were taken off, &c.'

Another use of gloves was in a duel; he who threw one down, was by this act understood to give defiance, and he who took it up, to accept the challenge.

The use of single combat, at first designed only for a trial of innocence, like the ordeals of fire and water, was in succeeding ages practised for deciding rights and pro-party. Challenging by the glove was continued down to the reign of Elizabeth, as appears by an account given by Spelman of a duel appointed to be fought in Tothill Fields in the year 1571. The dispute was concerning some lands in the county of Kent. The plaintiffs appeared in court, and demanded single combat. One of them threw down his glove, which the other immediately taking up, carried it off on the point of his sword, and the day of fighting was appointed; this affair was however adjusted by the queen's judicious interference.

The ceremony is still practised of challenging by a glove at the coronation of the kings of England, by his majesty's champion entering Westminster Hall completely armed and mounted.

Challenging by the glove is still in use in some parts of the world. In Germany, on receiving an affront, to send a glove to the offending party, is a challenge to a duel.

The last use of gloves was for carrying the hawk, which is very ancient. In former times, prince, and other great men took so much pleasure in carrying the hawk on their hand, that some of them have chosen to be represented in this attitude. There is a monument of Philip the First of France still remaining; on which he is represented at length, on his tomb, holding a glove in his hand.

Chambers says that, formerly, judges were forbid to wear gloves on the bench. No reason is assigned for this prohibition. Our judges lie under no such restraint; for both they and the rest of the court make no difficulty of receiving gloves from the sheriffs, whenever the session or assize concludes without any one receiving sentence of death, which is called a maiden assize; a custom of great antiquity.

Our curious antiquary has preserved a singular anecdote concerning gloves. Chambers informs us, that it is not safe at present to enter the stables of princes without pulling off our gloves. He does not tell us in what the danger consists; but it is an ancient established custom in Germany, that whoever enters the stables of a prince, or great man, with his gloves on his hands, is obliged to forfeit them, or redeem them by a fee to the servants. The same custom is observed in some places at the death of the stag; in which case if the gloves are not taken off they are redeemed by money given to the huntsmen and keepers. The French king never failed of pulling off one of his gloves on that occasion. The reason of this ceremony seems to be lost.

We meet with the term glove-money in our old records; by which is meant, money given to servants to buy gloves. This probably is the origin of the phrase giving a pair of gloves, to signify making a present for some favour or service.

Gough in his 'Sepulchral Monuments' informs us that gloves formed no part of the female dress till after the Reformation; I have seen some so late as Anne's time richly worked and embroidered.

There must exist in the Denny family some of the oldest gloves extant, as appears by the following glove anecdote.

At the sale of the Earl of Arran's goods, April 6th 1759, the gloves given by Henry VIII. to Sir Anthony Denny were sold for 38*l*. 17*s*.; those given by James I. to his son Edward Denny for 22*l*. 4*s*.; the mittens given by Queen Elizabeth to Sir Edward Denny's Lady. 25*l*. 4*s*.; all which were bought for Sir Thomas Denny of Ireland who was descended in a direct line from the great Sir Anthony Denny, one of the executors of the will of Henry.

RELICS OF SAINTS.

When relics of saints were first introduced, the relique-mania was universal: they bought and they sold, and like other collectors, made no scruple to steal them. It is entertaining to observe the singular ardour and grasping avidity of some, to enrich themselves with these religious morsels, their little discernment, the curious impositions of the vender, and the good faith and sincerity of the purchaser. The prelate of the place sometimes ordained a fast to implore God that they might not be cheated with the relics of saints, which he sometimes purchased for the holy benefit of the village or town.

Guilbert de Nogen wrote a treatise on the relics of saints; acknowledging that there were many false ones as well as false legends, he reproaches the inventors of these lying miracles. He wrote his treatise on the occasion of a feast of our Lord's by which the monks of St.

Medard de Soissons pretended to operate miracles. He asserts that this pretension is as chimerical as that of several persons, who believed they possessed the navel, and other parts less decent of—the body of Christ!

A monk of Bergvinck has given a history of the translation of Saint Lewin, a virgin, and a martyr: her relics were brought from England to Berge. He collected with religious care the facts from his brethren, especially from the conductor of these relics from England. After the history of the translation, and a panegyric of the saint he relates the miracles performed in Flanders since the arrival of her relics. The prevailing passions of the times to possess fragments of saints is well marked, when the author particularizes with a certain complacency all the knavish modes they used to carry off those in question. None then objected to this sort of robbery; because the gratification of the reigning passion had made it worth while to supply the demand.

A monk of Cluny has given a history of the translation of the body of St Indaleco, one of the earliest Spanish bishops; written by order of the abbot of St. Juan de la Penna. He protests he advances nothing but facts; having himself seen, or learnt from other witnesses, all he relates. It was not difficult for him to be well informed, since it was to the monastery of St Juan de la Penna that the holy relics were transported, and those who brought them were two monks of that house. He has authenticated his minute detail of circumstances by giving the names of persons and places. His account was written for the great festival immediately instituted in honour of this translation. He informs us of the miraculous manner by which the were so fortunate as to discover the body of this bishop and the different plans they concerted to carry it off. He gives the itinerary of the two monks who accompanied the holy remains. They were not a little cheered in their long journey by visions and miracles.

Another has written a history of what he calls the translation of the relics of Saint Magan to the monastery of Villamagne. Translation is in fact only a softened expression for the robbery of the relics of the saint committed by two monks, who carried them off secretly to enrich their monastery; and they did not hesitate at any artifice, or lie, to complete their design. They thought every thing was permitted to acquire these fragments of mortality, which had now become a branch of commerce. They even regarded their possessors with a hostile eye. Such was the religious opinion from the ninth to the twelfth century. Our Canute commissioned his agent at Rome to purchase Saint Augustine's arm for one hundred talents of silver and one of gold! a much larger sum, observes Grang than the finest statue of antiquity would have then sold for.

Another monk describes a strange act of devotion as tested by several contemporary writers. When the saint did not readily comply with the prayers of their votaries they flogged their relics with rods, in a spirit of impatience which they conceived was proper to make the bend into compliance.

Theofroy, abbot of Epternac, to raise our admiration relates the daily miracles performed by the relics of saints their ashes, their clothes, or other mortal spoils, and even by the instruments of their martyrdom. He inveighs against that luxury of ornaments which was indulged under a religious pretext; 'It is not to be supposed that if saints are desirous of such a profusion of gold and silver they wish not that we should raise to them such magnificent churches, to exhibit that ingenious order of pill which shine with gold; nor those rich ceilings, nor the altars sparkling with jewels. They desire not the costly parchment of price for their writings, the liquid gold embellish the letters, nor the precious stones to deck their covers; while you have such little care for the misters of the altar.' The pious writer has not forgot himself in this partnership-account with the saints.

The Roman church not being able to deny, says Bay that there have been false relics, which have operated wonders, they reply, that the good intentions of those believers who have recourse to them obtained from God its reward for their good faith! In the same spirit, what was shown that two or three bodies of the same saint said to exist in different places, and, that therefore it all could not be authentic; it was answered, that it were all genuine! for God had multiplied and miraculously reproduced them for the comfort of the faithful! A curious specimen of the intolerance of good sense.

When the Reformation was spread in Lithuania, Prince Radziw was so affected by it, that he went in person to pay the pope all possible honours. His heliness on this occasion presented him with a precious box of relics. The prince having returned home, some monks entreated permission to try the effect of these relics on the demoniac, who had hitherto resisted every kind of exorcism. They were brought into the church with solemn pomp, and deposited on the altar, accompanied by an innumerable crowd. After the usual conjurations, which were unsuccessful, they applied the relics. The demoniac instantly recovered. The people called out a miracle! and the prince, lifting his hands and eyes to heaven, felt his faith confirmed. In this transport of pious joy, he observed that a young gentleman who was keeper of this treasure of relics, smiled, and by his motions ridiculed the miracle. The prince, indignantly, took our young keeper of the relic to task; who, on promise of pardon, gave the following secret intelligence concerning them. In travelling from Rome he had lost the box of relics; and not daring to mention it, he had procured a similar one, which he had filled with the small bones of dogs and cats, and other trifles similar to what were lost. He hoped he might be forgiven for smiling, when he found that such a collection of rubbish was idolized with such pomp, and had even the virtue of expelling demons. It was by the assistance of this box that the prince discovered the gross impositions of the monks and the demoniacs, and Radziw afterwards became a zealous Lutheran.

The Elector Frederic, surnamed the wise, was an insatiable collector of relics. After his death, one of the secrets employed by him, solicited payment for several parcels he had purchased for our wise elector; but the price had changed! He was advised to give over this business; the relics for which he desired payment they were willing to return: that the price had fallen considerably since the reformation of Luther; and that they would be more esteemed, and find a better market in Italy than in Germany!

Stephens, in his Traité préparatif à l'Apologie pour M. de la Motte, c. 33, says, 'A monk of St. Anthony having been at Jerusalem, saw there several relics, among which there was a bit of the finger of the Holy Ghost, as sound and true as it had ever been; the snout of the seraphim that appeared to St. Francis; one of the nails of a cherubim; one of the ribs of the verbum caro factum (the word made flesh); some rays of the star which appeared to the three kings in the east; a vial of St. Michael's sweat when he was fighting against the devil; a hem of Joseph's garment, which he wore when he cleaved wood, &c.' all of which things, observes our treasurer of relics, I have brought very devoutly with me home. Our Henry III, who was deeply tainted with the superstition of the age, summoned all the great in the kingdom to meet in London. This summons excited the most general curiosity, and multitudes appeared. The king then acquainted them that the great master of the Knights Templars had sent him a relic containing a small portion of the precious blood of Christ which he had shed upon the cross! and attested to its genuineness by the seals of the patriarch of Jerusalem and others. He commanded a procession the following day, and the historian adds, that though the road between St. Paul's and Westminster abbey was very deep and miry, the king kept his eyes constantly fixed on the phial. Two monks received it, and deposited the phial in the abbey, which made all England shine with glory, dedicating it to God, and St. Edward.'

Lord Herbert, in his Life of Henry VIII, notices the great fall of the price of relics at the dissolution of the monasteries. 'The respect given to relics, and some pretended miracles, fell; inasmuch, as I find by our records, that a piece of St. Andrew's finger, (covered only with an ounce of silver), being laid to pledge by a monastery of forty pounds, was left unredeemed at the dissolution of the house; the king's commissioners, who upon surrender of any foundation undertook to pay the debts, refusing to return the price again.' That is, they did not choose to pay the forty pounds, to receive a piece of the finger of St. Andrew.

About this time the property of relics suddenly sunk to a bubble; for shortly after the arrival of the Duke of Grace, at Exley in Kent, was fully opened to the eyes of the populace; and a far-famed relic at Hales in Worcestershire, of the blood of Christ, was at the same time exhibited. It was shown in a phial, and it was believed that none could see it who were in mortal sin; and after many trials usually repeated to the same person, the deluded pilgrims at length went away fully satisfied. This relic was the blood of a duck, renewed every week, and put in a phial; one side was opaque, and the other transparent; the monk turned either side to the pilgrim as he thought proper. The success of the pilgrim depended on the generous oblations he made; those who were scanty in their offerings were the longest to get a sight of the blood: when a man was in despair, he usually became more generous!

PERPETUAL LAMPS OF THE ANCIENTS.

No. 379 of the Spectator, relates an anecdote of one having opened the sepulchre of the famous Rosicrucius. There he discovered a lamp burning, which a statue of clock-work struck into pieces. Hence the disciples of this visionary said, that he made use of this method to show that he had re-invented the ever burning lamps of the ancients.

Many writers have made mention of these wonderful lamps; Marville appears to give a satisfactory account of the nature of these flames.

It has happened frequently, that inquisitive men, examining with a flambeau ancient sepulchres which had been just opened, the fat and gross vapours, engendered by the corruption of dead bodies, kindled as the flambeau approached them, to the great astonishment of the spectators, who frequently cried out a miracle! This sudden inflammation, although very natural, has given room to believe that these flames proceeded from perpetual lamps, which some have thought were placed in the tombs of the ancients, and which, they said, were extinguished at the moment these tombs opened, and were penetrated by the exterior air.

The accounts of the perpetual lamps, which ancient writers give, has occasioned several ingenious men to search after their composition. Licetus, who possessed more erudition than love of truth, has given two receipts for making this eternal fire by a preparation of certain minerals. An opinion in vogue amongst those who are pleased with the wonderful, or who only examine things superficially. More credible writers maintain, that it is impossible to make lamps perpetually burning, and an oil at once inflammable and incombustible; but Boyle, assisted by several experiments made on the air-pump, found that those lights, which have been viewed in opening tombs, proceeded from the collision of fresh air. This reasonable observation conciliates all, and does not compel us to deny the accounts.

The story of the lamp of Rosicrucius, even if it ever had the slightest foundation, only owes its origin to the spirit of party, which at the time would have persuaded the world, that Rosicrucius had at last discovered something; but there is nothing certain in this amusing invention.

The reason adduced by Marville is satisfactory for his day; and for the opening of sepulchres with flambeaux. But it was reserved for the modern discoveries made in natural philosophy, as well as those in chemistry, to prove that air was not only necessary for a medium to the existence of the flame, which indeed the air-pump had already shown; but also as a constituent part of the inflammation, and without which a body otherwise very inflammable in all its parts, cannot however burn but in its superficies, which alone is in contact with the ambient air.

NATURAL PRODUCTIONS RESEMBLING ARTIFICIAL COMPOSITION.

Some stones are preserved by the curious, for representing distinctly figures traced by nature alone, and without the aid of art.

Pliny mentions an agate, in which appeared, formed by the hand of nature, Apollo amidst the nine Muses holding a harp. Majolus assures us, that at Venice another is seen, in which is naturally formed the perfect figure of a man. At Pisa, in the church of St John, there is a similar natural production, which represents an old hermit in a desert seated by the side of a stream, and who holds in his hands a small bell, as St Anthony is commonly painted. In the temple of St Sophia, at Constantinople, there was formerly on a white marble the image of St John the Baptist covered with the skin of a camel, with this only imperfection, that nature had given but one leg. At Ravenshoe, in the Church of St Vital, a cordelier is seen on a dusky stone. They found in Italy a marble, in which a crucifix was so elaborately finished, that there appeared the nails, the drops of blood, and the wounds, as perfectly as the most excellent painter could have performed. At Snellberg, in Germany, they found in a mine a certain rough metal, on which was seen the figure of a man, who carried a child on his back. In Provence they found in a mine, a quantity of natural figures of birds, trees, rats, and serpents; and in some places of the western parts of Tartary, are seen on divers rocks, the figures of camels, horses, and sheep. Pancirollus, in his Loet Antiquities, attests, that in a church at Rome, a marble perfectly represented a priest celebrating mass, and raising the host. Paul III conceiving that art had been used, scraped the marble to discover whether any painting had been employed: but nothing of the kind was discovered. 'I have seen,' writes a friend, 'many of these curiosities. They are always helped out by art. In my father's house was a gray marble chimney-piece, which abounded in portraits, landscapes, &c, the greatest part of which was made by myself.' My learned friend, the Rev. Stephen Weston, possesses a very large collection, many certainly untouched by art. One stone appears like a perfect cameo of a Minerva's head; another shows an old man's head, beautiful as if the hand of Raphael had designed it. Both these stones are transparent. Some exhibit portraits.

There is preserved in the British Museum, a black stone, on which nature has sketched a resemblance of the portrait of Chaucer. Stones of this kind, possessing a sufficient degree of resemblance, are rare; but art appears not to have been used. Even in plants, we find this sort of resemblance. There is a species of the orchis found in the mountainous parts of Lincolnshire, Kent, &c. Nature has formed a bee, apparently feeding in the breast of the flower, with so much exactness, that it is impossible at a very small distance to distinguish the imposition. Hence the plant derives its name, and is called the Bee-flower. Langhorne elegantly notices its appearance:

'See on that flowret's velvet breast,
How close the busy vagrant lies!
His thin-wrought plume, his downy breast,
Th' ambrosial gold that swells his thighs.

'Perhaps his fragrant load may bind
His limbs—'we'll set the captive free—
I sought the living bee to find,

The late Mr Jackson of Exeter wrote to me on this subject: 'This orchis is common near our seacoasts; but instead of being exactly like a bee, it is not like it at all. It has a general resemblance to a fly, and by the help of imagination, may be supposed to be a fly pitched upon the flower. The mandrake very frequently has a forked root, which may be fancied to resemble thighs and legs. I have seen it helped out with nails on the toes.'

An ingenious botanist, a stranger to me, after reading this article, was so kind as to send me specimens of the fly orchis, ophrys muscifera, and of the bee orchis, ophrys sphegodes. Their resemblance to these insects when in full flower is the most perfect conceivable; they are distinct plants. The poetical eye of Langhorne was equally correct and fanciful; and that too of Jackson, who differed so positively. Many controversies have been carried on, from a want of a little more knowledge; like that of the bee orchis and the fly orchis; both parties prove to be right.

Another curious specimen of the playful operations of nature is the mandrake; a plant indeed, when it is bare of leaves, perfectly resembling that of the human form. The ginseng tree is noticed for the same appearance. This object the same poet has noticed:

'Mark how that rooted mandrake wears
His human feet, his human hands;
Oft, as his shapely form he rears,
Aghast the frightened ploughman stands.'

He closes this beautiful fable with the following stanza, very unapposite to the curious subject of this article;

'Helvidæ's rocks, Sabrina's waves,
Still many a shining pebble bear:
Where nature's studious hand engraves
The perfect form, and leaves it there.'

THE POETICAL GARLAND OF JULIA.

Shuet has given a charming description of a present made by a lover to his mistress: a gift which romance has seldom equalled for its gallantry, ingenuity, and novelty. It was called the Garland of Julia. To understand the nature of this gift, it will be necessary to give the history of the parties.

The beautiful Julia d'Angennes was in the flower of her youth and fame, when the celebrated Gustavus, king of Sweden, was making war in Germany with the most splendid success. Julia expressed her warm admiration of this hero. She had his portrait placed on her toilette, and took pleasure in declaring that she would have no other lover than Gustavus. The Duke de Montausien was, however, her avowed and ardent admirer. A short time after the death of Gustavus, he sent her, as a new-year's gift, the Poetical Garland, of which the following is a description.

The most beautiful flowers were painted in miniature by an eminent artist, one Robert, on pieces of vellum, all of an equal size. Under every flower a sufficient space was left open for a madrigal on the subject of that flower there painted. The duke solicited the wife of the time to assist in the composition of these little poems, reserving a considerable number for the effusions of his own amorous muse. Under every flower he had his madrigal written by a penman, N du Jarry, who was celebrated for beautiful writing. It is decorated by a frontispiece, which represents a splendid garland composed of these twenty-one flowers; and on turning the page a Cupid is painted. These were magnificently bound, and inclosed in a bag of rich Spanish leather. This gift, when Julia awoke on new-year's day, she found lying on her toilette; it was one quite to her taste, and successful to the donor's hopes.

Of this Poetical Garland, thus formed by the hands of Wit and Love, Huet says, 'As I had long heard of it, I frequently expressed a wish to see it: at length the duchess of Uzez gratified me with the sight. She locked me in her cabinet one afternoon with this garland; she then went to the queen, and at the close of the evening liberated me. I never passed a more agreeable afternoon.'

One of the prettiest inscriptions of these flowers is the following, composed for

THE VIOLET.

Modeste en ma couleur, modeste en mon séjour,
Franche d'ambition, je me cache sous l'herbe;
Mais, si sur votre front je puis me voir un jour,
La plus humble des fleurs, sera la plus superbe.

Modest my colour, modest is my place,
Pleased in the grass my lowly form to hide;
But mid your tresses might I wind with grace,
The humblest flower would feel the loftiest pride.

At the sale of the library of the Duke de la Valliere, in 1784, among its numerous literary curiosities this garland appeared. It was actually sold for the extravagant sum of 14,510 livres! though in 1770 at Gaignat's sale, it only cost 780 livres. It is described, 'a manuscript on vellum, composed of twenty-nine flowers painted by one Robert, under which are inserted madrigals by various authors.' But the Abbe Rive, the superintendent of the Vallier library, published in 1779 an inflammatory notice of this garland; and as he and the duke had the art of appreciating, and it has been said making spurious literary curiosities, this notice was no doubt the occasion of the maniacal price.

In the revolution of France, this literary curiosity found its passage into this country. A bookseller offered it for sale at the enormous price of 500*l.* sterling! No curious collector has been discovered to have purchased this unique; which is most remarkable for the extreme folly of the purchaser who gave the 14,510 livres for poetry and painting not always exquisite. The history of the garland of Julia is a child's lesson for certain rash and inexperienced collectors, who may here

'Learn to do well by other's harm.'

TRAGIC ACTORS.

Montfleury, a French player, was one of the greatest actors of his time for characters highly tragic. He died of the violent efforts he made in representing Orestes in the Andromache of Racine. The author of the 'Parnassus reformed' makes him thus express himself in the shades. There is something extremely droll in his lamentations, with a severe rally on the inconveniences to which tragic actors are so liable.

'Ah! how sincerely do I wish that tragedies had never been invented! I might then have been yet in a state capable of appearing on the stage; and if I should not have attained the glory of sustaining sublime characters, I should at least have trifled agreeably, and have worked off my spleen in laughing! I have wasted my lungs in the violent emotions of jealousy, love, and ambition. A thousand times have I been obliged to force myself to repress more passions than Le Brun ever painted or conceived. I saw myself frequently obliged to dart terrible glances; to roll my eyes furiously in my head, like a man insane; to frighten others by extravagant grimaces; to imprint on my countenance the redness of indignation and hatred; to make the paleness of fear and surprise succeed each other by turns; to express the transports of rage and despair; to cry out like a demoniac; and consequently to strain all the parts of my body to render them fitter to accompany these different impressions. The man then who would know of what I died, let him not ask if it were of the fever, the dropsy, or the gout; but let him know that it was of the Andromache!'

The Jesuit Rapin informs us, that when Mondory acted Herod in the Myriamne of Tristan, the spectators quitted the theatre mournful and thoughtful; so tenderly were they penetrated with the sorrows of the unfortunate heroine. In this melancholy pleasure, he says, we have a true picture of the strong impressions which were made by the Grecian tragedians. Mondory indeed felt so powerfully the character he assumed, that it cost him his life.

Some readers will recollect the death of Bond, who felt so exquisitely the character of Lusignan in Zara, which he personated when an old man, that Zara, when she adored him, found him dead in his chair!

The assumption of a variety of characters, by a person of irritable and delicate nerves, has often a tragical effect in the mental faculties. We might draw up a list of actors, who have fallen martyrs to their tragic characters. Several have died on the stage, and, like Palmer, usually in the midst of some agitated appeal to the feelings.

Baron, who was the French Garrick, had a most elevated notion of his profession; he used to say, that tragic actors should be nursed on the lap of Queens! Nor was in vanity inferior to his enthusiasm for his profession; for, according to him, the world might see once in a century Cæsar; but that it required a thousand years to produce Ulysses! A variety of anecdotes testify the admirable talents he displayed. Whenever he meant to compliment the talents or merit of distinguished characters, he always alluded in a pointed manner the striking passages of the Iliad, fixing his eye on them. An observation of his respecting actors is not less applicable to poets and to painters. 'Rules,' said this sublime actor, 'may teach us not to raise the arms above the head; but if passion carries him, it will be well done; passion knows more than art.'

Betterton, although his countenance was ruddy and sanguine, when he performed Hamlet, at the appearance of the ghost, through the violent and sudden emotion of amazement and horror in the presence of his father's spectre, instantly turned as white as his neckcloth, while his whole body seemed to be affected with a strong tremor: had his father's apparition actually risen before him, it could not have been seized with more real agonies. This struck the spectators so forcibly, that they felt a shuddering in their veins, and participated in the astonishment and the horror so apparent in the actor. Davies in his dramatic Miscellanies records this fact; and in the Richardsoniana, we find that the first time Booth attempted to ghost when Betterton acted Hamlet, that actor's look and grimace struck him with such horror that he became disconcerted to that degree, he could not speak his part. There seems no want of evidence of the force of the ideal rescue in this marvellous acting: these facts might deserve a philosophical investigation.

Le Kain, the French actor, who retired from the Parisian stage, covered with glory and gold, was one day consulted by a company on the retirement which he was preparing to enjoy. 'As to glory,' modestly replied this actor, 'I do not flatter myself to have acquired much. This kind of reward is always disputed by many, and you and I ourselves would not allow it, were I to assume it. As to money, I have not so much reason to be satisfied; at the Italian theatre their share is far more considerable than here; an actor there may get twenty to twenty-five thousand livres, and my share amounts at the most to ten or twelve thousand.' 'How! the devil!' exclaimed a rude chevalier of the order of St Louis, who was present; 'How the devil! a vile stroller is not content with twelve thousand livres annually, and I, who am in the king's service, who sleep upon a cannon and lavish my blood for my country, I must consider myself as fortunate in having obtained a pension of one thousand livres.' 'And do you account as nothing, Sir, the liberty of addressing me thus?' replied Le Kain, with all the sublimity and consciousness of an irritated Orosmane.

The memoirs of Madlle Clairon display her exalted feeling of the character of a sublime actress; she was of opinion, that in common life the truly sublime actor should be a hero, or heroine off the stage. 'If I am only a vulgar and ordinary woman during twenty hours of the day, whatever effort I may make, I shall only be an ordinary and vulgar woman in Agrippina, or Semiramis, during the remaining four.' In society she was nicknamed the Queen of Carthage, from her admirable personification of Dido in a tragedy of that name.

JOCULAR PREACHERS.

These preachers, whose works are excessively rare, form a race unknown to the general reader. I shall sketch the characters of these pious buffoons, before I introduce them to his acquaintance. They, as it has been said of Sterne, seemed to have wished, every now and then to have thrown their wigs into the faces of their auditors.

These preachers flourished in the fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth centuries; we are therefore to attribute their extravagant mixture of grave admonition with facetious illustration, comic tales which have been occasionally adopted by the most licentious writers, and minute and lively descriptions, to the great simplicity of the times, when the grossest indecency was never concealed under a gentle periphrasis, but every thing was called by its name. All this was enforced by the most daring personalities, and seasoned by those temporary allusions which neither spared nor feared even the throne. These ancient sermons therefore are singularly precious, to those whose inquisitive pleasures are gratified by tracing the manners of former ages. When Henry Stephens, in his apology for Hierodotus, describes the irregularities of the age, and the minuteness of national manners, he effects this chiefly by extracts from these sermons. Their wit is not always the brightest, nor their satire the most poignant; but there is always that prevailing novelty of the age; running through their rude eloquence, which interests the reflecting mind. In a word, these sermons were addressed to the multitude; and therefore they show good sense and absurdity, fancy and puerility; satire and insipidity; extravagance and truth.

Oliver Maillard, a famous cordelier, died in 1502. This preacher having pointed some keen traits in his sermons at Louis XI, the irritated monarch had our cordelier informed that he would throw him into the river. He replied undaunted, and not forgetting his satire: 'The king may do as he chooses; but tell him that I shall sooner get to paradise by water, than he will arrive by all his post horses.' He alluded to travelling by post, which this monarch had lately introduced into France. This bold answer, it is said, intimidated Louis; it is certain that Maillard continued as courageous and satirical as ever in his pulpit.

The following extracts are descriptive of the manners of the times.

In attacking rapine and robbery, under the first head he describes a kind of usury, which was practised in the days of Ben Jonson, and I am told in the present, as well as in the times of Maillard. 'This,' says he, 'is called a paliated usury. It is thus. When a person is in want of money, he goes to a treasurer (a kind of banker or merchant,) on whom he has an order for 1000 crowns; the treasurer tells him that he will pay him in a fortnight's time, when he is to receive the money. The poor man cannot wait. Our good treasurer tells him, I will give you half in money and half in goods. So he passes his goods that are worth 100 crowns for 200.' He then touches on the bribes which these treasurers and clerks in office took, excusing themselves by alleging 'the little pay they otherwise received. All these practices be sent to the devils!' cries Maillard, in thus addressing himself to the ladies. 'It is for you all this damnation ensues. Yes! yes! you must have rich satins, and girdles of gold out of this accursed money. When any one has any thing to receive from the husband, he must first make a present to the wife of some fine gown, or girdle, or ring. If you ladies and gentlemen who are batten on your pleasures, and wear scarlet clothes, I believe if you were closely put in a good press, we should see the blood of the poor gush out, with which your scarlet is dyed.'

Maillard notices the following curious particulars of the mode of cheating in trade in his times.

He is violent against the apothecaries for their cheats. They mix ginger with cinnamon, which they sell for real spices; they put their bags of ginger, pepper, saffron, cinnamon, and other drugs in damp cellars, that they may weigh heavier; they mix oil with saffron to give it a colour, and to make it weightier. He does not forget those tradesmen who put water in their wool, and moisten their cloth that it may stretch; tavern-keepers, who sophisticate and mingle wines: to the very butchers who blow up their meat, and who mix hog's lard with the fat of their meat. He terribly declaims against those who buy with a great allowance of measure and weight, and then sell with a small measure and weight; and curses those who, when they weigh, press the scales down with their finger. But it is time to conclude with master Oliver! His catalogue is, however, by no means exhausted; and it may not be amiss to observe, that the present age have retained every one of the sins which are here alleged.

The following extracts are from Menot's sermons, which are written like Maillard's, in a barbarous Latin mixed with old French.

Michael Menot died in 1518. I think he has more wit than Maillard, and occasionally displays a brilliant imagination; with the same singular mixture of grave declamation and farcical absurdities. He is called in the title-page the golden-tongued. It runs thus, Predicatoris qui lingua aurea, sua tempestas nuncupatus est, Sermones quadragesimales, ad ipso olim Turonia declamati. Paris, 1525, 8vo.

When he compares the church with a vine, he says, 'There were once some Britons and Englishmen who would have carried away all France into their country, because they found our wine better than their beer; but as they well knew that they could not always remain in France, nor carry away France into their country, they would at least carry with them several stocks of vines; they planted some in England; but these stocks soon degenerated, because the soil was not adapted to them.' Notwithstanding what Menot said in 1500, and that we have tried so often, we are still flattering ourselves that if we plant vineyards we may have English wine.

The following beautiful figure describes those who live neglectful of their aged parents, who had cherished them into prosperity. 'See the trees flourish and recover their leaves; it is their root that has produced all; but when the branches are loaded with flowers and with fruits, they yield nothing to the root. This is an image of those children who prefer their own amusements, and to game away their fortunes, than to give to their old parents the cares which they want.'

He acquaints us with the following circumstances of the immorality of that age. Who has not got a mistress besides his wife? The poor wife eats the fruit of bitterness, and even makes the bed for the mistresses. Oaths were not unfashionable in his day. 'Since the world has been world, this crime was never greater. There were once pillories for these swearers; but now this crime is so common, that the child of five years can swear; and even the old dotard of eighty, who has only two teeth remaining can fling out an oath.'

On the power of the fair sex of his day, he observes, 'A father says my son studies; he must have a bishoprick, or an abbey of 500 livres. Then he will have dogs, horses, and mistresses, like others. Another says, I will have my son placed at court, and have many honourable dignities. To succeed well, both employ the mediation of women; unhappily the church and the law are entirely at their disposal. We have artful Delilahs who shear us close. For twelve crowns and an ell of velvet given to a woman, you gain the worst law-suit, and best living.'

In his last sermon, Menot recapitulates the various topics he had touched on during Lent. This extract will present a curious picture, and impress the mind with a just notion of the versatile talents of these preachers.

I have told ecclesiastics how they should conduct themselves; not that they are ignorant of their duties; but I must ever repeat to girls, not to suffer themselves to be duped by them. I have told these ecclesiastics that they should imitate the lark; if she has a grain she does not remain idle, but feels her pleasure in singing, and in singing always is ascending towards heaven. So they should not a mass; but elevate the hearts of all to God; and not do as the frogs who are crying out day and night, and think they have a fine throat, but always remain fixed in the mud.

'I have told the men of the law that they should have the qualities of the eagle. The first is, that this bird when it flies fixes its eye on the sun; so all judges, counsellors, and attorneys, in judging, writing, and signing, should always have God before their eyes. And secondly, this bird is never greedy; it willingly shares its prey with others: so all lawyers, who are rich in crowns after having had their bills paid, should distribute some to the poor, particularly when they are conscious that their money arises from their prey.'

'I have spoken of the marriage state, but all that I have said has been disregarded. See those wretches who break the hymeneal chains, and abandon their wives! they pass their holidays out of their parishes, because if they remained at home they must have joined their wives at church; they like their prostitutes better; and it will be so every day in the year! I would as well dine with a Jew or a heretic, as with them. What an infected place is this! Mistress Lubricity has taken possession of the whole city; look in every corner and you will be convinced.

'For you married women! If you have heard the nightingale's song, you must know that she sings during three months, and that she is silent when she has young ones. So there is a time in which you may sing and take your pleasures in the marriage state, and another to watch your children. Don't damn yourselves for them; and remember it would be better to see them drowned than damned.'

'As to widows, I observe, that the turtle withdraws and sighs in the woods, whenever she has lost her companion; so must they retire into the wood of the cross, and having lost their temporal husband, take no other but Jesus Christ.

'And to close all, I have told girls that they must fly from the company of men, and not permit them to embrace, nor even touch them. Look on the rose, it has a delightful odour; it embalmes the place in which it is placed; but if you grasp it underneath, it will prick you till the blood issues. The beauty of the rose is the beauty of the girl. The beauty and perfume of the first invite to smell and to handle it, but when it is touched underneath it pricks sharply; the beauty of the girl likewise invites the hand; but you, my young ladies! you must never suffer this, for I tell you that every man who does this, designs to make you harlots.'

These ample extracts will, I hope, convey the same pleasure to the reader, which I have received by collecting them from their scarce originals, little known even to the curious. Menot, it cannot be denied, displays a poetic imagination, and a fertility of conception, which distinguishes him among his rivals. The same taste and popular manner came into our country, and were suited to the simplicity of the age. In 1527, our Bishop Latimer preached a sermon, in which he expresses himself thus:—'Now ye have heard what I meant by this first card, and how ye ought to play. I purpose again to deal unto you another card of the same suit; for they be: so nigh affinity, that one cannot be well played without the other.' It is curious to observe about a century afterwards, as Fuller informs us, that when a country clergyman imitated these familiar allusions, the taste of the congregation had so changed, that he was interrupted by peals of laughter!

Even in more modern times have Menot and Maillard found an imitator in little Father André, as well as others. His character has been variously drawn. He is by some represented as a kind of buffoon in the pulpit; but others more judiciously observe, that he only indulged his natural genius, and uttered humorous and lively things, as the good father observes himself, to keep the attention of his audience awake. He was not always laughing. 'He told many a bold truth, says the author of Guerre des Auteurs anciens et modernes, 'that sent bishops to their diocesses, and made many a coquette blush. He possessed the art of biting when he smiled; and more ably combated vice by his ingenious satire than by those vague apostrophes, which no one takes to himself. While others were straining their minds to catch at sublime thoughts, which no one understood, he lowered his talents to the most hum-the situations, and to the minutest things. From them he drew his examples and his comparisons; and the one and the other never failed of success.' Marville says, that 'his expressions were full of shrewd simplicity. He made very free use of the most popular proverbs. His comparisons and figures were always borrowed from the most familiar and lowest things.' To ridicule effectually the reigning vices, he willingly employed quips or puns rather than sublime thoughts, and he was little solicitous of his choice of expression. Gasparo Gozzi, in Italy had the same power in drawing unexpected inferences from vulgar and familiar occurrences. It was by this art Whitfield obtained so many followers. In Piozzi's British Synonymies, Vol. II, p. 205, we have an instance of Gozzi's manner. In the time of Charles II it became fashionable to introduce humour into sermons. Sterne seems to have revived it in his sermons: South's sparkle perpetually with wit and pun.

Far different, however, are the characters of the sublime preachers, of whom the French have preserved the following descriptions.

We have not any more, Bourdeloue, La Rue, and Massillon; but the idea which still exists of their manner of addressing their auditors, may serve instead of lessons. Each had his own peculiar mode, always adapted to place, time, circumstance, to their auditors, their style, and their subject.

Bourdeloue, with a collected air, had little action: with eyes generally half closed, he penetrated the hearts of the people by the sound of a voice uniform and solemn. The tone with which a sacred orator pronounced the words, Tu es ille vir, 'Thou art the man,' in suddenly addressing them to one of the kings of France, struck more forcibly than their application. Madame De Sevigné describes our preacher, by saying, 'Father Bourdeloue thunders at Notre Dame.'

La Rue appeared with the air of a prophet. His manner was irresistible, full of fire, intelligence and force. He had strokes perfectly original. Several old men, his contemporaries, still shuddered at the recollection of the expression which he employed in an apostrophe to the God of vengeance, Evangélisme gladium tuum.

The person of Massillon is still present to many. It seems, say his admirers, that he is yet in the pulpit with that air of simplicity, that modest demeanour, those eyes humbly declining, those unstudied gestures, that passionate tone, that mild countenance of a man penetrated with his subject, and conveying to the mind the most brilliant light, and to the heart the most tender emotions. Baron, the tragedian, coming out from one of his sermons, truth forced from his lips a confession humiliating to his profession; 'My friend,' said he to one of his companions, 'this is an error! and we are only actors.'

MASTERLY IMITATORS.

There have been found occasionally some artists who could so perfectly imitate the spirit, the taste, the character, and the peculiarities of great masters, that they have not unfrequently deceived the most skillful connoisseurs. Michael Angelo sculptured a sleeping Cupid, of which having broken off an arm, he buried the same in a place where he knew it would soon be found. The critics were over tired of admiring it, as one of the most precious relics of antiquity. It was sold to the Cardinal of St George, to whom Michael Angelo discovered the whole mystery, by passing to the Cupid the arm which he had reserved.

An anecdote of Peter Mignard is more singular. This great artist painted a Magdalen on a canvass fabricated at Rome. A broker, in concert with Mignard, went to the Chevalier de Clairville, and told him as a secret that he was to receive from Italy a Magdalen of Guido, and his master-piece. The chevalier caught the bait, begged the preference, and purchased the picture at a very high price.

He was informed he had been imposed upon, and that the Magdalen was painted by Mignard. Mignard himself caused the alarm to be given, but the amateur would not believe it: all the connoisseurs agreed it was a Guido, and the famous Le Brun corroborated this opinion.

The chevalier came to Mignard, 'Some persons assure me that my Magdalen is your work?'—'Mine!' they said with great honour. I am sure Le Brun is not of this opinion.'—'Le Brun swears it can be no other than a Guido.'—'You shall dine with me, and meet several of the first connoisseurs.'

On the day of meeting, the picture was again more closely inspected. Mignard hinted his doubts whether the piece was the work of that great master; he insinuated that it was possible to be deceived; and added, that if it was Guido's, he did not think it in his best manner.' 'It is a Guido, sir, and in his very best manner,' replied Le Brun with warmth; and all the critics were unanimous. Mignard then spoke in a firm tone of voice; 'And I, gentlemen, will wager three hundred louis that it is not a Guido. The dispute now became violent; Le Brun was desirous of accepting the wager. In a word, the affair became such that it could add nothing more to the glory of Mignard. 'No sir,' replied the latter, 'I am too honest to bet when I am certain to win. Monsieur Le Chevalier, this piece cost you 2000 crowns; the money must be returned,—the painting is mine.' Le Brun would not believe it. 'The proof,' Mignard continued, 'is easy. On this canvass, which is a Roman one, was the portrait of a cardinal; I will show you his cap.'—The chevalier did not know which of the rival artists to credit. The proposition alarmed him. 'He who painted the picture shall repair it,' said Mignard. He took a pencil dipped in oil, and rubbing the hair of the Magdalen discovered the cap of the cardinal.—The honour of the ingenious painter could no longer be disputed; Le Brun, vexed, sarcastically exclaimed, 'Always paint Guido, but never Mignard.'

There is a collection of engravings by that ingenious artist Bernard Picart, which has been published under the title of The Innocent Impostors. Picart had long been vexed at the taste of his day, which ran wholly in favour of antiquity, and no one would look at, much less admire, a modern master. He published a pretended collection or a set of prints, from the designs of the great painters, in which he imitated the etchings and engravings of the various masters, and much were these prints admired as the works of Guido, Rembrandt, and others. Having had his joke, they were published under the title of Impostures Innocentes. The connoisseurs however are strangely divided in their opinion of the merit of this collection. Gilpin classes these 'Innocent Impostors' among the most entertaining of his works, and is delighted by the happiness with which he has outdone in their own excellencies the artists whom he copied: but Strutt, too grave to admit of jokes that twit the connoisseurs, declares that they could never have deceived an experienced judge, and reprobrates such kinds of ingenuity, played off at the cost of the venerable brotherhood of the cognoscenti!

The same thing was however done by Goltzius, who being disgusted at the preference given to the works of Albert Durer, Lucas of Leyden, and others of that school, and having attempted to introduce a better taste, which was not immediately relished, he published what was afterwards called his master-pieces. These are six prints in the style of these masters, merely to prove that Goltzius could imitate their works, if he thought proper. One of these, the Circumcision, he had painted on soiled paper, and to give it the brown tint of antiquity, had carefully smoked it, by which means it was sold as a curious performance, and deceived some of the most capital connoisseurs of the day, one of whom bought it as one of the finest engravings of Albert Durer. Even Strutt acknowledges the merit of Goltzius's master-pieces.

To these instances of artists I will add others of celebrated authors. Muretus rendered Joseph Scaliger, a great stickler for the ancients, highly ridiculous by an artifice which he practised. He sent some verses which he pretended were copied from an old manuscript. The verses were excellent, and Scaliger was credulous. After having read them, he exclaimed they were admirable, and affirmed that they were written by an old comic poet, Trabeus. He quoted them in his commentary on Varo de Re Rustica, as one of the most precious fragments of antiquity. It was then, when he had fixed his foot firmly in the trap, that Muretus informed the world of the little dependence to be placed on the critical sagacity of one so prejudiced in favour of the ancients, and who considered his judgment as infallible.

The Abbé Regneir Desmarais, having written an ode, or, as the Italians call it, Canzone, sent it to the Abbé Strozzi at Florence, who used it to impose on three or four academicians of Della Crusca. He gave out that Leo Allatius, librarian of the Vatican, in examining carefully the mass of Petrarch preserved there, had found two pages slightly glued, which having separated, he had discovered this ode. The fact was not at first easily credited; but afterwards the singularity of style and manner rendered it highly probable. When Strozzi undeciphered the public, it procured the Abbé Regnier a place in the academy, as an honourable testimony of his ingenuity.

Pere Commire, when Louis XIV resolved on the conquest of Holland, composed a Latin fable, entitled 'The Sun and the Frogs,' in which he assumed with such elucidity the style and character of Phædrus, that the learned German critic Wolfius was deceived, and innocently inserted it in his edition of that fabulist.

Faminius Strada would have deceived most of the critics of his age, if he had given as the remains of antiquity the different pieces of history and poetry which he composed on the model of the ancients, in his Prologues Academicæ. To preserve probability he might have given out that he had drawn them from some old and neglected library: he had then only to have added a good commentary, tending to display the conformity of the style and manner of these fragments with the works of those authors to whom he ascribed them.

Sigonius was a great master of the style of Cicero, and ventured to publish a treatise de consolatione, as a composition of Cicero recently discovered; many were deceived by the counterfeit, which was performed with great dexterity, and was long received as genuine; but he could not deceive Lipsius, who, after reading only ten lines, threw it away, exclaiming, 'Vah! non est Ciceronis!' The late Mr Burke succeeded more skilfully in his 'Vindication of Natural Society,' which for a long time passed as the composition of Lord Bolingbroke: so perfect is this ingenious imposture of the spirit, manner, and course of thinking, of the noble author. I believe it was written for a wager, and fairly won.

EDWARD THE FOURTH.

Our Edward the Fourth was a gay and voluptuous prince; and probably owed his crown to his handsomeness, his enormous debts, and passion for the fair sex. He had many Jane Shores. Honest Philip de Comines, his contemporary, says, 'That what greatly contributed to his entering London as soon as he appeared at its gates, was the great debts this Prince had contracted, which made his creditors gladly assist him; and the high favour in which he was held by the Bourgeoises, into whose good graces he had frequently glided, and who gained over to him their husbands, who, I suppose, for the tranquillity of their lives, were glad to depose, or to raise monarchs.—Many ladies and rich citizens' wives, of whom formerly he had great privacies and familiar acquaintance, gained over to him their husbands and relations.'

This is the description of his voluptuous life; we must recollect, that the writer had been an eye witness, and was an honest man; while modern historians only view objects through the colouring medium of their imagination.

'He had been during the last twelve years more accustomed to his ease and pleasure than any other prince who lived in his time. He had nothing in his thoughts but les dames, and of them more than was reasonable; and hunting-matches, good eating, and great care of his person. When he went in their seasons to these hunting-matches, he always had carried with him great pavilions for les dames, and at the same time gave splendid entertainments; so that it is not surprising that his person was as jolly as any one I ever saw. He was then young, and as handsome as any man of his age; but he has since become enormously fat.'

Since I have got old Philip in my hand, the reader will not, perhaps, be displeased, if he attends to a little more of his mauvais, which will appear in the form of a conversation of the times. He relates what passed between Edward and the king of France:

'When the ceremony of the oath was concluded, our king, who was desirous of being friendly, began to say to the king of England, in a laughing way, that he must come to Paris, and be jovial amongst our ladies; and that he would give him the Cardinal de Bourbon for his confessor, who would very willingly absolve him of any sin which perchance he might commit. The king of England seemed well pleased at the invitation, and laughed heartily; for he knew that the said cardinal was an fort bon compagnon. When the king was returning, he spoke on the road to me; and said, that he did not like to find the king of England so much inclined to come to Paris. "He is," said he, "a very handsome king: he likes the women too much. He may probably find one at Paris that may make him like to come too often, or stay too long. His predecessors have already been too much at Paris and in Normandy;" and that "his company was not agreeable this side of the sea; but that, beyond the sea, he wished to be bon frere et amy."

I have called Philip de Comines honest. The old writers, from the simplicity of their style, usually receive the honourable epithet; but sometimes they deserve it as much as most modern memoir-writers. No enemy is indeed so terrible as a man of genius. Comines' violent enmity to the Duke of Burgundy, which appears in these Memoirs, has been traced by the minute researchers of anecdotes, and the cause is not honourable to the memoir-writer whose resentment was implacable. De Comines was born a subject of the Duke of Burgundy, and for several years had been a favorite; but one day returning from hunting with the Duke, then Count de Charolais, in familiar jocularity he sat himself down before the prince, ordering the prince to pull off his boots. The count laughed and did this, but in return for Comines' princely amusement, dashed the boot in his face, and gave Comines a bloody nose. From that time he was mortified in the court of Burgundy by the nickname of the booted head. Comines long felt a rankling wound in his mind; and after this family quarrel, for it was nothing more, he went over to the king of France, and wrote off his bile against the Duke of Burgundy in those 'Memoirs,' which give posterity a caricature likeness of that prince, whom he is ever censuring for presumption, obstinacy, pride, and cruelty. This Duke of Burgundy however, it is said, with many virtues, had but one great vice, the vice of sovereigns, that of ambition!

The impertinence of Comines had not been chastised with great severity; but the nickname was never forgiven: unfortunately for the duke, Comines was a man of genius. When we are versed in the history of the times, we shall often discover that memoir-writers have some secret poison in their hearts. Many, like Comines, have had the boot dashed on their nose. Personal rancour wonderfully enlivens the style of Lord Oxford and Cardinal de Retz. Memoirs are often dictated by its fiercest spirit; and then histories are composed from memoirs. Where is truth? Not always in histories and memoirs!

ELIZABETH.

This great queen, says Marville, passionately admired handsome persons, and he was already far advanced in her favour who approached her with beauty and grace. She had so unconquerable an aversion for ugly and ill-made men, who had been treated unfortunately by nature, that she could not endure their presence.

When she issued from her palace, her guards were careful to disperse from before her eyes hideous and deformed people, the lame, the hunch-backed, &c., in a word, all those whose appearance might shock her fastidious sensations.

There is this singular and admirable in the conduct of Elizabeth, that she made her pleasure subservient to her politics, and she maintained her affairs by what in general occasion the ruin of princes. So secret were her amours, that even to the present day their mysteries cannot be penetrated; but the utility she drew from them is public, and always operated for the good of her people. Her lovers were her ministers, and her ministers were her lovers. Love commanded, love was obeyed; and the reign of this princess was happy, because it was a reign of Love, in which its chains and its slavery are liked!

The origin of Raleigh's advancement in the queen's graces, was by an act of gallantry. Raleigh spoiled a new plush cloak, while the queen stepping cautiously on it, shot forth a smile, in which he read promotion. Captain Raleigh soon became Sir Walter, and rapidly advanced in the queen's favour.

Hume has furnished us with ample proofs of the passion which her courtiers feigned for her, and which, with others I shall give, confirm the opinion of Vigneul Marville, who did not know probably the reason why her amours were never discovered; which, indeed, never went further at the highest than boisterous or extreme gallantry. Hume has preserved in his notes a letter written by Raleigh. It is a perfect amorous composition. After having exerted his poetic talents to exalt her charms, and his affection, he concludes, by comparing her majesty, who was then sixty, to Venus and Diana. Sir Walter was not her only courtier who wrote in this style. Even in her old age she affected a strange fondness for music and dancing, and a kind of childish drollery, by which however her court seemed a court of love, and she the sovereign. A curious anecdote in a letter of the times has reached us. Secretary Cecil, the youngest son of Lord Burleigh, seems to have perfectly entered into her character. Lady Derby wrote about her neck and in her bosom a portrait; the queen spying it, inquired about it, but her ladyship was anxious to conceal it. The queen insisted on having it, and discovering it to be the portrait of young Cecil, she snatched it away, and tying it upon her shoe, walked long with it; afterwards she pinned it on her elbow, and wore it some time there. Secretary Cecil hearing of this composed some verses and got them set to music; this music the queen insisted on hearing. In his verses Cecil sang that he repined not, though her majesty was pleased to grace others; he contented himself with the favour she had given him, by wearing his portrait on her feet and her elbow! The writer of the letter adds, "All these things are very secret." In this manner she contrived to lay the fastest hold on her able servants, and her servants on her.

Those who are intimately acquainted with the private anecdotes of those times, know what encouragement this royal coquette gave to most who were near her person. Dodd, in his Church History, says, that the Earls of Arundel and Arundel, and Sir William Pickering, 'were not out of hopes of gaining Queen Elizabeth's affections in a matrimonial way.

She encouraged every person of eminence: she even went so far on the anniversary of her coronation, as publicly to take a ring from her finger, and put it on the Duke of Alençon's hand. She also ranked among her suitors, Henry the Third of France, and Henry the Great.

She never forgave Buzenval for ridiculing her bad pronunciation of the French language: and when Henry IV sent him over on an embassy, she would not receive him. So nice was the irritable pride of this great queen, that she made her private injuries matters of state.

'This queen,' writes Du Maurier, in the Mémoires pour servir à l'Histoire de Hollande, 'who displayed so many heroic accomplishments, had this foible, of wishing to be thought beautiful by all the world. I heard from my father, that having been sent to her, at every audience he had with her majesty, she pulled off her gloves more than a hundred times to display her hands, which indeed were very beautiful and very white.'

Another anecdote, not less curious, relates to the affair of the Duke of Anjou and our Elizabeth, and one more proof of her partiality for handsome men. The writer was Lewis Guyon, a contemporary of the times he notices.

'Francis Duke of Anjou being desirous of marrying a crown head, caused proposals of marriage to be made to Elizabeth queen of England. Letters passed betwixt them, and their portraits were exchanged. At length her majesty informed him, that she would never contract a marriage with any one who sought her, if she did not first see his person. If he would not come, nothing more should be said on the subject. This prince, over-pressed by his young friends, (who were as little able of judging as himself) paid no attention to the counsels of men of maturer judgment. He passed over to England without a splendid train. The said lady contemplated his person; she found him ugly, disfigured by deep scars of the small-pox, and that he had also an ill-shaped nose, with swellings in the neck! All these were so many reasons with her, that he could never be admitted into her good graces.'

Puttenham, in his very rare book of the 'Art of Poesie,' p. 248, notices the grace and majesty of Elizabeth's demeanour, 'Her stately manner of walk, with a certain grandeur rather than gravitie, marching with leysure, which our sovereign ladye and mistresse is accustomed to doe generally, unless it be when she walketh apace for her pleasure, or to patch her a heats in the cold mornings.'

By the following extract from a letter from one of her gentlemen, we discover that her usual habits, though studious, were not of the gentlest kind, and that the service she exacted from her attendants was not borne without concealed murmurs. The writer groans in secrecy to his friend. Sir John Stanhope writes to Sir Robert Cecil in 1598, 'I was all the afternoone with her majesty, at my booke, and then thinking to rest me, went in agayne with your letter. She was pleased with the Philosopher's stone, and hath been all this daye reasonably quyet. Mr Greuell is absent, and I am tyed so as I cannot styrr, but shall be at the woorke for yt, these two dayes!'

Puttenham, p. 249, has also recorded an honourable anecdote of Elizabeth, and characteristic of that high majesty which was in her thoughts, as well as in her actions. When she came to the crown, a knight of the realm who had insolently behaved to her when Lady Elizabeth, fell upon his knees to her, and besought her pardon, suspecting to be sent to the Tower; she replied mildly, 'Do you not know that we are descended of the lion, whose nature is not to harme or prey upon the mouse, or any other such small vermin?'

Queen Elizabeth was taught to write by the celebrated Roger Ascham. Her writing is extremely beautiful and correct, as may be seen by examining a little manuscript book of prayers, preserved in the British Museum. I have seen her first writing-book preserved at Oxford in the Bodleian Library; the gradual improvement of her majesty's hand-writing, is very honourable to her diligence; but the most curious thing is the paper on which she tried her pens; this she usually did by writing the name of her beloved brother Edward; a proof the early and ardent attachment she formed to that amiable prince.

The education of Elizabeth had been severely classical; she thought, and she wrote in all the spirit of the great characters of antiquity; and her speeches and her letters are studded with apophthegms, and a terseness of ideas and language, that give an exalted idea of her mind. In her evasive answers to the commons, in reply to their petition to her majesty to marry, she has employed an energetic word: 'Were I to tell you that I do not mean to marry, I might say less than I intend; and were I to tell you that I do mean to marry, I might say more than it is proper for you to know; therefore I give you an answer, answerless!'

THE CHINESE LANGUAGE.

The Chinese language is like no other on the globe; it is said to contain not more than about 330 words, but it is by no means monotonous, for it has four accents, the even, the raised, the lessened, and the returning, which multiply every word into four; as difficult, says Mr Asle, for an European to understand, as it is for a Chinese to comprehend the six pronunciations of the French x. In fact they can so diversify their monosyllabic words by the different tones which they give them, that the same character differently accented, signifies sometimes ten or more different things.

From the twenty-ninth volume of the Lettres Edifiantes et Curieuses I take the present critically humorous account of this language.

P. Bourgeois, one of the missionaries, attempted, after ten months, residence at Pekin, to preach in the Chinese language. These are the words of the good father. 'God knows how much this first Chinese sermon cost me! I can assure you, this language resembles no other. The same word has never but one termination; and then adieu to all that in our declensions distinguishes the gender, and the number of things we would speak; adieu, in the verbs to all which might explain the active person, how and in what time it acts, if it acts alone or with others: in a word, with the Chinese the same word is the substantive, adjective, verb, singular, plural, masculine, feminine, &c. It is the person who hears who must arrange the circumstances, and guess them. Add to all this, that all the words of this language are reduced to three hundred and a few more; that they are pronounced in so many different ways, that they signify eighty thousand different things, which are expressed by as many different characters. This is not all: the arrangement of all these monosyllables appears to be under no general rule; so that to know the language after having learnt the words, we must learn every particular phrase: the least inversion would make you unintelligible to three parts of the Chinese.

'I will give you an example of their words. They told me chou signifies a book: so that I thought whenever the word chou was pronounced, a book was the subject. Not at all! Chou, the next time I heard it, I found signified a tree. Now I was to recollect, chou was a book or a tree. But this amounted to nothing: chou, I found, expressed also great heat; chou is to relate: chou is the Aurora; chou means to be accustomed; chou expresses the loss of a wager, &c. I should not finish, were I to attempt to give you all its significations.

'Notwithstanding these singular difficulties, could one but find a help in the perusal of their books, I should not complain. But this is impossible! Their language is quite different from that of simple conversation. What will ever be an insurmountable difficulty to every European, is the pronunciation: every word may be pronounced in five different tones; yet every tone is not so distinct that an unpractised ear can easily distinguish it.

These monosyllables fly with amazing rapidity: then they are continually disguised by elisions, which sometimes hardly leave any thing of two monosyllables. From an aspirated tone, you must pass immediately to an even one; from a whistling note to an inward one; sometimes your voice must proceed from the palate; sometimes it must be guttural, and almost always nasal. I recited my sermon at least fifty times to my servant, before I spoke it in public; and yet I am told, though he continually corrected me, that, of the ten parts of the sermon, (as the Chinese express themselves,) they hardly understood three. Fortunately the Chinese are wonderfully patient; and they are astonished that any ignorant stranger should be able to learn two words of their language.'

It is not less curious to be informed, as Dr Hager tells us in his Elementary Characters of the Chinese, that 'Satires are often composed in China, which, if you attend to the characters, their import is pure and sublime; but if you regard the tone only, they contain a meaning ludicrous or obscene.' He adds, 'In the Chinese one word sometimes corresponds to three or four thousand characters; a property quite opposite to that of our language, in which myriads of different words are expressed by the same letters.'

MEDICAL MUSIC.

In the Philosophical Magazine for May 1806, we find that several of the medical literati on the continent are at present engaged in making inquiries and experiments upon the influence of music in the cure of diseases. The learned Dussaux is said to lead the band of this new tribe of amateurs and cognoscenti.

The subject having excited my curiosity, though I since have found that it is no new discovery, the reader ought to receive indulgently the profit of my discoveries; all which I do not wish to pass on him for more than they are worth.

There is a curious article in Dr Burney's History of Music, 'On the Medicinal Powers attributed to Music by the Ancients,' which he derived from the learned labours of a modern physician, M. Burette, who doubtless could play a tune to, as well as prescribe one to his patient. He conceives that music can relieve the pains of the sciatica, and that independent of the greater or less skill of the musician; by flattering the ear and diverting the attention, and occasioning certain vibrations of the nerves, it can remove those obstructions which occasion this disorder. M. Burette, and many modern physicians and philosophers, have believed that music has the power of affecting the mind, and the whole nervous system, so as to give a temporary relief in certain diseases, and even a radical cure. Dr Mairan, Bianchini, and other respectable names, have pursued the same career. But the ancients record miracles!

Some years ago, the Rev. Dr Mitchell of Brighthelmston wrote a dissertation, 'De Arte Melendi apud Priscos Muses ope atque Carminum,' printed for J. Nichols, 1783. He writes under the assumed name of Michael Gaspar; but whether this learned dissertator be grave or jocular, more than one critic has not been able to resolve me. I suspect it to be a satire on the parade of learning of certain German eruditi, who prove any point by the weakest analogies and the most fanciful conceits. The following summary will convey an idea of this dissertation.

Amongst barbarous or half-civilized nations, diseases have been generally attributed to the influence of evil spirits. The depression of mind which is generally attendant on sickness, and the delirium accompanying certain stages of disease seem to have been considered as especially denoting the immediate influence of a demon. The effect of music in raising the energies of the mind, or what we commonly call animal spirits, was obvious to early observation. Its power of attracting strong attention, may in some cases have appeared to effect even those who laboured under a considerable degree of mental disorder. The accompanying depression of mind was considered as a part of the disease, perhaps rightly enough, and music was prescribed as a remedy to remove the symptoms—when experience had not ascertained the probable cause. Homer, whose heroes exhibit high passions, but not refined manners, represents the Grecian Army as employing music to stay the raging of the plague. The Jewish nation, in the time of King David, appear not to have been much further advanced in civilization; accordingly we find David employed in his youth to remove the mental derangement of Saul by his harp. The method of cure was suggested as a common one in those days, by Saul's servants; and the success is not mentioned as a miracle. Pindar, with poetic license, speaks of Æsculapius healing acute disorders with soothing songs; but Æsculapius, whether man or deity, or between both, is a physician of the days of barbarism and fable. Pliny scouts the idea that music should affect real bodily injury, but quotes Homer on the subject; mentions Theophrastus as suggesting a tune for the cure of the hip gout, and Cato, as entertaining a fancy that it had a good effect when limbs were out of joint, and, that Varro thought it good for the gout. Aulus Gellius cites a work of Theophrastus, which recommends music as a specific for the bite of a viper. Boyle and Shakspeare mention the effects of music super-venicam. Kircher's 'Musurgia,' and Swinburne's Travels, relate the effects of music on those who are bitten by the tarantula. Sir W. Temple seems to have given credit to the stories of the power of music over diseases.

The ancients indeed record miracles; at least none in 'the golden legend' appear to be more so than the tales they relate of the medicinal powers of music. A fever is removed by a song, and deafness is cured by a trumpet, and the pestilence is chased away by the sweetness of an harmonious lyre. That deaf people can hear best in a great noise, is a fact alleged by some moderns, in favour of the ancient story of curing deafness by a trumpet. Dr Willis tells us, says Dr Burney, of a lady who could hear only while a drum was beating, inasmuch that her husband, the account says, hired a drummer as her servant, in order to enjoy the pleasure of her conversation.

Music and the sounds of instruments, says the lively Vigneul de Marville, contribute to the health of the body and the mind, they assist the circulation of the blood, they dissipate vapours, and open the vessels so that the action of perspiration is freer. He tells a story of a person of distinction, who assured him, that once being suddenly seized by violent illness, instead of a consultation of physicians, he immediately called a band of musicians, and their violins played so well in his inside, that his bowels became perfectly in tune, and in a few hours were harmoniously becalmed. I once heard a story of Farinelli the famous singer, who was sent for to Madrid to try the effect of his magical voice on the King of Spain. His majesty was buried in the profoundest melancholy, nothing could raise an emotion in him; he lived in a total oblivion of life; he sat in a darkened chamber, entirely given up to the most distressing kind of madness. The physicians ordered Farinelli at first to sing in an outer room; and for the first day or two this was done, without any effect on the royal patient. At length it was observed, the king, awaking from his stupor, seemed to listen; on the next day tears were seen starting in his eyes; the day after he ordered the door of his chamber to be left open—and at length the perturbed spirit entirely left our modern Saul, and the medicinal voice of Farinelli effected what no other medicine could.

I now prepare to give the reader some facts, which he may consider as a trial of credulity—their authorities are however not contemptible.—Naturalists assert that animals and birds, as well as 'knotted oaks,' as Congreve informs us, are sensible to the charms of music. This may serve as an instance:—An officer was confined in the Bastille. He begged the governor to permit him the use of his lute, to soften, by the harmonies of his instrument, the rigours of his prison. At the end of a few days, this modern Orpheus, playing on his lute, was greatly astonished to see frisking out of their holes great numbers of mice; and descending from their woven habitations, crowds of spiders, who formed a circle about him, while he continued playing his soul-subduing instrument. His surprise was at first so great, that he was petrified with astonishment; when having ceased to play, the assembly, who did not come to see his person, but to hear his instrument, immediately broke up. As he had a great dislike to spiders, it was two days before he ventured again to such his instrument. At length, having conquered, for the novelty of his company, his dislike of them, he recommenced his concert, when the assembly was by far more numerous than at first; and in the course of farther time, he found himself surrounded by a hundred musical amateurs. Having thus succeeded in attracting this company, he treacherously contrived to get rid of them at his will. For this purpose he begged the keeper to give him a cat, which he put in a cage, and let loose at the very instant when the little hairy people were most entranced by the hyphen still he displayed.

The Abbé Olivet has described an amusement of Pelissier during his confinement in the Bastille, which consisted in feeding a spider, which he discovered forming its web in the corner of the small window. For some time he placed his flies at the edge, while his valet, who was with him, played on a bag-pipe: little by little, the spider used itself to distinguish the sound of the instrument, and issued from its hole to run and catch its prey. Thus calling it always by the same sound, and placing the flies at a still greater distance, he succeeded, after several months, to kill the spider by regular exercise, so that it at length never failed appearing at the first sound to seize on the fly provided for it, even on the knees of the prisoner.

Merrill has given us the following curious anecdote on this subject. He says, that doubting the truth of those who say it is natural for us to love music, especially the sound of instruments, and that beasts themselves are touched with it, being one day in the country I inquired into the truth; and, while a man was playing on the trumpet marine, made my observations on a cat, a dog, a horse, in use, a hind, cows, small birds, and a cock and hens, who were in a yard under a window on which I was leaning. I did not perceive that the cat was the least affected, and I even judged, by her air, that she would have given all the instruments in the world for a mouse, sleeping in the sun all the time; the horse stopped short from time to time before the window, raising his head up now and then, as he was feeding on the grass; the dog continued for above an hour seated on his hind legs, looking steadily at the player; the ass did not discover the least solicitation of his being touched, eating his thistles peacefully; the hind lifted up her large wide ears, and seemed very attentive; the cows slept a little, and after gazing, as though they had been acquainted with us, went forward; most little birds that were in an aviary, and others on the trees and bushes, almost tore their little throats with singing; but the cock, who minded only his hens, who were busy employed in scraping a neighbouring dunghill, did not show in any manner that they took the least pleasure in hearing the trumpet marine.

A modern traveller assures us, that he has repeatedly observed in the island of Madeira, that the lizards are attracted by the notes of music, and that he has assembled a number of them by the powers of his instrument. He tells us also, that when the negroes catch them, for food, they accompany the chase by whistling some tune, which has always the effect of drawing great numbers towards them. Steedman, in his expedition to Surinam, describes how the natives among the negroes, who among several singular practices, can charm or conjure down from the tree various serpents, who will wreath about the arms, neck, and breast of the pretended sorceress, listening to her voice. The sacred writers speak of the charming of adders and vipers; and nothing, says he, is more notorious than that the eastern Indians will rid the houses of the most venomous snakes, by charming them with the sound of a pipe, which calls them out of their holes. These anecdotes, which may startle some, seem to be fully confirmed by Sir William Jones, in his curious dissertation on the musical modes of the Hindoos.

After food, when the operations of digestion and absorption give so much employment to the vessels, that a temporary state of mental repose must be found, especially in hot climates, essential to health, it seems reasonable to believe that a few agreeable airs, either heard or played without effort, must have all the good effects of sleep, and some of its disadvantages; putting the soul in the state, as Milton says, for any subsequent exertion; an exertion, often successfully made by myself. I have been assured by a credible eye-witness, that two wild antelopes used often to come from their woods to the place where a tame savage beast, Sirajuddaulah, entertained himself with psalms, and that they listened to the strains with an appearance of pleasure, till the monster, in whose soul there was no music, shot one of them to display his archery. A learned native told me, that he had frequently seen the most venomous and malignant snakes leave their holes upon hearing tunes on a flute, which, as he supposed, gave them peculiar delight. An intelligent Persian declared he had more than once been present, when a celebrated lutenist, surnamed Bulbul, (i. e. the nightingale,) was playing to a large company, in a grove near Schiraz, where he distinctly saw the nightingales try to vie with the musician, sometimes warbling on the trees, sometimes fluttering from branch to branch, as if they wished to approach the instrument, and at length dropping on the ground in a kind of ecstasy, from which they were soon raised, he assured me, by a change of the mode.

Jackson of Exeter, in reply to the question of Dryden, 'What passion cannot music raise or quell?' sarcastically returns, 'What passion can music raise or quell?' Would not a savage, who had never listened to a musical instrument, feel certain emotions at listening to one for the first time? But civilized man is, no doubt, particularly affected by association of ideas, as all pieces of national music evidently prove.

The Ranz des Vaches, mentioned by Rousseau, in his Dictionary of Music, though without any thing striking in the composition, has such a powerful influence over the Swiss, and impresses them with so violent a desire to return to their own country, that it is forbidden to be played in the Swiss regiments, in the French service, on pain of death. There is also a Scotch tune, which has the same effect on some of our North Britons. In one of our battles in Calabria, a bag-piper of the 78th Highland regiment, when the light infantry charged the French, posted himself on their right, and remained in his solitary situation during the whole of the battle, encouraging the men with a famous Highland charging-tune; and actually upon the retreat and complete rout of the French changed it to another, equally celebrated in Scotland upon the retreat of and victory over an enemy. His next-hand neighbour guarded him so well that he escaped unhurt. This was the spirit of the 'Last Minstrel,' who infused courage among his countrymen, by possessing it in so animated a degree and in so venerable a character.

MINUTE WRITING.

The Iliad of Homer in a nutshell, which Pliny says that Cicero once saw, it is pretended might have been a fact, however to some it may appear impossible. Ælian notices an artist who wrote a distich in letters of gold, which he enclosed in the rind of a grain of corn.

Antiquity and modern times record many such penmen, whose glory consisted in writing in so small a hand that the writing could not be legible to the naked eye. One wrote a verse of Homer on a grain of millet, and another, more indefatigably trifling, transcribed the whole Iliad in so confined a space, that it could be enclosed in a nutshell. Menage mentions, he saw whole sentences which were not perceptible to the eye without the microscope; and pictures and portraits, which appeared at first to be lines and scratches thrown down at random; one of them formed the face of the Dauphiness, with the most pleasing delicacy and correct resemblance. He read an Italian poem in praise of this princess, containing some thousands of verses, written by an officer in the space of a foot and a half. This species of curious idleness has not been lost in our own country: where this minute writing has equalled any on record. Peter Bales, a celebrated calligraphist in the reign of Elizabeth, astonished the eyes of beholders by showing them what they could not see; for in the Harleian mss., 530, we have a narrative of 'a rare piece of work brought to pass by Peter Bales, an Englishman, and a clerk of the chancery;' it seems by the description to have been the whole Bible 'in an English walnut not bigger than a hen's egg. The nut holdeth the book: there are as many leaves in his little book as the great Bible, and he has written as much in one of his little leaves as a great leaf of the Bible.' We are told that this wonderful unreadable copy of the Bible was seen by many thousands. There is a drawing of the head of Charles I, in the library of St John's College at Oxford, wholly composed of minute written characters, which at a small distance resemble the lines of an engraving. The lines of the head, and the ruff, are said to contain the book of Psalms, the Creed, and the Lord's prayer. In the British Museum we find a drawing representing the portrait of Queen Anne, not much above the size of the hand.

On this drawing appear a number of lines and scratches, which the librarian assures the marvelling spectator, includes the entire contents of a thin folio, which on this occasion is carried in the hand.

On this subject it may be worth noticing, that the learned Huet asserts that he, like the rest of the world, for a long time considered as a fiction the story of that industrious writer who is said to have enclosed the Iliad in a nutshell. But having examined the matter more closely, he thought it possible.

One day in company at the Dauphin's, this learned man trifled half an hour in proving it. A piece of vellum, about ten inches in length and eight in width, pliant and firm, can be folded up and enclosed in the shell of a large walnut. It can hold in its breadth one line which can contain 30 verses, and in its length 250 lines. With a crow-quill the writing can be perfect. A page of this piece of vellum will then contain 7500 verses, and the reverse as much; the whole 15,000 verses of the Iliad. And this he proved in their presence, by using a piece of paper, and with a common pen. The thing is possible to be effected; and if on any occasion paper should be most excessively rare, it may be useful to know, that a volume of matter may be contained in a single leaf.

NUMERAL FIGURES.

The learned, after many contests, have at length agreed, that the numeral figures 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, usually called Arabic, are of Indian origin. The Arabians do not pretend to have been the inventors of them, but borrowed them from the Indian nations. The numeral characters of the Brahmins, the Persians, and the Arabians, and other eastern nations, are similar. They appear afterwards to have been introduced into several European nations, by their respective travellers, who returned from the east. They were admitted into calendars and chronicles, but they were not introduced into charters, says Mr Astle, before the sixteenth century. The Spaniards, no doubt, derived their use from the Moors who invaded them. In 1240, the Alphonsean astronomical tables were made by the order of Alphonse X, by a Jew, and an Arabian; they used these numerals, from whence the Spaniards contend that they were first introduced by them.

They were not generally used in Germany until the beginning of the fourteenth century; but in general the forms of the cyphers were not permanently fixed there till after the year 1631. The Russians were strangers to them, before Peter the Great had finished his travels in the beginning of the present century.

The origin of these useful characters with the Indians and Arabians, is attributed to their great skill in the arts of astronomy and of arithmetic, which required more convenient characters than alphabetic letters, for the expressing of numbers.

Before the introduction into Europe of these Arabic numerals, they used alphabetic characters, or Roman numerals. The learned authors of the Nouveau Traité Diplomatique, the most valuable work on every thing concerning the arts and progress of writing, have given some curious notices on the origin of the Roman numerals. They say, that originally men counted by their fingers; thus to mark the first four numbers they used an I, which naturally represents them. To mark the fifth, they chose a V, which is made out by bending inwards the three middle fingers, and stretching out only the thumb and the little finger; and for the tenth they used an X, which is a double V, one placed top-sy-turvy under the other. From this the progression of these numbers is always from one to five, and from five to ten. The hundred was signified by the capital letter of that word in Latin C—centum. The other letter D for 500, and M for 1000, were afterwards added. They subsequently abbreviated their characters, by placing one of these figures before another: and the figure of less value before a higher number, denotes that so much may be deducted from the greater number; for instance, IV signifies five less one, that is four; IX ten less one, that is nine; but these abbreviations are not found amongst the most ancient monuments. These numerical letters are still continued by us, in recording accounts in our exchequer.

That men counted originally by their fingers, is no improvable supposition; it is still naturally practised by the vulgar of the most enlightened nations. In more uncivilized states, small stones have been used, and the etymologists derive the words calculate, and calculation from calculus, which is the Latin term for a pebble-stone, by which they denominated their counters used for arithmetical computations.

Professor Ward, in a learned dissertation on this subject in the Philosophical Transactions, concludes, that it is easier to falsify the Arabic cyphers than the Roman alphabetical numerals; when 1375 is dated in Arabic cyphers, if the 3 is only changed, three centuries are taken away; if the 5 is made into a 9 and taken away the 1, 6 hundred years are added. Such accidents have assuredly produced much confusion among our ancient manuscripts, and still do in our printed books; which is the reason Dr Robertson in his histories has always preferred writing his dates in words, rather than confide them to the care of a negligent printer. Gibbon observes, that some remarkable mistakes have happened by the word millia, which is an abbreviation for soldiers or thousands, and to this blunder he attributes the incredible numbers of martyrdoms, which cannot otherwise be accounted for by historical records.

ENGLISH ASTROLOGERS.

A belief in judicial astrology can only exist in the people, who may be said to have no belief at all; for meretricious sentimentalism can hardly be said to amount to a belief. But a faith in this ridiculous system in our country is of late existence; it was a favourite superstition of the learned, and as the ingenious Tenhove observes, whatever an idea germinates in a learned head, it shoots with additional luxuriance.

When Charles the First was confined, Lilly the astrologer was consulted for the hour which would favour his escape.

A story, which strongly proves how greatly Charles the Second was bigoted to judicial astrology, and whose will certainly not unenlightened, is recorded in Burnet's History of his Own Times.

The most respectable characters of the age, Sir William Dugdale, Elias Ashmole, Dr Grew, and others, were members of an astrological club. Congreve's character of Foresight, in Love for Love, was then no uncommon person, though the humour now is scarcely intelligible.

Dryden cast the nativities of his sons; and what is remarkable, his prediction relating to his son Charles took place. This incident is of so late a date, one might be it would have been cleared up; but if it is a fact, we may allow it affords a rational exultation to its irrational adepts.

In 1670, the passion for horoscopes and expounding stars prevailed in France among the first rank. The newborn child was usually presented naked to the astrologer who read the first lineaments in its forehead, and the transverse lines in its hand, and thence wrote down its future destiny. Catherine de Medicis brought Henry IV the child, to old Nostradamus, whom antiquaries esteem more for his chronicle of Provence, than his vaticinating powders. The sight of the reverend seer, with a beard which streamed like a meteor in the air, terrified the future hero, who dreaded a whipping from so great a personage. Will be credited that one of these magicians having assured Charles IX that he would live as many days as he about turn about on his heels in an hour, standing on one leg, that his majesty every morning performed that solemn exercise for an hour. The principal officers of the court, the judges, the chancellors, and generals, likewise, in compliance, standing on one leg and turning round!

It has been reported of several famous for their astrological skill, that they have suffered a voluntary death merely to verify their own predictions; this has been said of Cordas, and Barton the author of the Anatomy of Melancholy.

It is curious to observe the shifts to which astrologers are put when their predictions are not verified. Great winds were predicted, by a famous adept, about the year 1686. No unusual storms however happened. Bodin, to save the reputation of the art, applied it as a figure to some revolutions in the state; and of which there were instances enough at that moment. Among their lucky and unlucky days, they pretend to give those of various illustrious persons and of families. One is very striking.—Thursday was the unlucky day of our Henry VIII. He, his son Edward VI, Queen Mary, and Queen Elizabeth, all died on a Thursday! This fact had, no doubt, great

The life of Lilly the astrologer, written by himself, is a rious work. He is the Sidrophel of Butler. It contains much artless narrative, and at the same time so much plausible imposture, that it is difficult to know when he is taking what he really believes to be the truth. In a sketch of the state of astrology in his day, those adepts, false characters he has drawn, were the lowest miscreants of the town. They all speak of each other as quacks and impostors. Such were Booker, George Wharm, Gaddry, who gained a livelihood by practising on the credulity of even men of learning so late as in 1650, to a eighteenth century. In Ashmoles Life an account of these artful impostures may be found. Most of them had kept the air in the pillory, and others had conjured themselves up to the gallows. This seems a true statement of fact. But Lilly informs us, that in his various conferences with adepts, their voice resembled that of the Irish! The work is curious for the anecdotes of the times it contains. The amours of Lilly with his mistress are characteristic. He was a very artful man, by his own account; and admirably managed matters which required deception and invention.

Astrology greatly flourished in the time of the civil wars. The royalists and the rebels had their astrologers, as well as their soldiers; and the predictions of the former had a great influence over the latter.

On this subject, it may gratify curiosity to notice three of our works, which bear an excessive price. The price is not entirely to be occasioned by their rarity, and I am inclined to suppose that we have still adepts, whose faith is not strong, or whose scepticism weak.

These Chaldean sages were nearly put to the rout by a mortar park of artillery, fired on them by Mr John Chamber in 1691. Apollo did not use Marsyas more inhumanly than his scourging pen this mystical race, and his personalities made them feel more so. However, a torch knight, the very Quixote of astrology, arrayed in enchanted armour of his occult authors, encountered the pagan in a most stately carousal. He came forth in 'A Defence of Judicial Astrology, in answer to a satire lately published by Mr John Chamber. By Sir Christopher Heydon, Knight, printed at Cambridge 1693.' This is a handsome quarto of about 500 pages. Sir Christopher is a learned and lively writer, and a knight worthy to defend a better cause. But his Dulcinea had caught most wonderfully on his imagination. This defence of this fanciful science, if science it may be called, demonstrates nothing, while it defends every thing. It professes, according to the knight's own ideas: it alleges a mass of scattered facts in favour of astrological predictions, which may be picked up in that immensity of fabling which disgraces history. He strenuously denies, or ridicules, that the greatest writers have said against this fanciful science, while he lays great stress on some passages from obscure authors, or what is worse, from authors of no authority. The most pleasant part is at the close, where he attacks the art from the objections of Mr Chamber by demonstration. Chamber had enriched himself by medical science, and when he charges the astrologers with merely seeking to gain a few beggarly pence, Sir Christopher catches fire, and shows by his quotations, that if we are to despise an art, by its professors attempting to subvert on its behalf the objections which may be raised against its principles, we ought by this argument most heartily to despise the medical science and medical men! He here tells us he can collect against physic and physicians, from the confessions of Hippocrates and Galen, Avicenna, and Agrippa, medicine appears to be a vainer science than even astrology! Sir Christopher is a shrewd ingenious adversary; but when he says he means to give Mr Chamber oil for his vinegar, he has totally taken its quality.

This defence was answered by Thomas Vicars in his Inducement of Astrologers.

The great work is by Lilly; and entirely devoted to astrology. He defends nothing; for this oracle delivers dictums, and details every event as matters not questionable. He sits on the tripod; and every page is embellished by a horoscope, which he explains with the utmost facility. This voluminous monument of the folly of astrology, is a quarto valued at some guineas! It is entitled, 'Christian Astrology, modestly treated of in three parts. by William Lilly, student in Astrology, 2d edition, 1659.' The most curious part of this work is 'a Catalogue of most astrological authors.' There is also a portrait of this arch rogue, and astrologer! an admirable illustration for Lavater!

Lilly's opinions, and his pretended science, were such favourites with the age, that the learned Gataker wrote professedly against this popular delusion. Lilly, at the head of his star-expounding friends, not only formally replied to, but persecuted Gataker annually in his predictions, and even struck at his ghost, when beyond the grave. Gataker died in July, 1654, and Lilly having written in his almanac of that year for the month of August this barbarous Latin verse:—

Hoc in tumbo, jacet presbyter et rebus

Here in this tomb lies a presbyter and knave!

he had the impudence to assert that he had predicted Gataker's death! But the truth is, it was an epitaph like lodgings to let: it stood empty ready for the first passenger to inhabit. Had any other of that party of any eminence died in that month, it would have been as appositely applied to him. But Lilly was an exquisite rogue, and never at a fault. Having prophesied in his almanac for 1650, that the parliament stood upon a tottering foundation, when taken up by a messenger, during the night he contrived to cancel the page, printed off another, and showed his copies before the committee, assuring them that the others were none of his own, but forged by his enemies.

ALCHYMY.

I have seen an advertisement in a newspaper, from a pretender of the hermetic art. With the assistance of 'a little money,' he could 'positively' assure the lover of this science, that he would repay him 'a thousand-fold!' This science, if it merits to be distinguished by the name, has doubtless been an imposition, which, striking on the feeblest part of the human mind, has so frequently been successful in carrying on its delusions.

Mrs Thomas, the Corinna of Dryden, in her life has recorded one of these delusions of alchymy. From the circumstances it is very probable the sage was not less deceived than his patroness.

An infatuated lover of this delusive art met with one who pretended to have the power of transmuting lead to gold: that is, in their language, the imperfect metals to the perfect one. This hermetic philosopher required only the materials, and time, to perform his golden operations. He was taken to the country residence of his patroness. A long laboratory was built, and, that his labours might not be impeded by any disturbance, no one was permitted to enter into it. His door was contrived to turn on a pivot; so that, unseen, and unseeing, his meals were conveyed to him, without distracting the sublime contemplations of the sage.

During a residence of two years, he never condescended to speak but two or three times in the year to his infatuated patroness. When she was admitted into the laboratory, she saw, with pleasing astonishment, stills, immense cauldrons, long flues, and three or four Vulcanian fires blazing at different corners of this magical mine; nor did she behold with less reverence the venerable figure of the dusty philosopher. Pale and emaciated with daily operations and nightly vigils, he revealed to her, in unintelligible jargon, his progress; and having sometimes condescended to explain the mysteries of the arcanæ, she beheld, or seemed to behold, streams of fluid, and heaps of solid ore, scattered around the laboratory. Sometimes he required a new still, and sometimes vast quantities of lead. Already this unfortunate lady had expended the half of her fortune in supplying the demands of the philosopher. She began now to lower her imagination to the standard of reason. Two years had now elapsed, vast quantities of lead had gone in, and nothing but lead had come out. She disclosed her sentiments to the philosopher. He candidly confessed he was himself surprised at his tardy processes; but that now he would exert himself to the utmost, and that he would venture to perform a laborious operation, which hitherto he had hoped not to have been necessitated to employ. His patroness retired, and the golden visions of expectation resumed all their lustre.

One day as they sat at dinner, a terrible shriek, and one crack followed by another, loud as the report of cannon, assailed their ears. They hastened to the laboratory; two of the greatest stills had burst, and one part of the laboratory and the house were in flames. We are told that after another adventure of this kind, this victim to alchemy, after ruining another patron, in despair swallowed poison.

Even more recently we have a history of an alchemist in the life of Romney, the painter. This alchemist, after bestowing much time and money on preparations for the grand projection, and being near the decisive hour, was induced, by the too earnest request of his wife, to quit his furnace one evening, to attend some of her company at the tea-table. While the projector was attending the ladies his furnace blew up! In consequence of this event, he conceived such an antipathy against his wife, that he could not endure the idea of living with her again.

Henry VI was so reduced by his extravagances, that Evelyn observes in his Numismata, he endeavoured to recruit his empty coffers by alchemy. The record of this singular proposition contains 'The most solemn and serious account of the feasibility and virtues of the philosopher's stone, encouraging the search after it, and dispensing with all statutes and prohibitions to the contrary.' This record was very probably communicated (says an ingenious antiquary) by Mr Selden, to his beloved friend Ben Jonson, when he was writing his comedy of the Alchemist.

After this patent was published, many promised to answer the king's expectations so effectually (the same writer adds) that the next year he published another patent; wherein he tells his subjects, that the happy hour was drawing nigh, and by means of the stone, which he should soon be master of, he would pay all the debts of the nation, in real gold and silver. The persons picked out for his new operators were as remarkable as the patent itself, being a most 'miscellaneous rabble' of friars, grocers, morcers, and fishmongers!

This patent was likewise granted authoritate partemendi.

Pyrrone, who has given this patent in his Aurum Regiæ, p. 135, concludes with this sarcastic observation:—'A project never so seasonable and necessary as now!' And this we repeat, and our successors will no doubt imitate us!

Alchemists were formerly called multipliers; as appears from a statute of Henry IV repeated in the preceding record. The statute being extremely short, I give it for the reader's satisfaction.

'None from henceforth shall use to multiply gold or silver, or use the craft of multiplication: and if any the same do, he shall incur the pain of felony.'

Every philosophical mind must be convinced that alchemy is not an art, which some have fancifully traced to the remotest times; it may be rather regarded, when opposed to such a distance of time, as a modern imposture. Cæsar commanded the treatises of alchemy to be burnt throughout the Roman dominions: Cæsar, who is not less to be admired as a philosopher than as a monarch.

Mr Gibbon has this succinct passage relative to alchemy:—'The ancient books of alchemy, so liberally ascribed to Pythagoras, to Solomon, or to Hermes, were the pious frauds of more recent adepts. The Greeks were inattentive either to the use or the abuse of chemistry. In that immense register, where Piny has deposited the discoveries, the arts, and the errors of mankind, there is not the least mention of the transmutations of metals; and the persecution of Dioclesian is the first authentic event in the history of alchemy. The conquest of Egypt by the Arabs, diffused that vain science over the globe. Congenial to the avarice of the human heart, it was studied in China, as in Europe, with equal eagerness and equal success. The darkness of the middle ages ensured a favourable reception to every tale of wonder; and the revival of learning gave new vigour to hope, and suggested more specious arts to deception. Philosophy, with the aid of experience, has at length banished the study of alchemy; and the present age, however desirous of riches, is content to seek them by the humbler means of commerce and industry.'

Elias Ashmole writes in his diary—'May 13, 1753. My father Bachouse (an astrologer who had adopted him for his son—a common practice with these men) lying sick in Fleet-street, over against Saint Dunstan's church, and not knowing whether he should live or die, about eleven of the clock, told me in syllables the true matter of the philosopher's stone, which he bequeathed to me as a legacy. By this we learn that a miserable wretch knew the art of making gold, yet always lived a beggar; and that Ashmole really imagined he was in possession of the syllables of a secret: he has however built a curious monument to the learned follies of the last age, in his 'Theatrum Chemicum Britannicum.' Though Ashmole is rather a historian of this vain science, than an adept, it may and literary leisure to turn over this quarto volume, in which he has collected the works of several English alchemists, subjoining his commentary. It affords a curious species of Rosicrucian mysteries; and Ashmole relates stories which vie for the miraculous, with the wildest fancies of Arabian invention. Of the philosopher's stone he says he knows enough to hold his tongue, but not enough to speak. This stone has not only the power of transmuting any imperfect earthy matter into its utmost degree of perfection, and can convert the basest metals into gold, silver, &c., but it has still more occult virtues, while the arcana have been entered into, by the choice fathers of hermetic mysteries. The vegetable stone has power over the natures of man, beast, fowls, fishes, and all kinds of trees and plants, to make them flourish and bear fruit any time. The magical stone discovers any person who ever he is concealed; while the angelical stone gives apparitions of angels, and a power of conversing with them. These great mysteries are supported by occasional facts, and illustrated by prints of the most divine and comprehensible designs, which we would hope were intelligible to the initiated. It may be worth showing, however, how liable even the latter were to blunder on the mysterious hieroglyphics. Ashmole, in one of his chemical works, prefixed a frontispiece, which, in several apartments, exhibited Phœbus on a lion, and opposite him a lady, who represented Diana, with the moon on one hand and an arrow in the other, sitting on a cat. Mercury on a tripod, with the scheme of the heavens on one hand, and his caduceus in the other. These were intended to express the materials of the stone, and the season for the process. Upon the altar is the bust of a man, his head covered by an astrological scheme dropped from the clouds; and on the altar are these words, Mercurius philus Anglicus, i. e. the English lover of hermetic philosophy. There is a tree, and a little creature gnawing the root, a pillar adorned with musical and mathematical instruments, and another with military ensigns. This strange composition created great inquiry among the chemical sages. Deep mysteries were conjectured to be veiled by it. Verses were written in the highest strain of the Rosicrucian language. Ashmole confessed he meant nothing more than a kind of pun on his own name, for the tree was the ash, and the creature was a mole. One pillar tells his love of music and free-masonry, and the other his military preference, and astrological studies! He afterwards regretted that no one added a second volume to his work, from which he himself had been hindered, for the honour of the family of Hermes, and 'to show the world what excellent men we had once of our nation, famous for this kind of philosophy, and masters of so transcendental a secret.'

Modern chemistry is not without a hope, not to say a certainty, of verifying the golden visions of the alchemist. Dr Girtanner, of Göttingen, has lately adventured the following prophecy: 'In the nineteenth century the transmutation of metals will be generally known and practised. Every chemist and every artist will make gold: kitchen utensils will be of silver, and even of gold, which will contribute more than anything else to prolong life, poisoning at present by the oxides of copper, lead, and iron, which we daily swallow with our food.' Phil. Mag. Vol. VI. p. 383. This sublime chemist, though he does not venture to predict that universal elixir, which is to prolong life at pleasure, yet approximates to it. A chemical friend writes to me, that 'The metals seem to be composite bodies, which nature is perpetually preparing: and it may be reserved for the future researches of science to trace and perhaps, to imitate, some of these curious operations.'

TITLES OF BOOKS.

If it were inquired of an ingenious writer what page of his work had occasioned him most perplexity, he would often point to the title page. That curiosity which we would excite, is most fastidious to gratify. Yet such is pervergency of man, that a modest simplicity will fail to tempt; we are only to be allured by paint and patches, yet how we complain that we are duped!

Among those who appear to have felt this irksome situation, are most of our periodical writers. The 'Tadler' and 'Spectator' enjoying priority of conception, have adopted titles with characteristic felicity; but perhaps the invasion of the authors begins to fail in the 'Reader,' the 'Lover,' and the 'Theatre!' Succeeding writers were fortunate in their titles, as their works; such are the 'Universal Spectator,' and the 'Lay Monastery.' The whimsical mind of Johnson could not discover an appropriate title, and indeed, in the first 'Idler,' acknowledged his despair. The 'Rambler' was so little understood, at the time of its appearance, that a French Journalist has translated it 'Le Chevalier Errant,' and when it was corrected 'L'Errant,' a foreigner drank Johnson's health one day, innocently addressing him by the appellation of Mr. Rambler! The 'Adventurer' cannot be considered as fortunate title; it is not appropriate to those pleasing fables, for any writer is an adventurer. The 'Lounge,' the 'Mirror,' and even the 'Connoisseur,' if examined separately, present nothing in the titles descriptive of the works. As for the 'World,' it could only have been given by the fashionable egotism of its authors, who considered the world as merely a little circuit round Saint James's Street. When the celebrated father of all reviews, Les Annales des Sciences, was first published, the very title repelled the public. The author was obliged in his succeeding volumes to soften it down, by explaining its general tendency. He there assures the curious, that not only his of learning and taste, but the humblest mechanic may find profitable amusement. An English novel, published with the title of 'The Champion of Virtue,' could find no readers; it was quaint, formal, and sounded like 'The Spirit's Progress.' It afterwards passed through several changes under the happier invitation of 'The Old English Lady.' 'The Concubine,' a poem by Mickle, could find few purchasers, till it assumed the more delicate title 'Sir Martyr.'

As a subject of literary curiosity, some amusement may be gathered from a glance at what has been done in the field, concerning this important portion of every book.

Baillet in his 'Decisions of the Learned,' has made very extensive researches, for the matter was important to Baillet's character.

The Jewish and many original authors were fond of allegorical titles, which always indicate the most puerile part of taste. The titles were usually adapted to their sacred works. It might exercise an able enigmatist to guess their allusions; for we must understand by 'The part of Aaron,' that it is a commentary on several of the prophets. 'The Bones of Joseph' is an introduction to the Talmud. 'The Garden of Nuts,' and 'The Golden Apples,' are theological questions, and 'The Pomegranate with its Flower,' is a treatise of ceremonies, not any more practised. Jortin gives a title, which he says of all allegorical titles he can recollect, is one of the prettiest. A rabbin published a catalogue of rabbinical writings, and called it Labia Dormientium, from Cantic. vii, 9, 'like the best wine of my beloved that goeth down sweetly, causing the lips of those that are asleep to speak.' It has a double meaning, of which he was not aware, for some of his rabbinical brethren talk very much like men in their sleep.

Almost all their works bear such titles as bread—gold—eyes—eyes—&c., in a word, any thing that signifies nothing.

Affected title-pages were not peculiar to the orientals; the Greeks and the Romans have shown a finer taste. They had their Cornucopias or horns of abundance—Limoses or meadows—Pinnakidions or tablets—scarpes or all sorts of fruit; titles not unhappily adapted for the miscellanists. The nine books of Herodotus, and the nine epistles of Æschines, were respectively honoured by the name of a Muse; and three orations of the poet, by those of the Graces.

The modern fanatics have had a most barbarous taste in titles. We could produce numbers from abroad and home. Some works have been called, 'Matches kindled by the divine Fire,'—and one 'The Gun of Penitence; a collection of passages from the fathers,' is called 'The Soup of the Spiritual Apothecary,' we have 'The Salt of Faith,' and 'The Sixpennyworth of Divine Light;' one of these works bears the following elaborate title: 'Some fine Baskets baked in the Oven of Charity, carefully conserved for the Chickens of the Church, the Sparrows of the Spirit, and the sweet Swallows of Salvation.' Sometimes their quaintness has some humour. One Sir Humphrey Lind, a zealous puritan, published a work which a Jesuit answered by another, entitled 'A pair of Spectacles for Sir Humphrey Lind.' The doughty knight retorted, by a 'Case for Sir Humphrey Lind's Spectacles.'

Some of these obscure titles have an entertaining absurdity; as 'The three Daughters of Job,' which is a treatise on the three virtues of patience, fortitude, and pain. 'The Innocent Love, or the holy Knight,' is a description of the arduous of a saint for the Virgin. 'The Sound of the Trumpet,' is a work on the day of judgment; and 'A Fan to drive away Flies,' is a theological treatise on purgatory.

We must not write to the utter neglect of our title; and a fair author should have the literary piety of ever having 'the fear of his title-page before his eyes.' The following are improper titles. Don Matthews, chief huntsman to Philip IV of Spain, entitled his book 'The Origin and Dignity of the Royal House,' but the entire work relates only to hunting. De Chantereus composed several moral essays, which being at a loss how to entitle, he called 'The Education of a Prince.' He would persuade the reader in his preface, that though they were not composed with a view to this subject, they should not, however, be censured for the title, as they partly related to the education of a prince. The world were too sagacious to be duped; and the author in his second edition acknowledges the absurdity, drops 'the magnificent title,' and calls his work 'Moral Essays.' Montaigne's immortal history of his own mind, for such are his 'Essays,' have assumed perhaps too modest a title, and not sufficiently discriminative. Sorlin equivocally entitled a collection of essays, 'The Walks of Richelieu,' because they were composed at that place; 'the Attic Nights' of Aulus Gellius were so called, because they were written in Attica. Mr Tooke in his grammatical 'Divisions of Purley,' must have deceived many.

A rhodomontade title page was a great favourite in the last century. There was a time when the republic of letters was over-built with 'Palaces of Pleasure,' 'Palaces of Honour,' and 'Palaces of Eloquence;' with 'Temples of Memory,' and 'Theatres of Human Life,' and 'Amphitheatres of Providence;' 'Pharos, Gardens, Pictures, Treasures.' The epistles of Guevara dazzled the public eye with their splendid title, for they were called 'Golden Epistles;' and the 'Golden Legend' of Voraigne had been more appropriately entitled leaden.

They were once so fond of novelty, that every book recommended itself by such titles as 'A new Method; new Elements of Geometry; the new Letter Writer, and the new Art of Cookery.' The title which George Gascoigne, who had great merit in his day, has given to his collection, may be considered as a specimen of the titles of his times. They were printed in 1576. He calls his 'A hundred sundrie flowres bounde vp in one small poesie; gathered partly by translation in the fyne and outlandish gardene of Euripides, Ovid, Petrarko, Ariosto, and others; and partly by invention out of our own fruitfull orchards in Englande; yielding sundrie sweet savours of tragically, comically, and morall discourses, both pleasant and profitable to the well-smelling noses of learned readers.'

To excite the curiosity of the pious, some writers employed artifices of a very ludicrous nature. Some made their titles rhyming echoes; as this one of a father who has given his works under the title of Scala Alæ animi; et Jesus ensu novus Orbis, &c. Some have distributed them according to the measure of time, as one Father Nadasi, the greater part of whose works are years, months, weeks, days, and hours. Some have borrowed their titles from the parts of the human body; and others have used quaint expressions, such as, 'Think before you leap—We must all die—Compel them to enter, &c.' Some of our pious authors appear not to have been aware that they were burlesquing religion. One Massieu having written a moral explanation of the solemn anthems sung in Advent, which begin with the letter O, published this work under the punning title of La douce Moelle, et la Saussée friande des os Savoureux de L'Avent.

The Marquis of Caraccioli, a religious writer, not long ago published a book with the ambiguous title of La Jouissance de soi même. Seduced by the epicurean taste page, the sale of the work was continual with the libertines, who, however, found nothing but very tedious essays on religion and morality. In the sixth edition the marquis greatly exults in his successful contrivance; by which means he had punished the vicious curiosity of certain persons, and perhaps had persuaded some, whom otherwise his book might never have reached.

It is not an injudicious observation of Baillet, that if a title be obscure, it raises a prejudice against the author; we are apt to suppose that an ambiguous title is the effect of an intricate or confused mind. He censures the following one: the Ocean Macro-micro-cosmick of one Sachs. To understand this title, a grammarian would send an inquirer to a geographer, and he to a natural philosopher; neither would probably think of recurring to a physician, to inform one that this ambiguous title signifies the connexion which exists between the motion of the waters, with that of the blood. He also censures Leo Allatius for a title which appears to me not inelegantly conceived. This writer has entitled one of his books the Urban Bees; it is an account of those illustrious writers who flourished during the pontificate of one of the Barberinis. To connect the illusion, we must recollect that the bees were the arms of this family, and Urban VIII, the Pope designed.

The false idea which a title conveys is alike prejudicial to the author and the reader. Titles are generally too prodigal of their promises, and their authors are contemned; but the works of modest authors, though they present more than they promise, may fail of attracting notice by their extreme simplicity. In either case, a collector of books is prejudiced; he is induced to collect what merits no attention, or he passes over those valuable works whose titles may not happen to be interesting. It is related of Pinelli, the celebrated collector of books, that the booksellers permitted him to remain hours, and sometimes days, in their shops to examine books before he bought them. He was desirous of not injuring his precious collection by useless acquisitions; but he confessed that he sometimes could not help suffering himself to be dazzled by magnificent titles, nor to be deceived by the simplicity of others, which the modesty of their authors had given to them. After all, it is not improbable, that many authors are really neither so vain, nor so honest, as they appear; and that magnificent, or simple titles, have been given from the difficulty of forming any others.

It is too often with the Titles of Books, as with those painted representations exhibited by the keepers of wild beasts; where, in general, the picture itself is more curious and interesting than the inclosed animal.

LITERARY FOLLIES.

The Greeks composed lypogrammatic works; works in which one letter of the alphabet is omitted. A lypogrammatist is a letter-dropper. In this manner Tryphiodorus wrote his Odyssey: he had not α in his first book, nor β in his second; and so on with the subsequent letters one after another. This Odyssey was an imitation of the lypogrammatic Iliad of Nestor. Among other works of this kind, Athenæus mentions an ode by Pindar, in which he had purposely omitted the letter S; so that this inept ingenuity appears to have been one of those literary fashions which are sometimes encouraged even by those who should first oppose such progresses into the realms of nonsense.

There is in Latin a little prose work of Fulgentius, which the author divides into twenty-three chapters, according to the order of the twenty-three letters of the Latin alphabet. From A to O are still remaining. The first chapter is without A; the second without B; the third without C; and so with the rest. Du Chat, in the Ducatiens, says, there are five novels in prose of Lopes de Vega; the first without A, the second without E, the third without I, &c. Who will attempt to examine them?

The Orientalists are not without this literary folly. A Persian poet read to the celebrated Jami a gazel of his own composition, which Jami did not like; but the writer replied it was notwithstanding a very curious sonnet, for the letter Alif was not to be found in any one of the words! Jami sarcastically replied, 'You can do a better thing yet; take away all the letters from every word you have written.

To these works may be added the Edogis de Calvis, by Hughald the Monk. All the words of this silly work begin with a C. It is printed in Dornavius. Pugna Porcorum, all the words beginning with a P, in the Nuge Venales. Canum cum catis certamen; the words begin with a C: a performance of the same kind in the same work. Gregorio Leti presented a discourse to the Academy of the Humorists at Rome, throughout which he had purposely omitted the letter R, and he entitled it the exiled R. A friend having requested a copy, as a literary curiosity, for so he considered this idle performance, Leti, to show it was not so difficult a matter, replied by a copious answer of seven pages, in which he had observed the same severe ostracism against the letter R! Lord North, one of the finest gentlemen in the court of James I, has written a set of Sonnets, each of which begins with a successive letter of the alphabet. The Earl of Rivers in the reign of Edward IV, translated the Moral Proverbs of Christiana of Pisa, a poem of about two hundred lines, the greatest part of which he contrived to conclude with the letter E; an instance of his lordship's hard application, and the bad taste of an age which, Lord Orford observes, had witicismis and whims to struggle with, as well as ignorance.

It has been well observed of these minute triflers that extreme exactness is the sublime of fools, whose labours may be well called, in the language of Dryden,

'Pangs without birth, and fruitless industry.'

And Martial says,

Turpe est difficile habere nugas,
Et stultus labor est ineptiarum.

'Tis a folly to sweat o'er a difficult trifle,
And for silly devices invention to rife.

I shall not dwell on wits who composed verses in the forms of hearts, wings, altars, and true love-knots; or as Ben Jonson describes their grotesque shapes,

A pair of scissors and a comb in verse.'

Tom Nash, who loved to push the ludicrous to its extreme, in his amusing invective against the classical Gabriel Harvey, tells us that 'he had writ verses in all kinds; in form of a pair of gloves, a pair of spectacles, and a pair of pot-hooks, &c.' They are not less absurd, who expose to public ridicule the name of their mistress by employing it to form their acrostics. I have seen some of the latter, where both sides and cross-ways, the name of the mistress or the patron has been sent down to posterity with eternal torture. The great difficulty where one name is made out four times in the same acrostic, must have been to have found words by which the letters forming the name should be forced to stand in their particular places. It might be incredible that so great a genius as Boccaccio could have lent himself to these literary fashions; yet one of the most gigantic of acrostics may be seen in his works; it is a poem of fifty cantos; of which Guinguenê has preserved a specimen in his Literary History of Italy, vol. iii. p. 54. Putterham, in that very scarce book, 'The Art of Poesie,' p. 75, gives several odd specimens of poems in the forms of lozenges, rhomboids, pillars, &c. Some of them from Oriental poems communicated by a traveller. Putterham is a very lively writer, and has contrived to form a defence for describing and making such trifling devices. He has done more: he has erected two pillars himself to the honour of Queen Elizabeth; every pillar consists of a base of eight syllables, the shaft or middle, of four, and the capital is equal with the base. The only difference between the two pillars, consists in this; in the one 'ye must read upwards,' and in the other the reverse. These pillars, notwithstanding this fortunate device and variation, may be fixed as two columns in the porch of the vast temple of literary folly.

It was at this period when words or verses were tortured into such fantastic forms, that the trees in gardens were twisted and sheared into obelisks and giants, peacocks or flower-pots. In a copy of verses 'To a hair of my mistress's eye-lash,' the merit next to the choice of the subject, must have been the arrangement or the disarrangement of the whole poem into the form of a heart. With a pair of wings many a sonnet fluttered, and a sacred hymn was expressed by the mystical triangle. Acrostics are formed from the initial letters of every verse; but a different conceit regulated chronograms, which were used to describe dates—the numeral letters in whatever part of the word they stood were distinguished from other letters by being written in capitals. In the following chronogram from Horace, by a strange elevation of capitals the chronogrammatist impels even Horace to give the year of our Lord thus.

—seriam sidera vertice,

—feriaM aDera Verdice. MDVI.

The Acrostic and the Chronogram are both ingeniously described in the mock Epic of the Scribleriad. The initial letters of the acrostics are thus alluded to in the literary text:

Firm and compact, in three fair columns wove
O'er the smooth plain, the bold acrostics move;
High o'er the rest, the Towering Leaders rise
With limbs gigantic, and superior size.

But the looser character of the chronogram, and the disorder in which they are found, are ingeniously sung thus:

Not thus the looser chronograms prepare,
Careless their troops, undisciplined to war;
With rank irregular, confused they stand,
The chieftains mingling with the vulgar band.

He afterwards adds others of the illegitimate races of wit:

To join these squadrons, o'er the champion came
A numerous race of no ignoble name;
Riddle, and Rebus, Riddle's dearest son,
And false Conundrum and insidious Pun.
Fustian, who scarcely deigns to tread the ground,
And Rondeau, wheeling in repeated round,
On their fair standards by the wind display'd,
Eggs, ahars, wings, pipes, axes were pourtray'd.

I find in the origin of Bouts-rimés, or 'Rhiming Ends,' Gouget's Bib. fr. xvi, p. 181. One Dulot a foolish poet, whose sonnets were in demand, had a singular custom of preparing the rhymes of these poems to be filled up at his leisure. Having been robbed of his papers, he was remarking most the loss of three hundred sonnets: his friends were astonished that he had written so many which they never heard. 'They were blank sonnets,' he replied; and explained the mystery by describing his Bouts-rimés. The idea appeared ridiculously amusing; and it soon became fashionable to collect the most difficult rhymes, and fill up the lines.

The Charade is of such recent birth, that it has not yet passed its mystical conceits; nor can I discover the origin of this species of logographs: it was not known in France till 1771, in the last edition of the great Dictionnaire de Trevoux, where the term appears as the name of a Indian sect of a military character, and has no connection with our charades.

Anagrams were another whimsical invention; with the help of any name they contrived to make out some enigmatical word, descriptive of the character of the person who bore the name. These anagrams, therefore, were either serious or complimentary. When in fashion, lovers made use of them continually: I have read of one, whose beloved's name was Magdalen, for whom he composed, not only an Epic under that name, but as a proof of his passion, one day he sent her three dozen of anagrams only of her lovely name. Scipio imagined himself fortunate in his adversary Scalliger was perfectly Sacrilege in all his oblique cases of the Latin language; on this principle John Wain was made out, to his own satisfaction,—a name. They were not always correct when a great compliment was required; the poet John Cleveland was strained to make Heliconian dew. This literary trifle has, however, in our own times, been brought to singular perfection; and several, equally ingenious and caustic, will amply occur to the reader.

Verbes of grotesque shapes have sometimes been contrived to convey ingenious thoughts. Pannard, a modern French poet, has tortured his agreeable vein of poetry into such forms. He has made some of his Bacchanalian epics take the figures of bottles and others of glasses. These objects are perfectly drawn by the various meanings of the verses which form the songs. He has also produced an erbo in his verses, which he contrives so to injure their sense. This was practised by the French bards in the age of Marot, and this poetical art is ridiculed by Butler in his Hudibras, Part I, Canto 190. I give an example of these poetical echoes. The following ones are ingenious, lively, and satirical.

Four nous plaire, un plumet
Met
Tout en usage:
Mais on trouve souvent
Vers
Dans son langage.
On y voit des Commis
Mis

Comme des Princes,
Après être venus
Nuds
De leurs Provinces.

I must notice the poetical whim of Cretin, a great poet in his day: he died in 1525. He brought into fashion punning or equivocal rhymes, such as the following which Marot addressed to him, and which, indulging the same rhyming folly as his own, are superior for a glimpse of sense, though very unworthy of their author:

L'homme sotat, et non savant
Comme un Rotisseur, qui lave oye,
La fame d'autrui, nonce avant
Qu'il la cognoisse, ou qu'il la voye, &c.

In the following nonsensical lines of Du Bartas, this poet imagined that he imitated the harmonious notes of the lark;

La gentille alofette, avec son tirelire,
Tirelire à lire, et tireliran dire,
Vers la voute du ciel, puis son vol vers ce lieu,
Vire et desire dire adieu Dieu, adieu Dieu.

The French have an ingenious kind of Nonsense Verses called Amphigourie. This word is composed of a Greek adverb signifying about, and of a substantive signifying a circle. The following is a specimen: it is elegant in the selection of words, and what the French called richly rhymed—in fact it is fine poetry, but it has no meaning whatever! Pope's Stanzas, said to be written by a person of quality, to ridicule the tuneless nonsense of certain Bards, and which Gilbert Wakefield mistook for a serious composition, and wrote two pages of Commentary to prove this song was disjointed, obscure, and absurd, is an excellent specimen of these Amphigouries.

AMPHIGOURIE.

Qu'il est heureux de se défendre
Quand le cœur ne s'est pas rendu!
Mais qu'il est fâcheux de se rendre
Quand le bonheur est suspendu?
Par un discours sans suite et tendre,
Egarez un cœur éperdu;
Souvent par un mal-entendu
L'amant adroit se fait, entendre.

IMITATED.

How happy to defend our heart
When love has never thrown a dart!
But ah! unhappy when it bends,
If pleasure her soft bliss suspends!
Sweet in a wild disordered strain,
A lost and wandering heart to gain!
Oft in mistaken language wooed
The skilful lover's understood.

These verses have such a resemblance to meaning, that Fontenelle having listened to the song imagined he had a glimpse of sense, and requested to have it repeated. 'Don't you perceive,' said Madame Tencin 'that they are Nonsense Verses?' The malicious wit, never without a retort, replied 'They are so much like the fine verses I have heard here, that it is not surprising I should be for once mistaken!'

In the 'Scribleriad' we find a good account of the Cento. A cento primarily signifies a cloak made of patches. In poetry it denotes a work wholly composed of verses, or passages promiscuously taken from other authors, only disposed in a new form or order, so as to compose a new work and a new meaning. Ausonius has laid down the rules to be observed in composing Centos. The pieces may be taken either from the same poet, or from several; and the verses may be either taken entire or divided into two: one half to be connected with another half taken elsewhere; but two verses are never to be taken together. Agreeable to these rules he has made a pleasant nuptial Cento from Virgil.

The Empress Eudoxia wrote the life of Jesus Christ in centos taken from Homer; Proba Falconia from Virgil. Among these grave triflers may be mentioned Alexander Ross, who published 'Virgilius Evangelizans, sive historia Domini et Salvatoris nostri Jesu Christi Virgilianis verbis et versibus descripta.' It was republished in 1769.

A more difficult whim is that of 'Reciprocal Verses,' which give the same words whether read backwards or forwards. The following lines by Sidoneus Apollinaris were once infinitely admired:

'Signa te signa teueri me tangis et angia.'
'Roma tibi subito motibus ibit amor.'

The reader has only to take the pains of reading the lines backwards, and he will find himself just where he was after all his fatigue.

Capitaine Lasphrise, a French self-taught poet, whose work preceded Maiberbe's, boasts of his inventions; among other singularities, one has at least the merit of la difficulté vaincue, and might by ingenious hands be turned to some account. He asserts that this novelty is entirely his own; it consists in the last word of every verse forming the first word of the following verse:

Falloit-il que le ciel me rendit amoureux,
Amoureux, jouissant d'une beauté craintive,
Craintive à recevoir la douceur excessive,
Excessive au plaisir qui rend l'amant heureux?
Heureux si nous avions quelques paisibles lieux
Lieux ou plus sûrement l'ami fidèle arrive,
Arrive sans soupçon de quelque ami attentif,
Attentif à vouloir nous surprendre tous deux.—

Francis Colonna, an Italian Monk, is the author of a singular book entitled 'The Dream of Poliphilus,' in which he relates his amours with a lady of the name of Polia. It was considered improper to prefix his name to the work; but being desirous of marking it by some peculiarity, that he might claim it at any distant day, he contrived that the initial letters of every chapter should be formed of those of his name and of the subjects he treats. This odd invention was not discovered till many years afterwards: when the wits employed themselves in decyphering it, unfortunately it became a source of literary altercation, being susceptible of various readings. The most correct appears thus: Poliam Frater Franciscus Columna peravit. Brother Francis Colonna passionately loved Polia. This gallant monk, like another Petrarch, made the name of his mistress the subject of his amatorial meditation; and as the first called his Laura, his Laurel, this called his Polia, his Polita.

A few years afterwards Marcellus Palingenius Stellatus employed a similar artifice in his Zodiacus Vitæ, The Zodiac of Life; the initial letters of the first twenty-nine verses of the first books of this poem forming his name, which curious particular is not noticed by Warton in his account of this work. The performance is divided into twelve books, but has no reference to astronomy, which we might naturally expect. He distinguished his twelve books by the twelve names of the celestial signs, and probably extended or confined them purposely to that number, to humour his fancy. Warton however observes, 'this strange pedantic title is not totally without a conceit, as the author was born at Stellada or Stellata, a province of Ferrara, and from whence he called himself Marcellus Palingenius Stellatus.' The work itself is a curious satire on the Pope and the Church of Rome. It occasioned Bayle to commit a remarkable literary blunder, which I shall record in its place. Of Italian conceit in those times, of which Petrarch was the father, with his perpetual play on words and on his Laurel, or his mistress Laura, he has himself afforded a remarkable example. Our poet lost his mother, who died in her thirty-eighth year: he has commemorated her death by a sonnet composed of thirty-eight lines. He seems to have conceived that the exactness of the number was equally natural and tender.

Are we not to class among literary follies the strange researches, which writers, even at the present day, have made in Antediluvian times? Forgeries of the grossest nature have been alluded to, or quoted as authorities. A book of Enoch once attracted considerable attention; this curious forgery has been recently translated: the Sabæans pretend they possess a work written by Adam; and this work has been recently appealed to in favour of a visionary theory! Asile gravely observes, that 'with respect to Writings attributed to the Antediluvians, it seems not only decent but rational to say that we know nothing concerning them.' Without alluding to living writers, Dr Parsons, in his erudite 'Remains of Japhet,' tracing the origin of the alphabetical character, supposes that letters were known to Adam! Some too have noticed astronomical libraries in the Ark of Noah! Such historical memoirs are the deliriums of learning, or are founded on forgeries.

Hugh Broughton, a writer of controversy in the reign of James the First, shows us in a tedious discussion on Scripture chronology, that Rahab was a harlot at ten years of age; and enters into many grave discussions concerning the colour of Aaron's Ephod, the language which Eve first spoke, and other classical erudition. The writer is ridiculed in Ben Jonson's Comedies:—he is not without rivals even in the present day. Covarruvias, after others of his school, discovers that when male children are baptised they cry out with an A, being the first vowel of the word Adam, while the female infants prefer the letter E, in allusion to Eve; and we may add that, by the pinch of a negligent nurse, they may probably learn all their vowels. Of the pedantic triflings of commentators, a controversy among the Portuguese on the works of Camoens is not the least. Some of these profound critics who affected great delicacy in the laws of Epic poetry, pretended to be doubtful whether the poet had fixed on the right time for a king's dream; whether, said they, a king should have a prophetic dream on his first going to bed or at the dawn of a following morning? No one seemed to be quite certain; they puzzled each other till the controversy closed in the felicitous manner, and satisfied both the night and the dawn critics. Barreto discovered that an accent on one of the words alluded to in the controversy would answer its purpose, and by making king Manuel's dream to take place at the dawn would restore Camoens to their good opinion, and preserve the dignity of the poet.

Chevreau begins his History of the World in these words: 'Several learned men have examined in what season God created the world, though there could hardly be any season then, since there was no sun, no moon, no stars. But as the world must have been created in one of the four seasons, this question has exercised the talents of the most curious, and opinions are various. Some say it was in the month of Nisan, that is, in the spring; others maintain that it was in the month of Tisri, which began the civil year of the Jews, and that it was on the sixth day of this month, which answers to our September, that Adam and Eve were created, and that it was on a Friday, a little after four o'clock in the afternoon.' This is according to the Rabbinical notion of the eve of the Sabbath.

The Irish antiquaries mention public libraries that we before the flood; and Paul Christian Isker, with profound erudition, has given an exact catalogue of Adam's Messieurs O'Flaherty, O'Connor, and O'Halloran, but most gravely recorded as authentic narrations the wild legendary traditions; and more recently, to make confusion doubly confounded, others have built up what they call theoretical histories on these nursery tales. By what species of black art they contrive to prove that an Irish man is an Indian, and a Peruvian may be a Welshman from certain emigrations which took place many centuries before Christ, and some about two centuries after it! Keating, in his 'History of Ireland,' starts a favourite hero in the giant Partholanus, who was descended from Japhet, and landed on the coast of Munster, 14 May, in the year of the world 1978. This giant succeeded in his enterprise, but a domestic misfortune attended him among his Irish friends:—his wife exposed him to the laughter by her loose behaviour, and provoked him to such a degree that he killed two favourite greyhounds; and the learned historian assures us was the first instance of female infidelity ever known in Ireland!

The learned, not contented with Homer's poetical pre-eminence, make him the most authentic historian and the accurate geographer of antiquity, besides endowing him with all the arts and sciences to be found in our Encyclopædia. Even in surgery a treatise has been written to show by the variety of the wounds of his heroes, that he was a most scientific anatomist; and a military scholar lately told us that from him is derived all the science of the modern adjutant and quarter-master-general; all the knowledge of tactics which we now possess; and that Xenophon, Epaminondas, Philip, and Alexander, owe all their warlike reputation to Homer!

To return to pleasanter follies. Des Fontaines, a journalist, who had wit and malice, inserted the fragments of a letter which the poet Rousseau wrote to the young Racine whilst he was at the Hague. These were his words: 'I enjoy the conversation within these few days of my associates in Parnassus. Mr Piron is an excellent antidote against melancholy; but—&c. Des Fontaines maliciously stopped at this but. In the letter of Rousseau it was, 'but unfortunately he departs soon.' Piron is very sensibly affected at this equivocal but, and resolves to revenge himself by composing one hundred epigrams against the malignant critic. He had written sixty before Des Fontaines died: but of those only two attracted any notice.

Towards the conclusion of the fifteenth century, Antonio Cornetano wrote a hundred different sonnets on St subject; 'the eyes of his mistress' to which possibly Shakespeare may allude, when Jacques describes a lover with his

'Woful ballad,
Made to his mistress' eyebrow.'

Not inferior to this ingenious trifler is Nicholas Franco, well known in Italian literature, who employed himself in writing two hundred and eighteen satiric sonnets, chiefly in the famous Peter Aretin. This lampooner had the honour of being hanged at Rome for his defamatory publications. In the same class are to be placed two other writers. Brebeuf, who wrote one hundred and fifty epigrams against a painted lady. Another wit, desirous of imitating him, and for a literary bravado, continued the same subject, and pointed at this unfortunate fair three hundred more, without once repeating the thoughts of Brebeuf. There is a collection of poems called 'LA FURCE le grand jour de Poitiers.' The FLEA of the carnival of Nîmes. These poems were all written by the learned Raquet upon a FLEA which he found one morning in the poem of the famous Catherine des Roches!

Not long ago, a Mr and Mrs Bolderdik, in Flanders published poems under the singular title of 'White and Red.'—His own poems were called white, from the colour of his hair, and those of his lady red, in allusion to the colour of the rose. The idea must be Flemish!

Gibbon, in his 'Laws of Poetry,' commenting on this of the Duke of Buckingham's 'Essay on Poetry,' very profoundly informs his readers 'That what is here said has not the least regard to the penmanship, that is, to the fairness or badness of the hand-writing, &c., and proceeds throughout a whole page, with a panegyric on a fine hand-writing! Dull men seem to have at times great tastes to originality!

Nature's chief master-piece is writing well :

Litteton, the author of the Latin and English Dictionary, seems to have indulged his favourite propensity to go so far as even to introduce a pun in the grave and laborious work of a Lexicon. A story has been raised vacant for it, and it has been ascribed to the impatient rejection of the lexicographer to his scribe, who, taking offence at the peevishness of his master, put it down in the Dictionary. The article alluded to is, 'CONCURRO, run with others; to run together; to come together; to be lost on one another; to CONCUR, to CONDOG.'

Mr Todd, in his Dictionary, has laboured to show 'the accuracy of this pretended narrative.' Yet a similar error appears to have happened to Ash. Johnson, while composing his Dictionary, sent a note to the Gentleman's Magazine to inquire the etymology of the word curmudgeon. Having obtained the information, he records in his first the obligation to an anonymous letter-writer. 'Curmudgeon, a vicious way of pronouncing cur mechant. An Ashbourne correspondent.' Ash copied the word into his Dictionary in this manner: 'Curmudgeon: from the French cur, unknown; and mechant, a correspondent.' This singular negligence ought to be placed in the class of the literary blunders; but these form a pair of lexicographical anecdotes.

Two singular literary follies have been practised on France. There is a prose version of his 'Paradise Lost,' which was innocently translated from the French version of the Epic! One Green published a specimen of a new version of the 'Paradise Lost' into blank verse! For this purpose he has utterly ruined the harmony of Milton's verses, by what he conceived to be 'bringing that amazing work somewhat nearer the summit of perfection.'

A French author, when his book had been received by the French Academy, had the portrait of Cardinal Richelieu engraved on his title page, encircled by a crown of rays, in each of which was written the name of the celebrated forty academicians.

The self-complacencies of authors, frequently employed by malicious writers, place them in ridiculous attitudes. A sort of a bad dictionary, which he intended for a Cyclopaedia, formed such an opinion of its extensive sale, that he put on the title-page the words 'first edition,' a hint to the glib reader that it would not be the last. Desmarest was so delighted with his 'Cloriss,' an Epic Poem, that he solemnly concludes his preface with a thanksgiving to God, to whom he attributes all his glory! This is like the conceited member of a French Parliament, who was laughed at, after his tedious harangue, muttering most devoutly to himself, 'Non nobis Domine.'

Several works have been produced from some odd coincidence with the name of their authors. Thus De Sanssay has written a folio volume, consisting of panegyrics of persons of eminence, whose christian names were Andrew; because Andrew was his own name. Two Jesuits made a similar collection of illustrious men whose christian names were Theophilus and Philip, being their own. Anthony Sanderus has also composed a treatise of illustrious Anthonies! And we have one Buchanan, who has written the lives of those persons who were so fortunate as to have been his namesakes.

Several forgotten writers have frequently been intruded on the public eye, merely through such trifling coincidences as being members of some particular society, or natives of some particular country. Cordeliers have stood forward to revive the writings of Duns Scotus, because he had been a Cordelier; and a Jesuit compiled a folio on the antiquities of a country, merely from the circumstance that the founder of his order, Ignatius Loyola, had been born there. Several of the classics are violently extolled above others, merely from the accidental circumstance of their editors having collected a vast number of notes, which they resolved to discharge on the public. County histories have been frequently compiled, and provincial writers have received a temporary existence, from the accident of some obscure individual being an inhabitant of some obscure town.

On such literary follies Malebranche has made this refined observation. The critics, standing in some way connected with the author, their self-love inspires them, and abundantly furnishes eulogiums which the author never merited, that they may thus obliquely reflect some praise on themselves. This is made so adroitly, so delicately, and so concealed, that it is not perceived.

The following are strange inventions, originating in the wilful bad taste of the authors. Otto Venius, the master of Rubens, is the designer of La Theatre moral de la Vie Humaine. In this emblematical history of human life, he has taken his subjects from Horace; but certainly his conceptions are not Horatian. He takes every image in a literal sense. If Horace says, 'Misce stultitiam consilii brevem,' behold Venius takes brevis personally, and represents folly as a little short child! of not above three or four years old! In the emblem which answers Horace's 'Rare antecedentem aculeum deseruit pede poma claudo,' we find Punishment with a wooden leg.—And for 'pulvis et umbra sumus,' we have a dark burying vault, with dust sprinkled about the floor, and a shadow walking upright between two ranges of urns. For 'Virtus est vitium fugere et sapientia prima stultitia corruiss,' most flatly he gives seven or eight Vices pursuing Virtue, and Folly just at the heels of Wisdom. I saw in an English Bible printed in Holland, an instance of the same taste: the artist, to illustrate 'Thou seest the mote in thy neighbour's eye, but not the beam in thine own,' has actually placed an immense beam which projects from the eye of the cavalier to the ground!

As a contrast to the too obvious taste of Venius, may be placed Cesare di Ripa, who is the author of an Italian work, translated into most European languages, the Iconologia; the favourite book of the age, and the fertile parent of the most absurd offspring which Taste has known. Ripa is as darkly subtle as Venius is obvious; and as far-fetched in his conceits as the other is literal. Ripa represents Beauty by a naked lady, with her head in a cloud, because the true idea of beauty is hard to be conceived! Flattery, by a lady with a flute in her hand, and a stag at her feet, because stags are said to love music so much, that they suffer themselves to be taken, if you play to them on a flute. Fraud, with two hearts in one hand, and a mask in the other—his collection is too numerous to point out more instances. Ripa also describes how the allegorical figures are to be coloured; Hope is to have a sky-blue robe, because she always looks towards heaven, Enough of these Capriccios!

LITERARY CONTROVERSY.

In the article Milton, in the preceding volume, I had occasion to give some strictures on the asperity of literary controversy: the specimens I brought forward were drawn from his own and Salmasius's writings. If to some the subject has appeared exceptionable, to me, I confess, it seems useful, and I shall therefore add some other particulars; for this topic has many branches. Of the following specimens, the grossness and malignity are extreme yet they were employed by the first scholars in Europe.

Martin Luther was not destitute of genius, of learning, or of eloquence; but his violence disfigured his works with invectives and singularities of abuse. The great reformer of superstition had himself all the vulgar ones of his day; he believed that flies were devils; and that he had had a buffeting with Satan when his left ear felt the prodigious beating. Hear him express himself on the Catholic divines: 'The papists are all asses, and will always remain asses. Put them in whatever sauce you choose boiled, roasted, baked, fried, skinned, beat, hashed, they are always the same asses.'

Gentle and moderate, compared with a salute of his Holiness.—'The Pope was born out of the Devil's posteriors. He is full of devils, lies, blasphemies, and idolatries; he is anti-Christ; the robber of churches; the ravisher of virgins; the greatest of pimps; the governor of Sodom, &c. If the Turks lay hold of us, then we shall be in the hands of the Devil; but if we remain with the Pope, we shall be in hell.—What a pleasing sight would it be to see the Pope and the Cardinals hanging on one gallows, in exact order, like the seals which dangle from the bulls of the Pope! What an excellent council would they hold under the gallows!'

Sometimes desirous of catching the attention of the vulgar, Luther attempts to enliven his style by the grossest buffooneries: 'Take care, my little Pope! my little ass! go on slowly: the times are slippery: this year is dangerous: if thou faltest, they will exclaim, See! how our little Pope is spoilt.' It was fortunate for the cause of the Reformation that the violence of Luther was softened in a considerable degree at times by the meek Melancthon: he often poured honey on the sting inflicted by the angry bee. Luther was no respecter of kings; he was so fortunate, indeed, as to find among his antagonists a crowned head; a great good fortune for an obscure controversialist, and the very punctum saliens of controversy. Our Henry VIII wrote his book against the new doctrine: then warm from scholastic studies, Henry presented Leo X with a work highly creditable to his abilities, and no inferior performance according to the genius of the age. Collier, in his Ecclesiastical History, has analysed the book, and does not ill describe its spirit: 'Henry seems superior to his adversary in the vigour and propriety of his style, in the force of his reasoning, and the learning of his citations. It is true he leans too much upon his character, argues in his garb-robes, and writes as it were with his acutere.' But Luther in reply abandons his pen to all kinds of railing and abuse. He addresses Henry VIII in the following style: 'It is hard to say if folly can be more foolish, or stupidity more stupid, than is the head of Henry. He has not attacked me with the heart of a king, but with the impudence of a knave. This rotten worm of the earth having blasphemed the majesty of my king, I have a just right to bespatter his English majesty with his own dirt and ordure. This Henry has lied.' Some of his original expressions to our Henry VIII are these: 'Stulta, ridicula, et verissime Henriciani, et Thomastici sunt hæc—Regem Angliæ Henricum istum plane mentiri, &c.—Hoc agit inquietus Satan, ut nos a Scripturis avocet per sceleratos Henricos, &c.'—He was repaid with capital and interest by an anonymous reply, said to have been written by Sir Thomas More, who concludes his arguments by leaving Luther in language not necessary to translate; 'cum suis furis et furiboribus, cum suis merdis et stercoribus cacantem cacaturumque.' Such were the vigorous elegancies of a controversy on the Seven Sacraments! Long after, the court of Rome had not lost the taste of these 'bitter herbs'; for in the bull of the canonization of Ignatius Loyola in August, 1623, Luther is called monstrum terribilissimum, et detestabilissimum.

Calvin was less tolerable, for he had no Melancthon! His adversaries are never others than knaves, lunatics, drunkards, and assassins! Sometimes they are characterized by the familiar appellatives of bulls, asses, cats and hogs! By him Catholic and Lutheran are alike hated. Yet, after having given vent to this virulent unbecoming, he frequently boasts of his mildness. When he reads over his writings, he tells us, that he is astonished at his forbearance; but this, he adds, is the duty of every Christian! at the same time, he generally finishes a period with—'Do you hear, you dog? Do you hear, madman?'

Beza, the disciple of Calvin, sometimes imitates the bitterest abuse of his master. When he writes against Tilleman, a Lutheran minister, he bestows on him the following titles of honour: 'Polyphemus; an ape; a grass who is distinguished from other asses by wearing a hat; an ass on two feet; a monster composed of part of an ape and wild ass; a villain who merits hanging on the first tree we find.' And Beza was, no doubt, desirous of the office of executioner!

The Catholic party is by no means inferior in the felicities of their style. The Jesuit Raynaud calls Erasmus 'the Batavian buffoon,' and accuses him of nourishing the egg which Luther hatched. These men were all supposed by their friends to be the inspired regulators of Religion!

Bishop Bedell, a great and good man, respected even by his adversaries, in an address to his clergy, observed 'Our calling is to deal with errors, not to disgrace the man with scolding words. It is said of Alexander, I think when he overheard one of his soldiers railing lustily against Darius his enemy, that he reproved him, and added "Friend, I entertain thee to fight against Darius, not to revile him;"' and my sentiments of treating the Catholics concludes Bedell, 'are not conformable to the practice of Luther and Calvin: but they were but men, and perhaps we must confess they suffered themselves to yield to the violence of passion.'

The Fathers of the church were proficients in the art of abuse, and very ingeniously defended it. St Austin affirms that the keenest personality may produce a wonderful effect, in opening a man's eyes to his own follies. He illustrates his position with a story, given with great simplicity, of his mother Saint Monica with her maid Saint Monica certainly would have been a confirmed drunkard, had not her maid timely and outrageously abused her. The story will amuse.—'My mother had a little and little accustomed herself to relish wine. She used to send her to the cellar, as being one of the soberest in the family: she first sipped from the jug and tasted a few drops, for she abhorred wine, and did not care to drink. However, she gradually accustomed herself, as from sipping it on her lips she swallowed a draught. A people from the smallest faults insensibly increase, she at length liked wine, and drank bumpers. But one day being alone with her maid who usually attended her to the cellar, they quarrelled, and the maid bitterly reproached her with being a drunkard! That single word struck her so poignantly that it opened her understanding; and reflecting on the deformity of the vice, she desisted for ever from its use.'

To jeer and play droll, or, in his own words, de boni facer, was a mode of controversy the great Arnould defended as permitted by the writings of the holy fathers. It is still more singular, when he not only brings forward as an example of this ribaldry, Elijah mocking at the false divinities, but God himself battering the first man after his fall. He justifies the injurious epithets which he has so liberally bestowed on his adversaries by the example of Jesus Christ and the apostles! It was on these grounds also that the celebrated Pascal apologized for the invectives with which he has occasionally disfigured his Provincial Letters. A Jesuit, famous for twenty folios which contain his works, has collected 'An Alphabetical Catalogue of the Names of Beasts by which the Fathers have characterized the Heretics.' It may be found in Erasmum de malis ac bonis Libris, p. 93, 4to, 1655, of Father Raynaud. This list of brutes and insects, among which is a vast variety of serpents, is accompanied by the names of the heretics designated!

Ware in his Irish Writers, informs us of one Henry Fitzgermon, an Irish Jesuit, who was imprisoned for his papistical designs and seditious preaching. During his confinement he proved himself to be a great amateur of controversy. He said 'he felt like a bear tied to a stake and wanted somebody to bait him.' A kind office, really undertaken by the learned Usher then a young man. He engaged to dispute with him once a week on the subject of antichrist! They met several times. It appears that our bear was out-worried, and declined any further dog baiting. 'This spread an universal joy through the Protestants in Dublin. Such was the spirit of those times, which appears to have been very different from our own. Dr Disney gives an anecdote of a modern bishop who was just advanced to a mitre; his bookseller begged to republish a popular theological tract of his against another bishop, because he might now meet him on equal terms. My lord answered—'Mr * * * no more controversy now!'

his good bishop resembled Baldwin, who, from a simple monk, arrived to the honour of the see of Canterbury. The successive honours successively changed his manners. When the Second inscribed his brief to him in this concise inscription—Baldwino Monastico ferventissimo, Abbate solido, Episcopo tepido, Archiepiscopo remisso!

On the subject of literary controversies we cannot pass over the various sects of the scholastics; a volume might easily be compiled of their ferocious wars, which in more than one instance were accompanied by stones and daggers. The most memorable, on account of the extent, the balance, and duration of their contests, are those of the Nominalists and the Realists.

It was a most subtle question assuredly, and the world fought for a long while that their happiness depended on deciding, whether universals, that is genera, have a real existence, and exist independent of particulars, that is species;—whether, for instance, we could form an idea of time, prior to individual asses? Roseline, in the eleventh century, adopted the opinion that universals have no real existence, either before or in individuals, but are mere names and words by which the kind of individuals, is expressed. A tenet propagated by Abelard, which produced the sect of the Nominalists. But the Realists asserted that universals existed independent of individuals,—though they were somewhat divided between the various opinions of Plato and Aristotle. Of the Realists the most famous were Thomas Aquinas and Duns Scotus. The cause of the Nominalists was almost desperate, till Occam in the thirteenth century revived the dying embers. Louis XI planted the Nominalists, and the Nominalists flourished large in France and Germany; but unfortunately Pope Sixtus the XXIII patronized the Realists, and throughout Italy was dangerous for a Nominalist to open his lips. The French king wavered, and the Pope triumphed; his majesty published an edict in 1474, in which he silenced for ever the Nominalists, and ordered their books to be fastened up in their libraries with iron chains, that they might not be read by young students! The leaders of that sect fled into England and Germany, where they united their forces with Luther and the first Reformers.

Nothing could exceed the violence with which these disputes were conducted. Vives himself, who witnessed the contests, says that 'when the contending parties had exhausted their stock of verbal abuse, they often came to blows; and it was not uncommon in these quarrels about universals, to see the combatants engaging not only with their fists, but with clubs and swords, so that many have been wounded and some killed.'

I add a curious extract from John of Salisbury, on the war of words, which Mosheim has given in his Ecclesiastical History. He observes on all this terrifying business, 'that there had been more time consumed in it, than the Cæsars had employed in making themselves masters of the world; that the riches of Cræsus were inferior to the treasures that had been exhausted in this controversy; and that the contending parties, after having spent their whole lives on this single point, had neither been so happy as to determine it to their satisfaction, nor to make any labyrinth of science where they had been groping, nor discovery that was worth the pains they had taken.' May be added that Ramus having attacked Aristotle, 'teaching us chimeras,' all his scholars revolted; the movement put a stop to his lectures, and at length having brought the matter into a law-court, he was declared to be 'insolent and daring'—the king proscribed his works, he was ridiculed on the stage, and hissed at by his scholars. When at length, during the plague, he opened again his schools, he drew on himself a fresh storm by reforming the pronunciation of the letter Q, which they then pronounced like K—Kissis for Quisque, and Kamkam for Campanum. This innovation was once more laid to his charge: a new rebellion! and a new ejection of the Antiquarian! The brother of that Gabriel Harvey who was the friend of Spenser, and with Gabriel had been the patron of the town-wits of his time, distinguished himself by his wrath against the Stagyrte. After having predicted an earthquake, and alarmed the people, which never took place, (that is the earthquake, the alarm) the wits buffeted him. Nash says of him 'Tartos at the theatre made jests of him, and Elder examined his ale-crammed nose to nothing, in bearing him with whole bundles of ballads.' Marlowe declared him to be 'an ass fit only to preach of the iron age,' and to madness by this lively nests of horns, he avenged himself in a very cowardly manner—he attacked Aristotle himself! for he set Aristotle with his heads upwards on the school gates at Cambridge, and with asses ears on his head!

But this controversy concerning Aristotle and the school divinity was even prolonged so late as in the last century. Father de Benedictis, a Jesuit, and professor in the college at Naples, published in 1668 four volumes of peripatetic philosophy, to establish the principles of Aristotle. The work was exploded, and he wrote an abusive treatise under the Nom de guerre of Benedetto Aletino. A man of letters, Constantino Grimaldi, replied. Aletino rejoined; he wrote letters, an apology for the letters, and would have written more for Aristotle than Aristotle himself perhaps would have done. However, Grimaldi was no ordinary antagonist, and not to be outwared. He had not only the best of the argument but he was resolved to tell the world so, as long as the world would listen. Whether he killed off Father Benedictis is not affirmed; but the latter died during the controversy. Grimaldi however afterwards pursued his ghost, and buffeted the father in his grave. This enraged the University of Naples; and the Jesuits, to a man, denounced Grimaldi to Pope Benedict XIII and Cardinal D'Athanas, the Viceroy of Naples. On this the Pope issued a bull prohibiting the reading of Grimaldi's works, or keeping them, under pain of excommunication; and the cardinal, more active than the bull, caused all the copies which were found in the author's house to be thrown into the sea! The author with tears in his eyes beheld them expatriated, and hardly hoped their voyage would have been successful. However, all the little family of the Grimaldis were not drowned—for a storm arose, and happily drove ashore many of the floating copies, and these falling into good and charitable hands, the heretical opinions of poor Grimaldi against Aristotle and school divinity were still read by those who were not out-terrified by the Pope's bulls. The salted passages were still at hand, and quoted with a double zest against the Jesuits!

We now turn to writers whose controversy was kindled only by subjects of polite literature. The particulars form a curious picture of the taste and character of the age.

'There is,' says Joseph Scaliger, that great critic and reviler, 'an art of abuse or slandering, of which those that are ignorant may be said to defame others much less than they show a willingness to defame.'

'Literary wars,' says Bayle, 'are sometimes as lasting as they are terrible.' A disputation between two great scholars was so interminably violent, that it lasted thirty years! He humourously compares its duration to the German war which lasted as long.

Baillet, when he refuted the sentiments of a certain author, always did it without naming him; but when he found any observation which he deemed commendable, he quoted his name. Bayle observes, that 'this is an excess of politeness, prejudicial to that freedom which should ever exist in the republic of letters; that it should be allowed always to name those whom we refute; and that it is sufficient for this purpose that we banish asperity, malice, and indecency.'

After these preliminary observations, I shall bring forward various examples where this excellent advice is by no means regarded.

Erasmus produced a dialogue, in which he ridiculed those scholars who were servile imitators of Cicero; so servile that they would employ no expression but what was found in the works of that writer; every thing with them was Ciceronianized. This dialogue is written with great humour. Julius Cæsar Scaliger, the father, who was then unknown to the world, had been long looking for some occasion to distinguish himself: he now wrote a defence of Cicero, but which in fact was one continued invective against Erasmus: he there treats the latter as illiterate, a drunkard, an imposter, an apostate, a hangman, a demon hot from hell! The same Scaliger, acting on the same principle of distinguishing himself at the cost of others, attacked Cardan's best work De Subtilitate: his criticism did not appear till seven years after the first edition of the work, and then he obstinately stuck to that edition, though Cardan had corrected it in subsequent ones; but this Scaliger chose, that he might have a wider field for his attack. After this, a rumour spread that Cardan had died of vexation from our Julius Cæsar's invincible pen; then Scaliger pretended to feel all the regret possible for a man he had killed, and whom he now praised: however, his regret had as little foundation as his triumph; for Cardan out-lived Scaliger many years, and valued his criticisms too cheaply to have suffered them to have disturbed his quiet. All this does not exceed the inactivity of Poggius, who has thus entitled several literary libels composed against some of his adversaries, Laurentius Valla, Philiphilus, &c., who returned the poisoned chalice to his own lips; declamations of scurrility, obscenity, and calumny, which are noticed in Mr. Shepherd's Life of Poggius.

Scioppius was a worthy successor of the Scaligers; his favourite expression was, that he had trodden down his adversary.

Scioppius was a critic, as skilful as Salmasius or Scaliger, but still more learned in the language of abuse. He was regarded as the Atilla of authors. He boasted that he had occasioned the deaths of Casaubon and Scaliger; and such was the impudence of this cynic, that he attacked with repeated sautes our James the First, who, as Arthur Wilson informs us, condemned his writings to be burnt in London. Detested and dreaded as the public scourge, Scioppius, at the close of his life, was fearful he should find no retreat in which he might be secure.

The great Casaubon employs the dialect of St. Giles's in his furious attacks on the learned Dalechamps, the Latin translator of Athenæus. To this great physician he stood more deeply indebted than he chose to confess; and to conceal the claims of this literary parasite, he called out Vesanius! Insanius! Tiresias! &c. It was the fashion of that day with the redoubtable and ferocious heroes of the literary republic, to overwhelm each other with invective; and to consider their own grandeur to consist in the bulk of their books, and their triumphs in reducing their brother giants into puny dwarfs. In science, Linnaeus had a dread of controversy; conqueror or conquered we cannot escape without disgrace! Mathioli would have been the great man of his day, had he not meddled with such matters. Who is gratified by 'the mad Cornarus,' or 'the flayed Fox?' titles which Fuchsius and Cornarus, two eminent botanists, have bestowed on each other. Some who were too fond of controversy, as they grew wise, have refused to take up the gauntlet.

The heat and acrimony of verbal critics have exceeded description. Their stigmas and anathemas have been long known to bear no proportion against the offences to which they have been directed. 'God confound you,' cried one grammarian to another, 'for your theory of impersonal verbs!' There was a long and terrible controversy formerly, whether the Florentine dialect was to prevail over the others. The academy was put to great trouble, and the Anticruscans were often on the point of annulling this supremacy; una mordace scribura was applied to one of these literary canons; and in a letter of those times the following paragraph appears: 'Pescetti is preparing to give a second answer to Beni, which will not please him; I now believe the prophecy of Cavalier Tedeschi will be verified, and that this controversy, begun with pens, will end with poniards.'

Fabretti, an Italian, wrote furiously against Gronovius, whom he calls Gronovius: he compared him to all those animals whose voice was expressed by the word Gronare, to grun. Gronovius was so malevolent a critic, that he was distinguished by the title of the 'Grammatical Cur.'

When critics venture to attack the person as well as the performance of an author, I recommend the salutary proceedings of Huberus, the writer of an esteemed Universal History. He had been so roughly handled by Perizonius, that he obliged him to make the amende honorable in a court of justice.

Certain authors may be distinguished by the title of Literary Bobadils, or fighting authors. It is said of one of our own celebrated writers, that he drew his sword on a reviewer; and another, when his farce was condemned, offered to fight any one of the audience who hissed. Scudery, brother of the celebrated Mademoiselle Scudery, was a true Parmassian bully. The first publication which brought him into notice was his edition of the works of his friend Theophile. He concludes the preface with those singular expressions:—'I do not hesitate to declare, that amongst all the dead, and all the living, there is no person who has any thing to show that approaches the force of this vigorous genius, but if, amongst the latter, any one were so extravagant as to consider that I detract from his imaginary glory to shew him, that I feel as little as I esteem him, this is to inform him, that my name is

DE SCUDERY.'

A similar rhodomontade is that of Claude Trelon, poetical Soldier, who begins his poems by challenging a critic; assuring them that if any one attempts to combat him, he will only condescend to answer sword in hand. Father Macedo, a Portuguese Jesuit, having writ against Cardinal Norris, on the monastery of St. Austin, was deemed necessary to silence both parties. Macedo, compelled to relinquish the pen, sent his adversary a challenge, and according to the laws of chivalry, appointed place for meeting in the woods of Boulogne. An edict to forbid the duel! Macedo then murmured at his hard fate, which would not suffer him, for the sake of St. Austin, for whom he had a particular regard, to spill his ther his ink nor his blood.

Anti, prefixed to the name of the person attacked, was once a favourite title to books of literary controversy. With a critical review of such books Baillet has filled quarto volume; yet, such was the abundant harvest, that he left considerable gleanings for posterior industry.

Anti-Gronovius was a book published against Gronovius, by Kuster. Perizonius, another pugilist of literature entered into this dispute on the subject of the Æs grave of the ancients, to which Kuster had just adverted at the close of his volume. What was the consequence? Dreadful!—Answers and rejoinders from both, in which they bespattered each other with the foulest abuse. A journalist pleasantly blames this acrimonious controversy. He says, 'To read the pamphlets of a Perizonius, and Kuster on the Æs grave of the ancients, who would renounce all commerce with antiquity? It seems as if Agamemnon and an Achilles were railing at each other. Who can refrain from laughter, when one of these commentators even points his attacks at the very name of his adversary? According to Kuster, the name of Perizonius signifies a certain part of the human body. How is it possible, that with such a name he could be right concerning the Æs grave? But does that of Kuster miss a better thing, since it signifies a beadle; a man who drives dogs out of churches?—What madness is this?'

Cornelle, like our Dryden, felt the acrimony of literary irritation. To the critical strictures of D'Aubignac he acknowledged he paid the greatest attention, for, after a critic's Pratique du Theatre appeared, his tragedies were more artfully conducted. But instead of mentioning a critic with due praise, he preserved an ungrateful silence. This occasioned a quarrel between the poet and the critic, in which the former exhaled his bile in several abusive epigrams, which have, fortunately for his credit, not been preserved in his works.

The lively Voltaire could not resist the charm of abusing his adversaries. We may smile when he calls a big head, a blockhead; a dotard, a dotard; but when he attacks, for a difference of opinion, the morals of another man, our sensibility is alarmed. A higher tribunal than that of criticisms is to decide on the actions of men.

There is a certain disguised malice, which some writers have most unfairly employed in characterizing a contemporary. Burnet called Prior, one Prior. In Bishop Parker's History of his own Times, an innocent reader may start at seeing the celebrated Marvell described as outcast of society; an infamous libeller; and one whose talents were even more despicable than his person. 'such lengths did the hatred of party, united with personal rancour, carry this bishop, who was himself the worst time-servers. He was, however, amply repaid by the keen wit of Marvell in 'The Rehearsal transposed' which may still be read with delight, as an admirable fusion of banter, wit, and satire. Le Clerc, a comical Greek critic, quarrelled with Boileau about a passage in Longinus, and several years afterwards, in reviewing Moreri's Dictionary, gave a short sarcastic notice of the poet's brother; in which he calls him the elder brother of him who has written the book entitled 'Satires of Boileau D'Espreaux'—the works of the modern Hors which were then delighting Europe, he calls, with some impudence, a book entitled Satires!

The works of Homer produced a controversy, both virulent and amongst the wits of France. This literary quarrel is of some note in the annals of literature, and has produced two valuable books: La Motte's 'Reflexions sur la Critique,' and Madame Dacier's 'Des Causes de la Corruption de Gout.' Of the rival works it has been said that La Motte wrote with feminine delicacy, Madame Dacier like an University pedant. 'At length as the author of Querelles Littéraires informs us, 'by arts of Valincour, the friend of art, of artists, and of men, the contest was terminated.' Both parties were payable in number, and to each he made remonstrances, and applied reproaches. La Motte and Madame Dacier, in opposite leaders, were convinced by his arguments, and reciprocal concessions, and concluded a piece. The party was formally ratified at a dinner, given on the occasion by a Madame De Stael, who represented 'Neutrality.' Libations were poured to the memory of old Homer, and the parties were reconciled.

LITERARY BLUNDERS.

When Dante published his 'Inferno,' the simplicity of the age accepted it as a true narrative of his descent into Hell.

When the Utopia of Sir Thomas More was first published, it occasioned a pleasant mistake. This political romance represents a perfect, but visionary republic, in an age supposed to have been newly-discovered in America. As this was the age of discovery, says Granger, 'the learned Budens, and others, took it for a genuine history; and considered it as highly expedient, that missionaries should be sent thither, in order to convert so wise a nation to Christianity.'

It was a long while after publication that many readers were convinced that Gulliver's Travels were fictitious.

But the most singular blunder was produced by the insinuation 'Hermippus Rodivivus' of Dr Campbell a curious allusion on the hermetic philosophy and the universal medicine; but the grave irony is so closely kept up throughout the admirable treatise, that it deceived for a length of time the most learned of that day. His notion of the art of prolonging life, by inhaling the breath of young women, is eagerly credited. A physician who himself had composed a treatise on health, was so influenced by it, that he actually took lodgings at a female boarding-school, and he might never be without a constant supply of the breath of young ladies. The late Mr Thicknesse seriously copied the project. Dr Kippis acknowledges that after reading the work in his youth, the reasonings and the facts of his several days in a kind of fairy land. I have a copy with manuscript notes by a learned physician, who seems to have had no doubts of its veracity. After all, the mention of the work was long doubtful; till Dr Campbell informed a friend it was a mere jeu d'esprit; that it was considered as standing without a rival in the art of treating at large a difficult subject, without discovering to which side his own sentiments leaned; and Dr Campbell had likewise read more uncommon books than most men; he wished to rival Bayle, and at the same time to give to the world much unknown matter. He has happily succeeded, and with this key the whole mystery is unlocked.

Valerius, in his History of the Council of Trent, to give an honour on M. Lansac, ambassador of Charles to that council, bestows on him a collar of the order Saint Esprit; but which order was not instituted till several years afterwards, by Henry III. A similar voluntary blunder is that of Surita, in his Annales de la Corona Aragonesa. This writer represents, in the battles he describes, many persons who were not present; and this only to confer honour on some particular families.

A book was written in praise of Ciampini by Ferdinand de la Motte, who, quoting a French narrative of travels in Italy, took for the name of the author the following words, 'at the end of the title-page, Enrichi de deux Listes; in, 'Enrichi with two Lists'; on this he observes, 'that Mr Enrichi with two lists has not failed to do that which Ciampini which he merited.' The abridgers of Mr's Biographia, ascribe the romance of Amadis to Amadis Obispo; Remembrance, Oblivion. Not being that these two words placed on the title-page of a French version of that book, formed the translator's last motto!

Aquin, the French king's physician, in his Memoir de Preparation de Bark, takes Mantissa, which is the title of the Appendix to the History of Plants by Johnstone, for the name of an author, and who, he says, is so extremely obscure, that he only knows him by name.

And Bofingbroke imagined, that in those famous verses, sung with Exultet alii, &c, Virgil attributed to the glory of having surpassed the Greeks in his composition: according to his idea, those Roman poets whom Virgil preferred to the Grecians, were Sallust, Livy, and Tacitus. But Virgil died before Livy had written his history, or Tacitus was born.

An honest friar, who compiled a church history, has placed in the class of ecclesiastical writers, Guarini, the Italian poet; this arose from a most risible blunder: on the faith of the title of his celebrated amorous pastoral, Il Pastor Fido, 'The Faithful Shepherd,' our good father imagined that the character of a curate, vicar, or bishop, was represented in this work.

A blunder has been recorded of the monks in the dark ages, which was likely enough to happen when their ignorance was so dense. A rector of a parish going to law with his parishioners about paving the church, quoted this authority from St Peter—Paveant illi, non paveam ego which he construed, They are to pave the church, not I. This was allowed to be good law by a judge, himself an ecclesiastic too!

One of the grossest literary blunders of modern times is that of the late Gilbert Wakefield, in his edition of Pope. He there takes the well known 'Song by a Person of Quality,' which is a piece of ridicule on the glittering unfeeling nonsense of certain poets, as a serious composition. In a most copious commentary, he fatigues himself to prove that every line seems unconnected with its brothers, and that the whole reflects disgrace on its author, &c. A circumstance which too evidently shows how necessary the knowledge of modern literary history is to a modern commentator, and that those who are profound in verbal Greek are not the best critics on English writers.

Prosper Marchand has recorded a pleasant mistake of Abbé Bizot, the author of the medallic history of Holland. Having met with a medal, struck when Philip II set forth his invincible Armada, on which was represented the King of Spain, the Emperor, the Pope, Electors, Cardinals, &c, with their eyes covered with a bandage and bearing for inscription this fine verse of Lucretius:

O cæcas hominum mentes! O pectora cæca!

prepossessed with the false prejudice, that a nation persecuted by the pope and his adherents could not represent them without some insult, he did not examine with sufficient care the ends of the bandages which covered the eyes and waved about the heads of the personages represented on this medal; he rashly took them for asses ears, and as such they are engraved!

Mabillon has preserved a curious literary blunder of some pious Spaniards, who applied to the Pope for consecrating a day in honour of Saint Viar. His holiness, in the voluminous catalogue of his saints, was ignorant of this one. The only proof brought forwards for his existence was this inscription:

S. VIAR.

An antiquary, however, hindered one more festival in the Catholic calendar, by convincing them that these letters were only the remains of an inscription erected for an ancient surveyor of the roads; and he read their saintship thus;

PREFECTUS VIARUM.

Maffei, in his comparison between Medals and Inscriptions, detects a literary blunder in Spon, who, meeting with this inscription, takes the letters VI for numerals, which occasions a strange anachronism. They are only contractions of Viro Illustri—VI.

Maxime VI. Consule.

As absurd a blunder was this of Dr Stukeley on the coins of Carausius; finding a battered one with a defaced inscription of

he read it

ORIVNA AVG.

And sagaciously interpreting this to be the wife of Carausius, makes a new personage start up in history: he contrives even to give some theoretical Memoirs of the August Oriana!

In the Valeriana we find, that it was the opinion of Father Sirmond, that St Ursula and her eleven thousand Virgins were all created out of a blunder. In some ancient MSS they found St Ursula et Undecimilla V. M. meaning St Ursula and Undecimilla with the V. and M which followed was an abbreviation for Undecem Millia Martyrum Virginum, made out of Two Virgins the whole Eleven Thousand!

Pope, in a note on Measure for Measure, informs us, that its story was taken from Cinthio's Novels, Dec. 8, Nov. 5. That is, Decade 8, Novel 5. The critical Warburton, in his edition of Shakspeare (as the author of Canons of criticism observes) puts the words in full length thus, December 8, November 5.

Voltaire has given in his Philosophical Dictionary, article Abus des Mots, a literary anecdote of a singular nature; a complete qui pro quo. When the fragments of Petronius made a great noise in the literary world, Meibomius, an erudit of Lubeck, read in a letter from another learned scholar of Bologna, 'We have here an entire Petronius; I saw it with mine own eyes, and with admiration.' Meibomius in post-haste travels to Italy, arrives at Bologna, and immediately inquires for the librarian Capponi. He asks him if it was true that they had at Bologna an entire Petronius. Capponi assures him that it was a thing which had long been public. Can I see this Petronius? Have the kindness to let me examine it. Certainly, replies Capponi. He leads our erudit of Lubeck to the church where reposes the body of Saint Petronius. Meibomius bites his lip, calls for his chaise, and takes his flight.

A French translator, when he came to ——— of Swift, in which it is said that the Duke ——— broke an officer; not being acquainted with this Anglicism, he translated it roué, broke on a wheel!

Cibber's play of 'Love's last Shift' was entitled 'Le Dernier Chemise de l'Amour.' A French writer of Congreve's life has taken his Mourning for a Morning Bride, and translated it L'Espouse du Matin.

Sir John Pringle mentions his having cured a soldier by the use of two quarts of Dog and Duck water daily; a French translator specifies it as an excellent broth made of a duck and a dog! In a recent catalogue compiled by a French writer of Works on Natural History, he has inserted the well-known 'Essay on Irish Bulls' by the Edgeworths. The proof, if it required any, that a Frenchman cannot understand the idiomatic style of Shakspeare appears in a French translator, who prided himself on giving a verbal translation of our great poet, not approving of Le Tournour's paraphrasatical version. He found in the celebrated speech of Northumberland in Henry IV.

Even such a man, so faint, so spiritless,
So dull, so dead in look, so wu-begone—which he renders 'Ainsi, douleur! va-t'en!'

A remarkable literary blunder has been recently committed by the Abbé Gregoire; who affords another striking proof of the errors to which foreigners are liable when they decide on the language and customs of another country. The abbé, in the excess of his philanthropy, to show to what dishonourable offices human nature is degraded, acquaints us that at London he observed a sign-board proclaiming the master as tuer des punaises de sa majesté! Bug-destroyer to his majesty! This is no doubt the honest Mr Tiffin, in the Strand; and the idea which must have occurred to the good abbé was, that his majesty's bugs were hunted by the said destroyer, and taken by hand—and thus human nature was degraded!

A French writer translates the Latin title of a treatise of Philo-Judæus, Omnis bonus liber est, Every good man is a free man, by Tout livre est bon. It was well for him, observes Jortin, that he did not live within the reach of the Inquisition, which might have taken this as a reflection on the Index Expurgatorius.

An English translator turned 'Dieu défend l'adultère,' into 'God defends adultery.' Guthrie, in his translation of Du Halde, has 'the twenty-sixth day of the new moon.' The whole age of the moon is but twenty-eight days. The blunder arose from his mistaking the word neuvième (nine) for nouvelle or neuve (new.)

The facetious Tom Browne committed a strange blunder in his translation of Gelli's Circe. When he came to the word Starne, not aware of its signification, he boldly rendered it stars, probably from the similitude of sound; the succeeding translator more correctly discovered Starne to be red-legged partridges!

In Charles II's reign a new collect was drawn, in which a new epithet was added to the king's title, that gave, says Burnet, great offence, and occasioned great railery. He was styled our most religious king. Whatever the signification of religious might be in the Latin word as importing the sacredness of the king's person, yet in the English language it bore a signification that was no way applicable to the king. And he was asked by his family courtiers, what must the nation think when they heard him prayed for as their most religious king?—Literary blunders of this nature are frequently discovered in the works of good classical scholars, who would make the English servilely bend to the Latin and Greek; however its gain will not bear the yoke their unskilful hands put on its neck. Milton has been justly censured for his free use of Latinisms and Grecisms.

The blunders of modern antiquaries on sepulchral monuments are numerous. One mistakes a lion at a knight's feet for a water curled dog; another could not distinguish censors in the hands of angels from fishing-nets; two any at a lady's feet were counted as her two cherub-like feet and another has mistaken a leopard and a hedge-hog for a cat and a rat! In some of these cases are the antiquaries or the sculptors most to be blamed?

A literary blunder of Thomas Warton is a specimen the manner in which a man of genius may continue blunder with infinite ingenuity. In an old romance finds these lines, describing the duel of Saladin with Richard Cœur de Lion:

A Faucon brode in hande he bare,
For he thought he wolde thare
Have slayne Richard.

He imagines this Faucon brode means a falcon bird, a hawk, and that Saladin is represented with this bird his fist to express his contempt of his adversary. He supports his conjecture by noticing a Gothic picture, supposes to be the subject of this duel, and also some old tapes of heroes on horseback with hawks on their fists; plunges into feudal times where no gentleman appeared horseback without his hawk. After all this curious exertion, the rough but skilful Ritson inhumanly triumphed dissolving the magical fancies of the more elegant Warton by explaining, a Faucon brode to be nothing more than broad fawshion, which was certainly more useful than a bird, in a duel.

Bayle supposes that Marcellus Palingenius, who wrote a poem entitled the Zodiac; the twelve books bearing names of the signs; assumed, from this circumstance, the title of Poeta Stellatus. But it appears, that this was an Italian and a native of Stellada, a town in the F. rarese. It is probable that his birth-place produced the conceit of the title of his poem: it is a curious instance how a critical conjecture may be led astray by its own ingenuity, when ignorant of the real fact.

A LITERARY WIFE.

Marriage is such a rabble rout,
That those that are out would fain get in;
And those that are in would fain get out.

Chaucer

Having examined some literary blunders, we will proceed to the subject of a literary wife, which may be proven to prove one. A learned lady is to the taste of few. It is however matter of surprise, that several literary should have felt such a want of taste in respect to 'thou soul's far dearer part,' as Hector calls his Andromache. The wives of many men of letters have been dissolute, humoured, slatternly, and have run into all the frolics of the age. The wife of the learned Budæus was of a different character.

How delightful is it when the mind of the female is happily disposed, and so richly cultivated, as to participate in the literary avocations of her husband! It is then that the intercourse of the sexes becomes the most refined pleasure. What delight, for instance, must the great Budæus have tasted, even in those works which must be tedious for others a most dreadful labour! His wife left nothing to desire. The frequent companion of his studies she brought him the books he required to his desk; compared passages, and transcribed quotations; the sagacious, the same indications, and the same ardour for literature, eminently appeared in those two fortunate persons. Far from withdrawing her husband from his studies, she was sedulous to animate him when he languished. Ever at his side and ever assiduous; ever with some useful book in her hand, she acknowledged herself to be a most happy woman. Yet she did not neglect the education of eleven children. She and Budæus shared in the mutual caresses they owed their progeny. Budæus was not inconsiderable himself as married to two ladies; one of whom gave him boys and girls, the other was Philosophy, who produced books. He says, that in his twelve first years, Philosophy had been less fruitful than Marriage; he had produced less books than children; he had laboured more corporally than intellectually; but he hoped to make more books than children. 'The soul (says he) will be productive in its turn; it will rise on the ruins of the body; a prolific virtue is not given at the same time to the bodily organs and the pen.'

The lady of Evelyn designed herself the frontispiece to his translation of Lucretius. She felt the same passion in her own breast as animated her husband's, who has written with such various ingenuity. Of Baron Haller it is recorded that he inspired his wife and family with a taste for his different pursuits. They were usually employed in assisting his literary occupations; they transcribed manuscripts, consulted authors, gathered plants and disengaged and coloured under his eye. What a delightful family picture has the younger Pliny given posterity in his letters.—See Melmoth's translation, Book iv, xix. Of Calphurnia, his wife, he says, 'Her affection to me has given her a turn to books; and my compositions, which she takes a pleasure in reading, and even getting by heart, are continually in her hands. How full of tender solicitude is she when I am entering upon any cause! How kindly does she rejoice with me when it is over! While I am pleading, she places persons to inform her from time to time how I am heard, what applauses I receive, and what success attends the cause. When at any time I recite my works, she conceals herself behind some curtain, and with secret rapture enjoys my praises. She sings my verses to her lyre, with no other master but love, the best instructor, for her guide. Her passion will increase with our days, for it is not my youth nor my person, which time gradually impairs, but my reputation and my glory, of which she is enamoured.'

On the subject of a literary wife, I must introduce to the acquaintance of the reader, Margaret duchess of Newcastle. She is known at least by her name, as a voluminous writer! for she extended her literary productions to the number of twelve folio volumes.

Her labours have been ridiculed by some wits; but had her studies been regulated she would have displayed no ordinary genius. The Connoisseur has quoted her poems, and the verses have been imitated by Milton.

The duke, her husband, was also an author; his book on horsemanship still preserves his name. He has likewise written comedies, of which Langbaine, in his account of our poets, speaks well; and his contemporaries have not been penurious in their eulogiums. It is true he was a duke. Shadwell says of him, 'That he was the greatest master of wit, the most exact observer of mankind, and the most accurate judge of humour that ever he knew.' The life of the duke is written (to employ the language of Langbaine) 'by the hand of his incomparable duchess.' It was published in his lifetime. This curious piece of biography is a folio of 197 pages, and is entitled 'The Life of the Thrice Noble, High, and Puissant Prince, William Cavendish.' His titles then follow:—'Written by the Thrice Noble, Illustrious, and excellent Princess, Margaret Duchess of Newcastle, his Wife. London 1667.' This Life is dedicated to Charles the Second; and there is also prefixed a copious epistle to her husband the duke.

In this epistle the character of our Literary Wife is described, with all its peculiarities; and no apology will be required for extracting what relates to our noble authoress. The reader will be amused while he forms a more correct idea of a literary lady, with whose name he must be acquainted.

She writes:—'Certainly, my lord, you have had as many enemies and as many friends as ever any one particular person had; nor do I so much wonder at it, since I, a woman, cannot be exempt from the malice and aspersions of spiteful tongues, which they cast upon my poor writings, some saying me to be the true authoress of them; for your grace remembers well, that those books I put out first to the judgment of this censorious age were accounted not to be written by a woman, but that somebody else had written and published them in my name; by which your lordship was moved to prefix an epistle before one of them in my vindication, wherein you assure the world, upon your honour, that what was written and printed in my name was my own, and I have also made known that your lordship was my only tutor in declaring to me what you had found and observed by your own experience; for I being young when your lordship married me could not have much knowledge of the world; but it pleased God to command his servant Nature to endue me with a poetical and philosophical genius, even from my birth; for I did write some books in that kind before I was twelve years of age, which, for want of good method and order I would never divulge. But though the world would not believe that those conceptions and fancies which I write were my own, but transcended my capacity, yet they found fault, that they were defective for want of learning; and on the other side, they said I had plucked feathers out of the universities, which was a very preposterous judgment. Truly, my lord, I confess that for want of scholarship, I could not express myself so well as otherwise I might have done in those philosophical writings I published first; but after I was returned with your lordship into my native country, and led a retired country life, I applied myself to the reading of philosophical authors, on purpose to learn those names and words of art that are used in schools; which at first were so hard to me, that I could not understand them, but was fain to guess at the sense of them by the whole context, and so writ them down as I found them in those authors; at which my readers did wonder, and thought it impossible that a woman could have so much learning and understanding in terms of art and scholastical expressions; so that I and my books are like the old apologue mentioned in Æsop, of a father and his son who rid on an ass.' Here follows a long narrative of this fable, which she applies to herself in these words:—'The old man seeing he could not please mankind in any manner, and having received so many blemishes and aspersions for the sake of his ass, was at last resolved to drown him when he came to the next bridge. But I am not so passionate to burn my writings for the various humours of mankind, and for their finding fault; since there is nothing in this world, be it the noblest and most commendable action whatsoever, that shall escape blameless. As for my being the true and only authoress of them your lordship knows best; and my attending servants are witnesses that I have had none but my own thoughts, fancies, and speculations, to assist me; and as soon as I set them down I send them to those that are to transcribe them, and fit them for the press; whereof, since there have been several, and amongst them such as only could write a good hand, but neither understood orthography, nor had any learning (I being then in banishment, with your lordship, and not able to maintain learned secretaries) which hath been a great disadvantage to my poor works, and the cause that they have been printed so false and so full of errors; for besides that I want also skill in scholarship and true writing, I did many times not peruse the copies that were transcribed, lest they should disturb my following conceptions; by which neglect, as I said, many errors are slipped into my works, which yet I hope learned and impartial readers will soon rectify, and look more upon the sense than carp on words. I have been a student even from my childhood; and since I have been your lordship's wife I have lived for the most part a strict and retired life, as is best known to your lordship; and therefore my censurers cannot know much of me, since they have little or no acquaintance with me. 'Tis true I have been a traveller both before and after I was married to your lordship, and sometimes show myself at your lordship's command in public places or assemblies, but yet I converse with few. Indeed, my lord, I matter not the censures of this age, but am rather proud of them; for it shows that my actions are more than ordinary, and, according to the old proverb, It is better to be envied than pitied; for I know well that it is merely out of spite and malice, whereof this present age is so full that none can escape them, and they'll make no doubt to stain even your lordship's loyal, noble, and heroic actions, as well as they do mine; though yours have been of war and fighting, mine of contemplating and writing; yours were performed publicly in the field, mine privately in my closet; your's had many thousand eye-witnesses, mine none but my waiting maids. But the great God, that hitherto blessed both your grace and me, will, I question not, preserve both our fames to after-ages.'

Your grace's honest wife,
and humble servant,

M. NEWCASTLE.

The last portion of this life, which consists of the observations and good things which she had gathered from the conversations of her husband, forms an excellent Ans; and shows that when Lord Orford, in his 'Catalogue of Noble

Authors,' says, that 'this stately poetic couple was a picture of foolish nobility,' he writes, as he does too often, with extreme levity. But we must now attend to the reverse of our medal.

Many chagrins may corrode the nuptial state of literary men. Females who, prompted by vanity, but not by taste, unite themselves to scholars, must ever complain of neglect. The inexhaustible occupations of a library will only present to such a most dreary solitude. Such a lady declared of her learned husband, that she was more jealous of his books than his mistresses. It was probable while Glover was composing his 'Leonidas,' that his lady avenged herself for his Homerick inattention to her, and took her flight with a lover. It was peculiar to the learned Dacier to be united to a woman, his equal in erudition and his superior in taste. When she wrote in the album of a German traveller a verse from Sophocles as an apology for her unwillingness to place herself among his learned friends, that 'Silence is the female's ornament,' it was a remarkable trait of her modesty. The learned Pasquier was coupled to a female of a different character, since he tells us in his Epigrams that to manage the vociferations of his lady, he was compelled himself to become a vociferator. — 'Unfortunate wretch that I am, I who am a lover of universal peace! But to have peace I am obliged ever to be at war.'

Sir Thomas More was united to a woman of the harshest temper and the most sordid manners. To soften the moroseness of her disposition, 'he persuaded her to play on the lute, viol, and other instruments, every day.' Whether it was that she had no ear for music, she herself never became harmonious as the instrument she touched. All these ladies may be considered as rather too alert in thought, and too spirited in action; but a tame cuckoo bird who is always repeating the same tone, must be very fatiguing. The lady of Samuel Clarke, the great compiler of books in 1690, whose name was anagrammatised to 'suck all cream,' alluding to his indefatigable labours in sucking all the cream of every other author without having any cream himself, is described by her husband as having the most sublime conceptions of his illustrious compilations. This appears by her behaviour. He says, 'that she never rose from table without making him a courtesy, nor drank to him without bowing, and that his word was a law to her.'

I was much surprised in looking over a correspondence of the times, that in 1590 the Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry writing to the earl of Shrewsbury on the subject of his living separate from his countess, uses as one of his arguments for their union the following curious one, which surely shows the gross and cynical feeling which the fair sex excited even among the higher classes of society. The language of this good bishop is neither that of truth, we hope, nor certainly that of religion.

'But some will say in your Lordship's behalfe that the Countesse is a sharp and bitter shrew, and therefore like enough to shorten your lief, if shee should keepe yow company. Indeede, my good Lord, I have heard some say so; but if shrewdnesse or sharpnesse may be a iuste cause of separation between a man and wief, I thinck fewe men in Englande would keepe their wives longe; for it is a common jeste, yet trewe in some sence, that there is but one shrew in all the worlde, and evere man hath her; and so evere man must be ridd of his wief, that wolde be ridd of a shrew.' It is wonderful this good bishop did not use another argument as cogent, and which would in those times be allowed as something; the name of his lordship Shrewsbury, would have afforded a consolatory pun!

The entertaining Marville says that the generality of ladies married to literary men are so vain of the abilities and merit of their husbands, that they are frequently unsufferable.

The wife of Barclay, author of 'The Argenis,' considered herself as the wife of a demigod. This appeared glaringly after his death: for Cardinal Barberini having erected a monument to the memory of his tutor, next to the tomb of Barclay, Mrs. Barclay was so irritated at this that she demolished his monument, brought home his bust, and declared that the ashes of so great a genius as her husband should never be placed beside so villanous a pedagogue.

Salmasius's wife was a termagant; and Christina said she admired his patience more than his erudition, married to such a shrew. Mrs. Salmasius indeed considered herself as the queen of science, because her husband was acknowledged as sovereign among the critics. She boasted she had for her husband the most learned of all the nobles, and the most noble of all the learned. Our good lady always joined the learned conferences which he held in his study. She spoke loud, and decided with a tone of majesty. Salmasius was mild in conversation, but the reverse in his writings, for our proud Xantippe considered him as acting beneath himself if he did not majestically call every one names!

The wife of Robault, when her husband gave lectures on the philosophy of Descartes, used to seat herself on these days at the door, and refused admittance to every one shabbily dressed, or who did not discover a genteel air. So convinced was she that, to be worthy of hearing the lectures of her husband, it was proper to appear fashionable. In vain our good lecturer exhausted himself in telling her that fortune does not always give fine clothes to philosophers.

The ladies of Albert Durer and Berghem were both shrews. The wife of Durer compelled that great genius to do the hourly drudgery of his profession, merely to gratify her own sordid passion: in despair, Albert ran away from his Tisiphone; she wheedled him back, and not long afterwards this great artist fell a victim to her furious disposition. Berghem's wife would never allow that excellent artist to quit his occupations: and she contrived an odd expedient to detect his indolence. The artist worked in a room above her; ever and anon she roused him by thumping a long stick against the ceiling, while the obedient Berghem answered by stamping his foot, to satisfy Mrs. Berghem that he was not napping.

Ælian had an aversion to the marriage state. Sigonius, a learned and well known scholar, would never marry, and alleged no inelegant reason; that 'Minerva and Venus could not live together.'

Matrimony has been considered by some writers as a condition not so well suited to the circumstances of philosophers and men of learning. There is a little tract which professes to investigate the subject. It has for title, De Matrimonio Literati, an coelibem esse, an vero nubere conveniat, i. e. of the Marriage of a Man of Letters, with an inquiry whether it is most proper for him to continue a Bachelor, or to marry.

'The author alleges the great merit of some women; particularly that of Gonzaga the consort of Montefeltro, duke of Urbino; a lady of such distinguished accomplishments, that Peter Bembus said, none but a stupid man would not prefer one of her conversations to all the formal meetings and disputations of the philosophers.'

'The ladies perhaps will be surprised to find that it is a question among the learned, Whether they ought to marry? and will think it an unaccountable property of learning that it should lay the professors of it under an obligation to disregard the sex. But whatever opinion these gentlemen may have of that amiable part of the species, it is very questionable whether, in return for this want of complaisance in them, the generality of ladies would not prefer the beau and the man of fashion to the man of sense and learning. However, if the latter be considered as valuable in the eyes of any of them, let there be Gonzagas, and I dare pronounce that this question will be soon determined in their favour, and they will find converts enough to their charms.'

The sentiments of Sir Thomas Browne, on the consequences of marriage, are very curious, in the second part of his Religio Medici, Sect. 9. When he wrote that work, he said 'I was never yet once, and commend their resolutions, who never marry twice.' He calls woman 'the rib, and crooked piece of man.' He adds, 'I could be content that we might procreate like trees, without conjunction, or that there were any way to procreate the world without this trivial and vulgar way.' He means the union of sexes, which he declares 'is the foolishlest act a wise man commits in all his life, nor is there any thing that will more deject his cooled imagination, when he shall consider what an odd and unworthy piece of folly he hath committed. He afterwards declares he is not averse to that sweet sex, but naturally amorous of all that is beautiful; 'I could look a whole day with delight upon a handsome picture, though it be but of a horse.' He afterwards disserts very profoundly on the music there is in beauty, 'and the silent note which Cupid strikes is far sweeter than the sound of an instrument.' Such were his sentiments when youthful, and residing at Leyden; Dutch philosophy had at first chilled his passion; it is probable that passion afterwards advised his philosophy—for he married and had four daughters!

Dr Cocchi, a modern Italian writer, but apparently a cynic as old as Diogenes, has taken the pains of composing a treatise on the present subject—enough to terrify the boldest Bachelor of Arts! he has conjured up every chimera against the marriage of a literary man. He seems however to have drawn his disgusting portrait from his own country; and the chaste beauty of Britain only looks the more lovely beside this Florentine wife.

I shall not retain the cynicism which has coloured such revolting features. When at length the doctor finds a woman as all women ought to be, he opens a new spring of misfortunes which must attend her husband. He dreads one of the probable consequences of matrimony,—progeny, in which we must maintain the children we beget! He thinks the father gains nothing in his old age from the tender offices administered by his own children: he asserts these are much better performed by menials and strangers! The more children he has, the less he can afford to have servants! The maintenance of his children will greatly diminish his property! Another alarming object in marriage is that, by affinity, you become connected with the relatives of the wife. The envious and ill-bred imitations of the mother, the family quarrels, their poverty or their pride, all disturb the unhappy sage, who falls into the trap of connubial felicity! But if a sage has resolved to marry, he impresses on him the prudential principle of increasing his fortune by it, and to remember his 'additional expenses!' Dr Cocchi seems to have thought that a human being is only to live for himself; he had neither a heart to feel, a head to conceive, nor a pen that could have written one harmonious period, or one beautiful image! Bayle, in his article Raphetengius, note B, gives a singular specimen of logical subtilty, in a reflection on the consequences of marriage. This learned man was imagined to have died of grief for having lost his wife, and passed three years in protracted despair. What therefore must we think of an unhappy marriage, since a happy one is exposed to such evils? He then shows that an unhappy marriage is attended by beneficial consequences to the survivor. In this dilemma, in the one case, the husband lives afraid his wife will die, in the other that she will not! If you love her, you will always be afraid of losing her; if you do not love her, you will always be afraid of not losing her. Our satirical Célestaire is gored by the horns of the dilemma he has conjured up.

James Petiver, a famous botanist, then a bachelor, the friend of Sir Hans Sloane, in an album which I have seen, signs his name, with this designation:

'From the Goat tavern in the Strand, London, Nov. 27. In the 34th year of my freedom. A. D. 1697.'

DEDICATIONS.

Some authors excelled in this species of literary artifice. The Italian Doni dedicated each of his letters, in a book called Le Librerie, to persons whose names began with the first letter of the epistle; and dedicated the whole collection in another epistle; so that the book, which only consisted of forty-five pages, was dedicated to above twenty persons. This is carrying literary mendacity pretty high. Politi, the editor of the Martyrologium Romanum, published at Rome in 1761, has improved on the idea of Doni; for to the 365 days of the year of this Martyrology he has prefixed to each an epistle dedicatory. It is fortunate to have a large circle of acquaintance, though not worthy of being saints. Galland, the translator of the Arabian Nights, prefixed a dedication to each tale which he gave; he had finished the 'one thousand and one,' he would have surpassed even the Martyrologist.

Mademoiselle Scudery tells a remarkable expedient of an ingenious trader in this line—One Rangouze made a collection of Letters, which he printed without numbering them. By this means the book-binder put that letter which the author ordered him first; so that all the persons to whom he presented this book, seeing their names at the head, considered themselves under a particular obligation. There was likewise an Italian physician, who having wrote on Hippocrates's Aphorisms, dedicated each book of his Commentaries to one of his friends, and the index to another!

More than one of our own authors have dedications in the same spirit. It was an expedient to procure dedicatory fees; for publishing books by subscription was an art then undiscovered. One prefixed a different dedication to a certain number of printed copies, and addressed them to every great man he knew, who he thought relished a morsel of flattery, and would pay handsomely for a coarse luxury. Sir Balthazar Gerbier, in this 'Counsel to Builders,' has made up half the work with forty-two Dedications, which he excuses by the example of Antonio Perez; yet in these dedications he scatters a heap of curious things, for he was a very universal genius. Perce, once secretary of state to Philip II of Spain, dedicates his 'Obras,' first to 'Nuestro santissimo Padre,' and 'Al Sacro Collegio,' then follows one to 'Henry IV,' and then one still more embracing, 'A Todos.' Fuller, in his 'Church History,' has with admirable contrivance introduced twelve title-pages, besides the general one, and as many particular dedications, and no less than fifty or sixty of those by inscriptions and which are addressed to his benefactors; a circumstance which Heylin in his severity did not overlook: for 'making his work bigger by forty sheets at the least; and he was so ambitious of the number of his patrons that having but four leaves at the end of his History, he discovers a particular benefactor to inscribe them to!' This unlucky lady, the patroness of four leaves, Heylin compares to Roscius Regulus, who accepted the consular dignity for that part of the day on which Cicerina by a decree of the senate was degraded from it, which occasioned Regulus to be ridiculed by the people all his life after, as the consul of half a day.

The price for the dedication of a play was at length fixed, from five to ten guineas from the Revolution to the time of George I, when it rose to twenty, but sometimes a bargain was to be struck when the author and the play were alike indifferent. Sometimes the party haggled about the price, or the statue while stepping into his niche could turn round on the author to assist his invention. A patron of Peter Motteux dissatisfied with Peter's colder temperament, actually composed the superlative dedication to himself, and completed the misery of the apparent author by subscribing it with his name. This circumstance was so notorious at the time, that it occasioned a satirical dialogue between Motteux and his patron Heveningham. The patron, in his zeal to omit no possible distinction that might attach to him, had given one circumstance which no one but himself could have known.

PATRON.

I must confess I was to blame;
That one particular to name;
The rest could never have been known,
I made the style so like thy own.

POET.

I beg your pardon sir for that

PATRON.

Why d—e what would you be at?
I writ below myself you sot!
Avoiding figures, tropes, what not,
For fear I should my fancy raise
Above the level of thy plays!

Warton notices the common practice, about the reign of Elizabeth, of our authors dedicating a work at once to a number of the nobility. Chapman's Translation of Homer has sixteen sonnets addressed to lords and ladies. Henry Lock, in a collection of two hundred religious sonnets, mingles with such heavenly works the terrestrial composition of a number of sonnets to his noble patrons, and not to multiply more instances, our great poet Spenser, in compliance with this disgraceful custom, or rather in obedience to the established tyranny of patronage, has prefixed to the Fairy Queen fifteen of these adulatory pieces, which, in every respect, are the meanest of his compositions. At this period all men, as well as writers, looked up to peers, as on beings on whose smiles or frowns all sublimity good and evil depended. At a much later period, Elkanah Settle sent copies round to the chief party, for he wrote for both parties, accompanied by addresses, to extort pecuniary presents in return. He had latterly one standard Elegy, and one Epithalamium, printed off with blanks, which by ingeniously filling up with the printed names of any great person who died or was married, no one who was going out of life or was entering into it, could pass scot free.

One of the most singular anecdotes respecting Dedications in English bibliography, is that of the Polyglot bible of Dr Castell. Cromwell, much to his honour, patronised that great labour, and allowed the paper to be imported free of all duties, both of excise and custom. It was pub-haled under the protectorate, but many copies had not been disposed of ere Charles II ascended the throne. Dr Castell had dedicated the work gratefully to Oliver, by mentioning him with peculiar respect in the preface, but he wavered with Richard Cromwell. At the restoration, he cancelled the two last leaves, and supplied their places with three others, which softened down the republican strains, and blotted Oliver's name out of the book of life! The differences in what are now called the republican and the loyal copies have amused the curious collectors; and the former being very scarce are most sought after. I have seen the republican. In the loyal copies the patrons of the work are mentioned, but their titles are essentially changed; Serenissimus, Illustrissimus, and Honoratissimus, were epithets that dared not show themselves under the levelling influence of the great fanatic republican.

It is a curious literary folly, not of an individual, but of the Spanish nation, who, when the laws of Castile were reduced into a code under the reign of Alfonso X, surnamed the Wise, divided the work into seven volumes; that they might be dedicated to the seven letters which formed the name of his majesty!

Never was a gigantic baby of adulation so crammed with the soft pap of Dedications as Cardinal Richelieu. French flattery even exceeded itself.—Among the vast number of very extraordinary dedications to this man, in which the divinity itself is disrobed of its attributes to bestow them on this miserable creature of vanity, I suspect that even the following one is not the most blasphemous he received. 'Who has seen your face without being seized by those softened terrors which made the prophets shudder when God showed the beams of his glory? But as he whom they dared not to approach in the burning bush, and in the noise of thunders, appeared to them sometimes in the freshness of the zephyrs, so the softness of your august countenance dissipates at the same time, and changes into dew, the small vapours which cover its majesty.' One of these herd of dedicators, after the death of Richelieu, suppressed in a second edition his hyperbolic panegyric, and as a punishment he inflicted on himself, dedicated the work to Jesus Christ!

The same taste characterises our own dedications in the reigns of Charles II and James II. The great Dryden has carried it to an excessive height; and nothing is more usual than to compare the patron with the Divinity—and at times a fair inference may be drawn that the former was more in the author's mind than God himself! A Welsh bishop made an apology to James I, for preferring the Deity—to his Majesty! Burke has admirably observed on Dryden's extravagant dedications, that they were the vices of the time more than of the man; they were loaded with flattery, and no disgrace was annexed to such an exercise of men's talents; the contest being who should go farthest in the most graceful way, and with the best turns of expression.

An ingenious dedication was contrived by Sir Simon Degge, who dedicated 'the Parson's Counsellor' to Woods, Bishop of Lichfield, with this intention. Degge highly complimented the Bishop on having most nobly restored the church, which had been demolished in the civil wars, and was rebuilt but left unfinished by Bishop Hacker. At the time he wrote the dedication, Woods had not turned a single stone, and it is said, that much against his will he did something from having been so publicly reminded of it by this ironical dedication.

PHILOSOPHICAL DESCRIPTIVE POEMS.

The botanic garden once appeared to open a new route through the trodden groves of Parnassus. The poet, with a prodigality of imagination, united all the minute accuracy of Science. It is a highly repolished labour, and was in the mind and in the hand of its author for twenty years before its first publication. The excessive polish of the verse has appeared too high to be endured throughout a long composition; it is certain that, in poems of length, a verification, which is not too florid for lyrical composition, will weary by its brilliancy. Darwin, inasmuch as a rich philosophical fancy constitutes a poet, possesses the entire art of poetry; no one has carried the curious mechanism of verse and the artificial magic of poetical diction to higher perfection. His volcanic head flamed with imagination, but his torpid heart slept unawakened by passion. His standard of poetry is by much too limited; he supposes that the essence of poetry is something of which a painter can make a picture. A picturesque verse with him a verse completely poetical. But the language of the passions has no connexion with this principle; in truth, what he delineates as poetry itself, is but one of its provinces. Deceived by his illusive standard, he has composed a poem which is perpetually fancy, and never passion. Hence his processional splendour fatigues, and his descriptive ingenuity comes at length to be deficient in novelty, and all the miracles of art cannot supply us with one touch of nature.

Descriptive poetry should be relieved by a skillful intermixture of passages addressed to the heart as well as to the imagination: uniform description satiates; and has been considered as one of the inferior branches of poetry. Of this both Thomson and Goldsmith were sensible. In their beautiful descriptive poems they knew the art of animating the pictures of Fancy with the glow of Sentiment.

Whatever may be thought of the originality of this poem, it has been preceded by others of a congenial disposition. Brookes' poem on 'Universal Beauty,' published about 1735, presents us with the very model of Darwin's verification; and the Latin poem of De la Croix, in 1721 intitled 'Convulbia Florum,' with his subject. There also exists a race of poems which have hitherto been confined to one object, which the poet selected from the work of nature, to embellish with all the splendour of poetical imagination. I have collected some titles.

Perhaps it is Homer, in his Battle of the Frogs and Mice and Virgil in the poem on a Gnat, attributed to him, who have given birth to these luxury poems. The Jesuits particularly when they composed in Latin verse, were partial to such subjects. There is a little poem on Gold, by P. Le Fevre, distinguished for its elegance; and Brumoy has given the Art of making Glass; in which he has described its various productions with equal felicity and knowledge. P. Vaniere has written on Pigeons, D. Cerceau on Butterflies. The success which attended these productions produced numerous imitations, of which several were favourably received. Vaniere composed three on the Grape, the Vintage, and the Kitchen Garden. Another poet selected Oranges for his theme; others have chosen for their subjects, Paper, Birds, and fresh-water Fish. Tarillon has inflamed his imagination with Gun powder; a milder genius, delighted with the oaten pipe sang of Sheep; one who was more pleased with another kind of pipe, has written on Tobacco; and a droll genius wrote a poem on Asses. Two writers have forced didactic poems on the Art of Enigmas, and on Ships.

Others have written on moral subjects. Brumoy has painted the Passions, with a variety of imagery and vivacity of description; P. Meyer has disserted on Anger. Tarillon, like our Silliest, on the Art of Conversation and a lively writer has discussed the subjects of Humour and Wit.

Giannetazzi, an Italian Jesuit, celebrated for his Latin poetry, has composed two volumes of poems on Fishing and Navigation. Fracastor has written delicately on an indelicate subject, his Syphilis. Le Brun wrote a delectable poem on Sweetmeats; another writer on Mineral Waters, and a third on Printing. Vida pleases with his Silk-worms and his Chess; Buchanan is ingenious with his Sphere. Malapert has aspired to catch the Winds, the philosophic Huet amused himself with Salt, and again with Tea. The Gardens of Rapin is a finer poem than critics generally can write; Quillet's Callipedia, or Art of getting handsome Children, has been translated by Rowe; and Du Fresnoy at length gratifies the connoisseurs with his poem on Painting, by the embellishments which his verses have received from the poetic diction of Mason and the commentary of Reynolds.

This list might be augmented with a few of our own poets, and there still remain some virgin themes which only require to be touched by the hand of a true poet. In the 'Memoirs of Trevoux' they observe, in their review of the poem on Gold, 'That poems of this kind have the advantage of instructing us very agreeably. All that has been most remarkably said on the subject is united, compressed in a luminous order and dressed in all the agreeable graces of poetry. Such writers have no little difficulties to encounter: the style and expression cost dear; and still more to give to an arid topic an agreeable form, and to elevate the subject without falling into another extreme.—In the other kinds of poetry the matter assists and prompts genius; here we must possess an abundance to display it.'

PAMPHLETS.

Myles Davies' 'Icon Libellorum, or a Critical History of Pamphlets,' affords some curious information; and as this is a pamphlet-reading age, I shall give a sketch of its contents.

The author is at once serious and humorous in his practice. He there observes: 'From Pamphlets may be learned the genius of the age, the debates of the learned, the follies of the ignorant, the *bévue*s of government, and the mistakes of the courtiers. Pamphlets furnish beaux with their airs, coquets with their charms. Pamphlets are as modish ornaments to gentlemen's toilets as to gentlemen's pockets; they carry reputation of wit and learning to all that make them their companions; the poor find their account in stall-keeping and in hawking them; the rich find in them their shortest way to the secrets of church and state. There is scarce any class of people but may think themselves interested enough to be concerned with what is published in pamphlets, either as to their private instruction, curiosity, and reputation, or to the public advantage and credit; with all which both ancient and modern pamphlets are too often over familiar and free.—In short, with pamphlets the booksellers and stationers adorn the gaiety of shop-gazing. Hence accurses to grocers, apothecaries, and chandlers, good-furniture, and supplies to necessary retreats and natural occasions. In pamphlets lawyers will meet with their chicanery, physicians with their cant, divines with their Shibolet. Pamphlets become more and more daily amusements to the curious, idle, and inquisitive; pastime to gallants and coquets; chat to the talkative; catch-words to informers; fuel to the envious; poison to the unfortunate; balm to the wounded; employment to the lazy; and fabulous materials to romancers and novelists.'

This author sketches the origin and rise of pamphlets. He deduces them from the short writings published by the Jewish Rabbins; various little pieces at the time of the first propagation of Christianity; and notices a certain pamphlet which was pretended to have been the composition of Jesus Christ, thrown from heaven, and picked up by the archangel Michael at the entrance of Jerusalem. It was copied by the priest Leora, and sent about from priest to priest, till Pope Zachary ventured to pronounce a forgery! He notices several such extraordinary publications, many of which produced as extraordinary effects.

He proceeds in noticing the first Arian and Popish pamphlets, or rather libels, i. e. little books, as he distinguishes them. He relates a curious anecdote respecting the forgeries of the monks. Archbishop Usher detected a manuscript of St. Patrick's life, pretended to have been found at Louvain, as an original of a very remote date, several passages taken, with little alteration, from his own writings.

The following notice of our immortal Pope I cannot pass over: 'Another class of pamphlets writ by Roman Catholics is that of Poems, written chiefly by a Pope himself, a gentleman of that name. He passed always amongst one of his acquaintance for what is commonly called a Whig; for it seems the Roman politics are divided as well as Popish missionaries. However one Esdras, an apothecary, as he qualifies himself, has published a piping-hot pamphlet against Mr. Pope's 'Rape of the Lock,' which he entitles 'A Key to the Lock,' wherewith he pretends to unlock nothing less than a Plot carried on by Mr. Pope in that poem against the last and this present ministry and government.'

He observes on Sermons.—'Tis not much to be questioned, but of all modern pamphlets what or wheresoever, the English stitched Sermons be the most edifying, useful, and instructive, yet they could not escape the critical Mr. Bayle's sarcasm.' He says, 'Republique des Lettres,' March 1710, in his article London, 'We see here sermons swarms daily from the press. Our eyes only behold manna: are you not desirous of knowing the reason? It is, that the ministers being allowed to read their sermons in the pulpit, bay all they meet with, and take no other trouble than to read them, and thus pass for very able scholars at a very cheap rate.'

He now begins more directly the history of pamphlets, which he branches out from four different etymologies. He says, 'however foreign the word Pamphlet may appear, it is a genuine English word, rarely known or adopted in any other language: its pedigree cannot well be traced higher than the latter end of Queen Elizabeth's reign. In its first state wretched must have been its appearance, since the great linguist John Minshew, in his 'Guide into Tongues,' printed in 1617, gives it the most miserable character of which any libel can be capable. Mr. Minshew says (and his words were quoted by Lord Chief Justice Holt,) 'A pamphlet, that is Opusculum Stolidorum, the diminutive performance of fools; for par all, and επιθετος. I fill, to wit, all places. According to the vulgar saying, all things are full of fools, or foolish things; for such multitudes of pamphlets, unworthy of the very name of libels, being more vile than common shores and the filth of beggars, and being flying papers daubed over and besmeared with the foam of drunkards, are tossed far and near into the mouths and hands of scoundrels; neither will the sham oracles of Apollo be esteemed so mercenary as a pamphlet.'

Those who will have the word to be derived from Pam, the famous knave of Loo, do not differ much from Minshew; for the derivation of the word Pam is in all probability from par, all; or the whole or the chief of the game.

Under this first etymological notion of Pamphlets, may be comprehended the vulgar stories of the Nine Worthies of the World, of the Seven Champions of Christendom, Tom Thumb, Valentine and Orson, &c, as also most of apocryphal lucubrations. The greatest collection of this first sort of Pamphlets are the Rabbinic traditions in the Talmud, consisting of fourteen volumes in folio, and the Popish legends of the Lives of the Saints, which, though not finished, form fifty folio volumes, all which tracts were originally in pamphlet forms.

The second idea of the radix of the word Pamphlet is, that it takes its derivations from par, all, and φιλεω, I love, signifying a thing beloved by all; for a pamphlet being of a small portable bulk, and of no great price, is adapted to every one's understanding and reading. In this class may be placed all stitched books on serious subjects, the best of which fugitive pieces have been generally preserved, and even reprinted in collections of some tracts, miscellanies, sermons, poems, &c; and, on the contrary, bulky volumes have been reduced, for the convenience of the public, into the familiar shapes of stitched pamphlets. Both these methods have been thus censured by the majority of the lower house of convocation 1711. These abuses are thus represented: 'They have re-published, and collected into volumes, pieces written long ago on the side of infidelity. They have reprinted together in the most contracted manner, many loose and licentious pieces, in order to their being purchased more cheaply, and dispersed more easily.'

The third original interpretation of the word Pamphlet may be that of the learned Dr. Skinner, in his Etymologicon Lingue Anglicane, that it is derived from the Belgic word Pamper, signifying a little paper, or libel. To this third set of Pamphlets may be reduced all sorts of printed single sheets, or half sheets, or any other quantity of single paper prints, such as Declarations, Remonstrances, Proclamations, Edicts, Orders, Injunctions, Memorials, Addresses, News-papers, &c.

The fourth radical signification of the word Pamphlet is that homogenous acceptance of it, viz as it imports any little book, or small volume whatever, whether stitched or bound, whether good or bad, whether serious or ludicrous. The only proper Latin term for a Pamphlet is Libellus, or little book. This word indeed signifies in English an abusive paper or little book, and is generally taken in the worst sense.

After all this display of curious literature, the reader may smile at the guesses of Etymologists; particularly when he is reminded that the derivation of Pamphlet is drawn from quite another meaning to any of the present, by Johnson, which I shall give for his immediate gratification.

Pamphlet [par un fillet, Fr. Whence this word is written anciently, and by Caxton, pamphlet] a small book; properly a book sold unbound, and only stitched.

The French have borrowed the word Pamphlet from us, and have the goodness of not disfiguring its orthography. Roast Beef is also in the same predicament. I conclude that Pamphlets and Roast Beef have therefore their origin in our country.

I am favoured by Mr. Pinkerton with the following curious notice concerning pamphlets:

Of the etymon of pamphlet I know nothing; but that the word is far more ancient than is commonly believed, take the following proof from the celebrated Philobiblion, ascribed to Richard de Buri, Bishop of Durham, but written by Robert Holkot, at his desire, as Fabricius says, about the year 1344, (Fabr Bibl Medii ævi, Vol I.;) it is in the eighth chapter.

'Sed revera libros non libras maluimus; codicesque plus dileximus quam flores: ac panfletos exiguis phaleratis prætulimus palestocidia.'

'But, indeed, we prefer books to pounds; and we love manuscripts better than florins; and we prefer small pamphlets to war-horses.'

This word is as old as Lydgate's time: among his works, quoted by Thomas Warton, is a poem 'translated from a pamphlet in Frensché.'

LITTLE BOOKS.

Myles Davies has given an opinion of the advantages of Little Books with some wit and humour.

'The smallness of the size of a book was always its own commendation; as, on the contrary, the largeness of a book is its own disadvantage, as well as terror of learning. In short, a big book is a scare-crow to the head and pocket of the author, student, buyer, and seller, as well as a harbour of ignorance; hence the inaccessible masteries of the inextinguishable ignorance and superstition of the ancient heathens, degenerate Jews, and of the popish scholars and canonists entrenched under the frightful bulk of huge, vast, and innumerable volumes; such as the great folio that the Jewish rabbins fancied in a dream was given by the angel Raziel to his pupil Adam, containing all the celestial sciences. And the volumes writ by Zoroaster, entitled The Similitude, which is said to have taken up no more space than 1,280 hides of cattle: as also the 25,000, or as some say, 36,000 volumes, besides 525 lesser ones of his. The grossness and multitude of Aristotle and Varro's books were both a prejudice to the authors, and an hindrance to learning, and an occasion of the greatest part of them being lost. The largeness of Plutarch's treatises is a great cause of his being neglected, while Longinus and Epictetus, in their pamphlet Remains, are every one's companions. Origen's 6,000 volumes (as Epiphanius will have it) were not only the occasion of his venting more numerous errors, but also for the most part of their perdition.—Were it not for Euclid's Elements, Hippocrates's Aphorisms, Justinian's Institutes, and Littleton's Tenures in small pamphlet volumes, young mathematicians, fresh-water physicians, civilian novices, and les apprentices en ley d'Angleterre, would be at a loss and stand, and total discouragement. One of the greatest advantages The Dispensary has over King Arthur is its pamphlet size. So Boileau's Lutrin, and his other pamphlet poems, in respect of Perrault's and Chapelain's St Paulin and la Pucelle. These seem to pay a deference to the reader's quick and great understanding; those to mistrust his capacity, and to confine his time as well as his intellect.'

Notwithstanding so much may be alleged in favour of books of a small size, yet the scholars of a former age regarded them with contempt. Scaliger, says Baillet, cavils with Drusius for the smallness of his books; and one of the great printers of the time, (Moret, the successor of Plantin) complaining to the learned Puteanus, who was considered as the rival of Lipsius, that his books were too small for sale, and that purchasers turned away frightened at their diminutive size; Puteanus referred him to Plutarch, whose works consist of small treatises; but the printer took fire at the comparison, and turned him out of his shop, for his vanity at pretending that he wrote in any manner like Plutarch! a specimen this of the politeness and reverence of the early printers for their learned authors! Jurieu reproaches Colomies that he is a great author of little books!

At least, if a man is the author only of little books, he will escape the sarcastic observation of Cicero on a voluminous writer—that 'his body might be burned with his writings,'—of which we have had several, eminent for the worthlessness and magnitude of their labours.

It was the literary humour of a certain Mæcenas, who cheered the lustre of his patronage with the streams of a good dinner, to place his guests according to the size and thickness of the books they had printed. At the head of the table sat those who had published in folio foliissimum; next the authors in quarto; then those in octavo. At that table Blackmore would have had the precedence of Gray. Addison, who found this anecdote in one of the Anas, has seized this idea, and applied it with his felicity of humour in No 529 of the Spectator.

Montaigne's works have been called by a Cardinal,

'The Breviary of Idlers.' It is therefore the book for many men. Francis Osborne has a ludicrous image in favour of such opuscula. 'Huge volumes, like the ox roasted whole at Bartholomew fair, many proclaim plenty of labour, but afford less of what is delicate, savoury, and well-connected, than smaller pieces.'

In the list of titles of minor works, which Aulus Gellius has preserved, the lightness and beauty of such compositions are charmingly expressed. Among these we find—a Basket of Flowers; an embroidered Mantle; and a Variegated Meadow.

A CATHOLIC'S REFUTATION.

In a religious book published by a fellow of the society of Jesus, entitled, 'The Faith of a Catholic,' the author examines what concerns the incredulous Jews and other infidels. He would show that Jesus Christ, author of the religion which bears his name, did not impose on or deceive the Apostles whom he taught; that the Apostles who preached it did not deceive those who were converted; and that those who were converted did not deceive us. In improving these three not difficult propositions he says, he confounds 'the Atheist, who does not believe in God; the Pagan, who adores several; the Deist, who believes in one God, but who rejects a particular Providence; the Free-thinker, who presumes to serve God according to his fancy, without being attached to any religion; the Philosopher, who takes reason and not revelation for the rule of his belief; the Gentile, who never having regarded the Jewish people as a chosen nation, does not believe God promised them a Messiah; and finally, the Jew, who refuses to adore the Messiah in the person of Christ.

I have given this sketch, as it serves for a singular Catalogue of Heretics.

It is rather singular that so late as in the year 1765, a work should have appeared in Paris, which bears the title I translate, 'The Christian Religion proved by a single fact; or a dissertation in which is shown that those Catholics of whom Huneric, King of the Vandals, cut the tongues, spoke miraculously all the remainder of their days; from whence is deducted the consequences of this miracle against the Arians, the Socinians, and the Deists, and particularly against the author of Emilius, by solving their difficulties.' It bears this Epigraph; Ecce Ego admirationem faciam populo huic, miraculo grandi et stupendo. There needs no farther account of this book than the title.

The cause of religion is hurt by stupid advocates.

THE GOOD ADVICE OF AN OLD LITERARY SINNER.

Authors of moderate capacity have unceasingly harassed the public; and have at length been remembered only by the number of wretched volumes their unhappy industry has produced. Such as an author was the Abbé de Marolles, the subject of this article, otherwise a most estimable and ingenious man, and the father of print-collectors.

This Abbé was a most egregious scribbler; and so tormented with violent fits of printing, that he even printed lists and catalogues of his friends. I have even seen at the end of one of his works a list of names of those persons who had given him books. He printed his works at his own expense, as the booksellers had unanimously decreed this. Menage used to say of his works, 'The reason why I esteem the productions of the Abbé is, for the singular neatness of their bindings; he embellishes them so beautifully, that the eye finds pleasure in them. On a book of his versions of the Enigmas of Martial, this Critic wrote, Epigrams against Martial. Latterly, for want of employment, our Abbé began a translation of the Bible; but having inserted the notes of the visionary Isaac de la Peyrere, the work was burnt by order of the ecclesiastical court. He was also an abundant writer in verse, and exultingly told a poet, that his verses cost him little: 'They cost you what they are worth,' replied the sarcastic critic. De Marolles in his Mémoires bitterly complains of the injustice done to him by his contemporaries; and says, that in spite of the little favours shown to him by the public, he has nevertheless published, by an accurate calculation, one hundred and thirty-three thousand one hundred and twenty-four verses! Yet this was not the heaviest of his literary sins. He is a proof that a translator may perfectly understand the language of his original, and yet produce an execrable translation.

In the early part of his life this unlucky author had not been without ambition; it was only when disappointed in his political projects that he resolved to devote himself to literature. As he was incapable of attempting original composition, he became known by his detestable versions. He wrote above eighty volumes, which have never found favour in the eyes of the critics; yet his translations are not without their use, though they never retain by any chance a single passage of the spirit of their originals.

The most remarkable anecdote respecting these translations, that whenever this honest translator came to a difficult passage, he wrote in the margin 'I have not translated this passage, because it is very difficult, and in truth I could never understand it.' He persisted to the last in his uninterrupted amusement of printing books, and his readers having long ceased, he was compelled to present them to his friends, who, probably, were not his readers. After a literary existence of forty years, he gave the public a work not destitute of entertainment in his own Memoirs, which he dedicated to his relations and all his illustrious friends. The singular postscript to his Epistole Dedicatoire contains excellent advice for authors.

'I have omitted to tell you, that I do not advise any one of my relatives or friends to apply himself as I have done to study, and particularly to the composition of books, if he thinks that will add to his fame or fortune. I am persuaded that of all persons in the kingdom, none are more neglected than those who devote themselves entirely to literature. The small number of successful persons in that class (at present I do not recollect more than two or three) should not impose on one's understanding, nor any consequence from them be drawn in favour of others. I know how it is by my own experience, and by that of several amongst you, as well as by many who are now no more, and with whom I was acquainted. Believe me, gentlemen! to pretend to the favours of fortune it is only necessary to render one's self useful, and to be supple and obsequious to those who are in possession of credit and authority: to be handsome in one's person; to adulate the powerful; to smile, while you suffer from them every kind of ridicule and contempt whenever they shall do you the honour to amuse themselves with you; never to be frightened at a thousand obstacles which may be opposed to one; have a face of brass and a heart of stone; insult worthy men who are persecuted; rarely venture to speak the truth; appear devout, with every nice scruple of religion, while at the same time every duty must be abandoned when it clashes with your interest. After these any other accomplishment is indeed superfluous.'

MYSTERIES, MORALITIES, FARCES, AND SOTTIES.

The origin of the theatrical representations of the ancients has been traced back to a Grecian stroller in a cart singing to the honour of Bacchus. Our European exhibitions, perhaps as rude in their commencement, were likewise for a long time devoted to pious purposes, under the titles of Mysteries and Moralities, &c. Of these primeval compositions of the drama of modern Europe, I have collected some anecdotes and some specimens.

It appears that pilgrims introduced these devout spectacles. Those who returned from the Holy Land or other consecrated places composed canticles of their travels, and amused their religious fancies by interweaving scenes of which Christ, the Apostles, and other objects of devotion, served as the themes. Menestrier informs us that these pilgrims travelled in troops, and stood in the public streets, where they recited their poems, with their staff in hand: while their chaplets and cloaks, covered with shells and images of various colours, formed a picturesque exhibition which at length excited the piety of the citizens to erect occasionally a stage on an extensive spot of ground. These spectacles served as the amusement and instruction of the people. So attractive were these gross exhibitions in the dark ages, that they formed one of the principal ornaments of the reception which was given to princes when they entered towns.

When the Mysteries were performed at a more improved period, the actors were distinguished characters, and frequently consisted of the ecclesiastics of the neighbouring villages, who incorporated themselves under the title of Confreres de la Passion. Their productions were divided, not into acts, but into different days of performance, and they were performed in the open plain. This was at least conformable to the critical precept of that mad knight whose opinion is noticed by Pope. It appears by a MS in the Harleian library quoted by Warton, that they were thought to contribute so much to the information and instruction of the people, that one of the Popes granted a pardon of one thousand days to every person who resorted peaceably to the plays performed in the Whitsun-week at Chester, beginning with the 'Creation,' and ending with the 'General Judgment.' These were performed at the expense of the different corporations of that city, and the reader may smile at these ludicrous combinations. 'The Creation' was performed by the Drapers: the 'Deluge' by the Dyers; 'Abraham, Melchisedek, and Lot,' by the Barbers; 'The Purification,' by the Blacksmiths; 'The Last Supper' by the Bakers; the 'Resurrection' by the Skinners; and the 'Ascension' by the Tailors. In these pieces the actors represented the person of the Almighty without being sensible of the gross impiety. So unkind were they in this infancy of the theatrical art, that very serious consequences were produced by their ridiculous blunders and ill managed machinery. In the 'History of the French Theatre,' vol. ii, p. 255, the following singular anecdotes are preserved, concerning a Mystery which took up several days in the performance.

'In the year 1437, when Conrad Bayer, bishop of Metz, caused the Mystery of "The Passion" to be represented on the plain of Veximel near that city, God was an old gentleman, named Mr Nicholas Neufchâtel of Toulaine, curate of Saint Victory of Metz, and who was very near expiring on the cross had he not been timely assisted. He was so enfeebled that it was agreed another priest should be placed on the cross the next day, to finish the representation of the person crucified, and which was done; at the same time the said Mr Nicholas undertook to perform "The Resurrection," which being a less difficult task, he did it admirably well.'—Another priest, whose name was Mr John de Nicey, curate of Metrange, personated Judas, and he had like to have been stifled while he hung on the tree, for his neck slipped; this being at length luckily perceived, he was quickly cut down and recovered.

John Bouchet, in his Annales d'Aquitaine, a work which contains many curious circumstances of the times, written with that agreeable simplicity which characterises the old writers, informs us, that in 1486 he saw played and exhibited in Mysteries by persons of Poitiers, 'The Nativity, Passion, and Resurrection of Christ,' in great triumph and splendour; there were assembled on this occasion most of the ladies and gentlemen of the neighbouring counties.

We will now examine the Mysteries themselves. I prefer for this purpose to give a specimen from the French, which are livelier than our own. It is necessary to promise to the reader, that my versions being in prose will probably lose much of that quaint expression and vulgar naïveté which prevail through the originals, written in octosyllabic verses.

One of these Mysteries has for its subject the election of an Apostle to supply the place of the traitor Judas. A dignity so awful is conferred in the meanest manner it is possible to conceive; it is done by drawing two straws, of which he who gets the longest becomes the Apostle. Louis Chocquet was a favorite composer of these religious performances; when he attempts the pathetic he has constantly recourse to devils; but, as these characters are sustained with little propriety, his pathos succeeds in raising a laugh. In the following dialogue Anne and Caiaphas are introduced conversing about Saint Peter and Saint John:—

'ANNE.

'I remember them once very honest people They have often brought their fish to my house to sell.

'CAIAPHAS.

'Is this true?

'ANNE.

'By God it is true; my servants remember them very well. To live more at their ease they have left off business; or perhaps they were in want of customers. Since that time they have followed Jesus, that wicked heretic, who has taught them magic; the fellow understands necromancy, and is the greatest magician alive, as far as Rome itself.'

Saint John attacked by the satellites of Domitian, amongst whom the author has placed Longinus and Patroclus, gives regular answers to their insulting interrogatories. Some of these I shall transcribe, but leave to the reader's conjectures the replies of the Saint, which are not difficult to anticipate.

'PARTHEMIA.

'You tell us strange things, to say there is but one God in three persons.

'LONGINUS.
'Is it any where said that we must believe your old prophets (with whom your memory seems overburdened) to be more perfect than our Gods?

'PATROCCLUS.
'You must be very cunning to maintain impossibilities. Now listen to me: Is it possible that a virgin can bring forth a child without ceasing to be a virgin?

'DOMITIAN.
'Will you not change these foolish sentiments? Would you pervert us? Will you not convert yourself? Lords! you perceive now very clearly what an obstinate fellow this is! Therefore let him be strip and put into a great caldron of boiling oil. Let him die at the Latin Gate.

'PESART.
'The great devil of hell fears me if I don't Latinise him well. Never shall they hear at the Latin Gate any one sing so well as he shall sing.

'TORNEAU.
'I dare venture to say he won't complain of being frozen.

'PATROCCLUS.
'Frita, run quick; bring wood and coals, and make the caldron ready.

'FRITA.
'I promise him, if he has the gout or the itch, he will soon get rid of them.'

St John dies a perfect martyr, resigned to the boiling oil and gross jests of Patroclus and Longinus. One is astonished in the present times at the excessive absurdity and indeed blasphemy which the writers of these moralities permitted themselves, and, what is more extraordinary, were permitted by an audience consisting of a whole town. An extract from the 'Mystery of Saint Dennis' is in the Duke de la Valliere's 'Bibliothèque du Theatre Francois depuis son origine. Dresde 1768.'

The emperor Domitian, irritated against the Christians, persecutes them and thus addresses one of his courtiers:

'Seigneurs Romains, j'ai en- Roman lords. I understand tendu Que d'un crucifix, d'un pendu, That of a crucified hanged man On fait un Dieu par notre em- They make a God in our kingpire - dom,
Sans ce qu'on le nous daigne Without even deigning to ask dire.' our permission.

He then orders an officer to seize on Dennis in Franco. When this officer arrives at Paris the inhabitants acquaint him of the rapid and grotesque progress of this future saint:—

'Sire, il preche un Dieu a Paris Sir, he preaches a God at Paris Qui fait tous les mouls et les Who has made mountain and vauls. valley.

Il va à cheval sans chevaux. He goes a horseback without horses,

Il fait et defait tout ensemble. He does and undoes at once.

Il vit, il meurt, il sue, il trem- He lives, he dies, he sweats, he ble trembles.

Il pleure, il rit, il veille, et He weeps, he laughs, he dort. wakes and sleeps.

Il est jeune et vieux, faible et He is young and old, weak fort. and strong.

Il fait d'un coq une poularde. He turns a cock into a hen.
Il joue des arts de roulette. He knows how to conjure with cup and ball,

Où je ne sçais que ce peut Or I do not know who this can être.' be.

Another of these admirers says, evidently alluding to the right of baptism:—

'Sire, oyez que fait ce fol Sir, hear what this mad priest prestre: does:

Il prend de l'eau en une He takes water out of a ladle, écuelle, ewe.

Et gets aux gens sur la cer- And, throwing it at people's vile, heads.

Et dit que tant sont sau- He says that when they depart vés! they are saved!

This piece then proceeds to entertain the spectators with the tortures of Saint Dennis, and at length, when more than dead, they mercifully behead him:—the Saint, after his decapitation, rises very quietly, takes his head under his arm, and walks off the stage in all the dignity of martyrdom.

It is justly observed by Bayle on these wretched representations, that while they prohibited the people from meditating on the sacred history in the book which contains it in all its purity and truth, they permitted them to see it on the theatre sullied with a thousand gross inventions, which were expressed in the most vulgar manner and in a farcical style. Warton, with his usual elegance, observes,—'To those who are accustomed to contemplate the great picture of human follies which the unpolished ages of Europe hold up to our view, it will not appear surprising that the people who were forbidden to read the events of the sacred history in the Bible, in which they are faithfully and beautifully related, should at the same time be permitted to see them represented on the stage disgraced with the grossest improprieties, corrupted with inventions and additions of the most ridiculous kind, sullied with impurities, and expressed in the language and gesticulations of the lowest farce.' Elsewhere he philosophically observes, that, however, they had their use, 'not only in teaching the great truths of scripture to men who could not read the Bible, but in abolishing the barbarous attachment to military games and the bloody contentions of the tournament, which had so long prevailed as the sole species of popular amusement. Rude, and even ridiculous as they were, they softened the manners of the people by diverting the public attention to spectacles in which the mind was concerned, and by creating a regard for other arts than those of bodily strength and savage valour.'

Mysteries are to be distinguished from Moralities, and Farces, and Sotties. Moralities are dialogues where the interlocutors represented feigned or allegorical personages. Farces were more exactly what their title indicates: obscene, gross, and dissolute representations, where both the actions and words are alike reprehensible.

The Sotties were more farcical than farce, and frequently had the licentiousness of pasquinades. I shall give an ingenious specimen of one of the moralities. This morality is entitled 'The Condemnation of Feasts, to the Praise of Diet and Sobriety for the Benefit of the Human Body.'

The perils of gorging form the present subject. Towards the close is a trial between Feasting and Supper. They are summoned before Experience, the Lord Chief Justice! Feasting and Supper are accused of having murdered four persons by force of gorging them. Experience condemns Feasting to the gallows; and his executioner is Diet. Feasting asks for a father confessor, and makes a public confession of so many crimes, such numerous convulsions, apoplexies, head-aches, stomach-qualms, &c, which he has occasioned, that his executioner Diet in a rage stops his mouth, puts the cord about his neck, and strangles him. Supper is only condemned to load his hands with a certain quantity of lead, to hinder him from putting too many dishes on table—he is also bound over not to approach Dinner too near, and to be placed at the distance of six hours' walking under pain of death. Supper felicitates himself on his escape, and swears to observe with scrupulous exactness the mitigated sentence.

The Moralities were allegorical dramas, whose tediousness seems to have delighted a barbarous people not yet accustomed to perceive that what was obvious might be omitted to great advantage: like children, every thing must be told in such an age: their own unexercised imagination cannot supply any thing.

Of the farces the licentiousness is extreme, but their pleasantry and their humour are not contemptible. The 'Village Lawyer,' which is never exhibited on our stage without producing the broadest mirth, originates among these ancient drolleries. The humorous incident of the shepherd, who, having stolen his master's sheep, is advised by his lawyer only to reply to his judge by mimicking the bleating of a sheep, and when the lawyer in return claims his fee pays him by no other coin, is discovered in these ancient farces. Brueys got up the ancient farce of the 'Pettit' in 1702, and we borrowed it from him.

They had another species of drama still broader than Farce, and more strongly featured by the grossness, the severity, and personality of satire—these were called Sotties, of which the following one I find in the Duke de la Valliere's 'Bibliothèque du Theatre Francois.'

The actors come on the stage with their fools'-caps each wanting the right ear, and begin with stringing satirical proverbs, till after drinking freely, they discover that their fools'-caps want the right ear. They call on their old grandmother Sottis (or Folly), who advises them to take up some trade. She introduces this progeny of her fools to the World, who takes them into his service. The World tries their skill, and is much displeased with their work. The Cobbler-fool pinches his feet by making the shoes too small; the Taylor-fool hangs his coats too base or too tight about him; the Priest-fool says his mass either too short or too tedious. They all agree that the World does not know what he wants, and must be tickled, and prevail on him to get some advice from a physician. The World obligingly sends what is required to an Urne-doctor, who instantly pronounces that 'the World as mad as a March hare!' He comes to visit his patient, and puts a great many questions on his unhappy state. The World replies, 'that what most troubles his head is the idea of a new deluge by fire, which must one day consume him to powder; on which the Physician gives this answer:—

'Et te troubles-tu pour cela ?	And you really trouble yourself about this ?
Monde, tu ne te troubles pas	Oh World ! you do not trouble yourself about
Devoir co larrons autrepars	Selling those impudent rascals
Vendre et acheter benefices ;	Selling and buying livings ;
Les enfans en bras des Nour-	Children in the arms of their nurses

Les Abbés, Eveques, Pri-	Made Abbots, Bishops, and

Tuer les gens pour leurs pla-	Killing people for their pleaisures,	sures,

ence,
Faire la guerre à toute ou-	Making war, exterminating
trance	war,
Pour un rien entre les chres-	For a bubble among christi-
tians ?	tians !

The World takes leave of his physician, but retains his advice : and to cure his fits of melancholy gives himself up entirely to the direction of his fools. In a word, the World dresses himself in the coat and cap of Folly, and he becomes as gay and as ridiculous as the rest of the fools.

This Sottie was represented in the year 1524. Such was the rage for mysteries, that René D'Anjou, King of Naples and Sicily, and Count of Provence, had been represented with all possible magnificence, and made him a very serious occupation. Being in Provence, and having received letters from his son the Prince of Calabria, who asked him for an immediate aid of men, he realised that he had a very different matter in hand, for he was fully employed in settling the order of a mystery—in power of God.

Mr Strutt in his 'Manners and Customs of the English,' has given a description of the stage in England when mysteries were the only theatrical performances. Vol. iii. p 150.

'In the early dawn of literature, and when the sacred mysteries were the only theatrical performances, what is now called the stage did then consist of three several scenarii, or stages raised one above another. On the uppermost sat the Pater Celestis, surrounded with his angels; on the second appeared the Holy Saints, and sanctified men; and the last and lowest was occupied by heri men who had not yet passed from this transitory life to the regions of eternity. On one side of this lowest scenarium was the resemblance of a dark pitchy cavern from whence issued appearance of fire and flames: and then it was necessary, the audience were treated with blood yellings and noises as imitative of the howlings and sies of the wretched souls tormented by the relentless demons. From this yawning cave the devils themselves condescended to delight and to instruct the spectators: to delight, because they were usually the greatest jests and buffoons that then appeared; and to instruct, for they treated the wretched mortals who were delivered from them with the utmost cruelty, warning thereby all men to avoid the falling into the clutches of such hard and remorseless spirits.' An anecdote relating to English mystery presents a curious specimen of the manners of our country, which then could admit of such a presentation; the simplicity, if not the libertinism of the times was great. 'A play was acted in one of the principal towns of England, under the direction of the trading companies of that city, before a numerous assembly of both sexes, wherein Adam and Eve appeared on the stage enquired, performed their whole part in the representation of Eden, to the serpent's temptation, to the eating of the forbidden fruit, the perceiving of, and conversing about their nakedness, and to the supplying of fig-leaves to cover it.' Warton observes they had the authority of scripture for such a representation, and they gave matters just as they found them in the third chapter of Genesis. The following article will afford the reader a specimen of an Elegant Morality.

LOVE AND FOLLY, IN ANCIENT MORALITY.

One of the most elegant Moralities was composed by Louise L'Abé; the Aspasia of Lyons in 1550, adored by her contemporaries. With no extraordinary beauty, she however displayed the fascination of classical learning, and a vein of vernacular poetry refined and fanciful.—To accomplishments so various she added the singular one of distinguishing herself by a military spirit, and was nicknamed Captain Louise. She was a fine rider and a fine lutanist. She presided in the assemblies of persons of literature and distinction: married to a rope-manufacturer, she was called La belle Cordiere, and her name is still perpetuated by that of the street she lived in. Her anagram was Belle a Soy.—But she was belle also for others. Her Morals in one point were not correct, but her taste was never gross: the ashes of her perishable graces may preserve themselves sacred from our severity; but the productions of her genius may still delight.

Her Morality entitled 'Debat de Folie et d'Amour—The contest of Love and Folly,' is divided into five parts, and contains six mythological or allegorical personages.—This division resembles our five acts, which soon after the publication of this Morality, became generally practised.

In the first part, Love and Folly arrive at the same moment at the gate of Jupiter's palace, to a festival to which he had invited the Gods. Folly observing Love just going to step in at the hall of the festival, pushed him away and entered in first. Love is enraged, but Folly insists on her precedence. Love, perceiving there was no reasoning with Folly, bends his bow and shoots an arrow; but she baffled his attempt by rendering herself invisible. She in her turn becomes furious, falls on the boy, tearing out his eyes, and then covers them with a bandage which could not be taken off.

In the second part, Love, in despair for having lost his sight, implores the assistance of his mother; she tries in vain to undo the magic fillet; the knots are never to be united!

In the third part, Venus presents herself at the foot of the throne of Jupiter to complain of the outrage committed by Folly on her son. Jupiter commands Folly to appear. She replies, that though she has reasons to justify herself, she will not venture to plead her cause, as she is apt to speak too much, or omit what was material. Folly asks for a counsellor, and chooses Mercury; Apollo is selected by Venus. The fourth part consists of a long dissertation between Jupiter and Love, on the manner of loving. Love advises Jupiter, if he wishes to taste of truest happiness, to descend on earth, to lay down all his majesty and pomp; and, in the figure of a mere mortal, to seek to give pleasure to some beautiful maiden: 'Then wilt thou feel quite another contentment than that thou hast hitherto enjoyed: instead of a single pleasure it will be doubled: for there is as much pleasure to be loved as to love.' Jupiter agrees that this may be true, but he thinks that to attain to this requires too much time, too much trouble, too many attentions,—and that after all it is not worth them!

In the fifth part, Apollo, the advocate for Venus, in a long pleading demands justice against Folly. The Gods, seduced by his eloquence, show by their indignation that they would condemn Folly without hearing her advocate Mercury. But Jupiter commands silence, and Mercury replies. His pleading is as long as the adverse party's, and his arguments in favour of Folly are so plausible, that when he concludes his address, the gods are divided in opinion; some espouse the cause of Love, and some that of Folly. Jupiter, after trying in vain to make them agree together, pronounces this award:—

'On account of the difficulty and importance of your disputes and the diversity of your opinions, we have suspended your contest from this day to three times seven times nine centuries. In the mean time we command you to live amicably together, without injuring one another. Folly shall lead Love, and take him whithersoever he pleases; and when restored to his sight, after consulting the Fates, sentence shall be pronounced.'

Many beautiful conceptions are scattered in this elegant morality. It has given birth to subsequent imitations; it was too original and playful an idea not to be appropriated by the poets. To this morality we perhaps owe the pæne-gyric of Folly by Erasmus, and the Love and Folly of La Fontaine.

RELIGIOUS NOUVELLETES.

I shall notice a class of very singular works, in which the spirit of romance has been called in to render religion more attractive to certain heated imaginations.

In the fifteenth century was published a little book of prayers, accompanied by figures, both of a very uncommon nature for a religious publication. It offers too curious objects to pass over in silence. It is entitled Hortulus Animæ cum Oratunculis aliquibus superadditis quas in prioribus Libris non habentur.

It is a small octavo en lettres Gothiques printed by John Grunninger, 1600. 'A garden,' says the author, 'which abounds with flowers for the pleasure of the soul;' but Marchand tells us they are full of poison.

In spite of his fine promises, the chief part of these meditations are as puerile as they are superstitious. This we might excuse, because the ignorance and superstition of the times allowed such things; but the figures which accompany the work are to be condemned in all ages; one represents Saint Ursula and some of her eleven thousand virgins, with all the licentious inventions of an Aretino. What strikes the ear does not so much irritate the senses, observes the sage Horace, as what is presented in all its nudity to the eye. One of these designs is only ridiculous: David is represented as examining Bathsheba bathing, while Cupid hovering round him throws his dart, and with a malicious smile triumphs in his success: we have had many gross and strange designs like this. There is a laughable picture in a village in Holland, in which Abraham appears ready to sacrifice his son Isaac by a loaded blunderbuss; but his pious intention is entirely frustrated by an angel urinating in the pan. Something similar is the design of another painting, in which the Virgin receives the annunciation of the angel Gabriel with a huge chaplet of beads tied round her waist, reading her own offices, and kneeling before a crucifix; or, like another happy invention to be seen on an altar-piece at Worms, in which the Virgin throws Jesus in the hepper of a mill, while from the other side he issues, changed into little morsels of bread with which the priests feast the people. Matthiæson, a modern traveller, describes a picture in a church at Constance, called the Conception of the holy Virgin. An old man lies on a cloud, whence he darts out a vast beam, which passes through a dove hovering just below; at the end of a beam appears a large transparent egg, in which egg is seen a child in swaddling clothes with a glory round it. Mary sits leaning in an arm chair, and opens her mouth to receive the egg.

I must not pass unnoticed in this article a production as extravagant in its design, in which the author prided himself on discussing three thousand questions concerning his favourite lady Mary.

The publication now adverted to was not presented to the world in a barbarous age and in a barbarous country, but printed at Paris in 1688. It bears for title, Denote Salutation des Membres sacres du Corps de la Glorieuse Vierge, Mere de Dieu. That is, 'A Devout Salutation of the Holy Members (of the Body of the Glorious Virgin of the Mother of God.)' It was printed and published with an approbation and privilege! which is more strange than the work itself. Valois reproaches it in these just terms: 'What would Innocent XI have done, after having abolished the shameful Offices of the Conception, Indulgences, &c., if he had seen a volume in which the impertinent devotion of that visionary monk caused to be printed, with permission of his superiors, Meditations on all the Parts of the Body of the Holy Virgin? Religion, decency, and good sense, are they not alike wounded by such an extravagance?' In the Journal des Sçavans, for December 1703, I find a specimen of these salutations. They have preserved the most decent ones, in which this fanatic salutes the hair and the ears of the holy Virgin.

Salutation to the Hair

'I salute you, charming hair of Maria! Rays of the mystical sun! Lines of the centre and circumference of all created perfection! Veins of gold of the mine of love! Chains of the prison of God! Roots of the tree of life!

Rivulets of the fountain of Paradise! Strings of the lyre of charity! Nets that caught Jesus, and shall be used the hunting-day of souls!'

Salutation to the Ears.

'I salute ye, intelligent ears of Maria! ye prelude of the princes of the poor! Tribunal for their petition of salvation at the audience of the miserable! Universal all divine wisdom! Receivers general of all wards! ye are pierced with the rings of our chains; ye are imposed with our necessities!'

The images, prints, and miniatures, with which catholic religion has occasion to decorate its splendid ceremonies, have frequently been consecrated to the purpose of love: they have been so many votive offerings we to have been suspended in the temple of Idalia. Alexander VI had the images of the Virgin made to represent some of his mistresses; the famous Vanzoza, his favourite, was placed on the altar of Santa Maria del polo; and Julia Farnese furnished a subject for another Virgin. The same genius of pious gallantry also reigned in our country. The statues made the queen of Henry III a model for the face of the Virgin Mary. He elsewhere affirms, that the Virgin Mary was generally made to bear a resemblance to the queens of the times, which, no doubt produced some real devotion in courtiers.

The prayer-books of certain pious libertines were decorated with the portraits of their favourite mistresses and in the characters of saints, and even of the Virgin Mary. This scandalous practice was particularly prevalent in that reign of debauchery in France, when Henry III held the reins of government with a loose hand. A missal once appertaining to the queen of Lewis XII, has been seen a mitred ape, giving its benediction to a man of state before it; a keen reproach to the clergy of that time. Charles V, however pious that emperor affected to have a missal painted for his mistress by the great Albrecht Dürer, the borders of which are crowded with extravagant grotesques, consisting of apes, who were sometimes gently sportive, giving clysters to one another, and many much more offensive attitudes, not adapted to heighten the piety of the Royal Mistresses. This missal, two French verses written by the Emperor himself, does not seem to have been ashamed of his present. The Italians carried this taste to excess. The manners of our country were more rarely tainted with this depraved licentiousness, although I have observed an innocent tendency towards it, by examining the illuminated manuscripts of our ancient metrical romances: while we admire the vivid colouring of these splendid manuscripts, the curious observer will perceive that almost every hero represented in a state which appears incompatible with reputation for chastity. Most of these works are, I believe, of French origin.

A good supplement might be formed to religious incense from the Golden Legend, which abounds in such. Henry Stephens's Apology for Herodotus might be as wisely consulted with effect for the same purpose. This is a story of St Mary the Egyptian, who was perhaps looser liver than Mary Magdalen; for not being able to pay for her passage to Jerusalem, whether she was going to adore the holy cross and sepulchre, in despair she thought of an expedient in lieu of payment to the ferryman which required at least going twice, instead of once, Jerusalem as a penitential pilgrimage. This anecdote presents the genuine character of certain devotees, who would have formed accomplished methodists.

Melchior Inchoffer, a jesuit published a book to venerate the miracle of a Letter which the Virgin Mary is addressed to the citizens of Messina: when Nas brought him positive proofs of its evident forgery, Inchoffer ingeniously confessed that he knew it was an imposture but that he had done it by the orders of his superiors.

This same letter of the Virgin Mary was like a donation made to her by Louis the eleventh of the whole count of Boulogne, retaining, however, for his own use the revenues! This solemn act bears the date of the year 1471 and is entitled 'Conveyance of Louis the eleventh to the Virgin of Boulogne of the right and title of the fief in homage of the county of Boulogne, which is held by the Count of Saint Pol, to render a faithful account before the image of the said lady.'

Maria Agreda, a religious visionary, wrote the Life of the Virgin. She informs us that she resisted the con-ends of God and the holy Mary till the year 1637, when he began to compose this curious rhapsody. When she finished this original production, her confessor advised her to burn it; she obeyed. Her friends, however, who did not think her less inspired than she informed them she was, advised her to re-write the work. When printed it read rapidly from country to country: new editions appeared at Lisbon, Madrid, Perpignan, and Antwerp. It is the rose of Sharon for those climates. There are so many absurdities in this book which were found to give pleasure to the devout, that it was solemnly honoured in the consistory of the Sorbonne; and it spread the more! The head of this lady was quite turned by her religion. The first six chapters she relates the visions of the Virgin, which induced her to write her own life. She begins her history à peu près, as it may be expressed; for she has made a narrative of what passed during the nine months which the Virgin was confined in the womb of her mother St Anne. After the birth of Mary she received an apparition of angelic guards: we have several conversations which God held with the Virgin during the first fifteen months after her birth. And it is in this manner is formed a circulating novel, which delighted the female votaries of the seventeenth century.

The worship paid to the Virgin Mary in Spain and Italy exceeds that which is given to the Son or the Father. When they pray to Mary, their imagination pictures a beautiful woman, they really feel a passion; while Jesus is only regarded as a Bambino, or infant at the breast, and the Father is hardly ever recollected; but the Madonna, the Madame, the Maria Santa, while she inspires their religious inclinations, is a mistress to those who have none.

Of similar works there exists an entire race, and the varieties of the curious may yet preserve a shelf of these divine novelles. The Jesuits were the usual authors of these rhapsodies. I find an account of a book which pretends to describe what passes in Paradise. A Spanish Jesuit published at Salamanca a volume in folio, 1662, entitled Empyreologia. He dwells with great complacency upon the joys of the celestial abode; there always will be music in heaven with material instruments as our ears are already accustomed to; otherwise he thinks the celestial music would not be music for us!—But another Jesuit is more particular in his accounts. He positively assures us that we shall experience a genuine pleasure in kissing and embracing the bodies of the blessed; they will bathe in the presence of each other, and for this purpose there are most agreeable pools in which we shall swim like fish; that we shall all smile as sweetly as larks and nightingales; that the angels will dress themselves in female habits, their hair curled; wearing petticoats and fardingales, and with the best linen; that men and women will amuse themselves in masquerades, feasts and balls.—Women will sing more sweetly than men to exalt these entertainments, and the resurrection will have more luxuriant tresses, ornamented with ribbons and head-dresses as in this life!

Such were the books once so devoutly studied, and which were often literally understood. How very bold must the minds of the Jesuits have been, and how very subtle those of their readers, that such extravagances could ever be published! And yet, even to the time in which I am now writing,—even at this day,—the same sarcasms and impassioned pencil is employed by the Apôtres of Mysticism—the Swedenburghians,—the Moravians, the Methodists!

I find an account of another book of this class, ridiculous enough to be noticed. It has for title, 'The Spiritual Treasure', composed of as many Madrigals or sonnets and Epigrams as there are days in the year; written for the consolation of the pious and the curious. By Father G. de la Motte, Austin Preacher at Bayonne, 1665. To give a specimen of this singular collection take an Epigram addressed to a Jesuit, who young as he was, used to put spurs to his shirt to mortify the outer-man! The Kalendarium then gives a point to these spurs:

Il ne pousse donc plus ni ruor ni bennir
 Son le rude Epuron dont tu fais son supplice;
 Qui vit jamais tel ardeur,
 Ne pique un cheval pour le mieux retenir!

HUMBLY IMITATED.

Your body no more will neigh and will kick,
 The point of the spur must eternally prick;
 Wherever contrived a thing with such skill!
 To keep spurring a horse to make him stand still!

One of the most extravagant works projected on the subject of the Virgin Mary appears to be the following one. The prior of a convent in Paris had reiterated intreated Varillas the historian to examine a work composed by one of his monks; and of which—not being himself addicted to letters—he wished to be governed by his opinion. Varillas at length yielded to the entreaties of the prior; and to regale the critic, they laid on two tables for his inspection seven enormous volumes in folio!

This rather disheartened our reviewer: but greater was his astonishment, when, having opened the first volume, he found its title to be Summa Dei-pars; and as Saint Thomas had made a Sum, or System of Theology, so our monk had formed a System of the Virgin! He immediately comprehended the design of our good father, who had laboured on this work full thirty years, and who boasted he had treated the Three Thousand Questions concerning the Virgin; of which he flattered himself not a single one had ever yet been imagined by any one but himself!

Perhaps a more extraordinary design was never known. Varillas, pressed to give his judgment on this work, advised the prior with great prudence and good nature to amuse the honest old monk with the hope of printing these seven folios, but always to start some new difficulties; for it would be inhuman to give so deep a chagrin to a man who had reached his 74th year, as to inform him of the nature of his favourite occupations; and that after his death, he should throw the seven folios into the fire.

'CRITICAL SAGACITY,' AND 'HAPPY CONJECTURE,' OR, BENTLEY'S MILTON.

— Bentley, long to wrangling schools confined,
 And but by books acquainted with mankind —
 To Milton lending sense, to Horace wit,
 He makes them write, what never poet writ.

Dr Bentley's edition of our English Homer is sufficiently known by name. As it stands a terrifying beacon to conjectural criticism, I shall just notice some of those violations which the learned critic ventures to commit with all the arrogance of a Scaliger. This man so deeply versed in ancient learning it will appear was destitute of taste and genius in his native language.

It was an unfortunate ingenuity in our critic, when, to persuade the world of the necessity of his edition, he imagined a fictitious editor of Milton's Poems: for it was this ingenuity which produced all his absurdities. As it is certain that the blind bard employed an amanuensis, it was not improbable that many words of similar sound, but very different signification, might have disfigured the poem; but our Doctor was bold enough to conjecture that this amanuensis interpolated whole verses of his own composition in the 'Paradise Lost!' Having laid down this fatal position, all the consequences of his folly naturally followed it. Yet if we must conjecture, the more probable one will be, that Milton, who was never careless of his future fame, had his poem read to him after it had been published. The first edition appeared in 1667, and the second in 1675 in which all the faults of the former edition are continued. By these faults the Doctor means what he considers to be such: for we shall soon see that his 'Canons of Criticism' are apocryphal.

Bentley says that he will supply the want of manuscripts to collate (to use his own words) by his own 'Sagacity,' and 'happy Conjecture.'

Milton, after the conclusion of Satan's speech to the fallen angels, proceeds thus:

1. He spake: and to confirm his words out flew
2. Millions of flaming swords, drawn from the thighs
3. Of mighty cherubim: the sudden blaze
4. Far round illum'd hell; highly they rag'd
5. Against the Highest; and fierce with grasped arms
6. Clash'd on their sounding shields the din of war,
7. Hurling defiance toward the vault of Heaven.

In this passage, which is as perfect as human wit can make, the Doctor alters three words. In the second line he puts blades instead of swords; in the fifth, he puts swords instead of arms; and in the last line he prefers walls to vault. All these changes are so many defacements of the poem. The word swords is far more poetical than blades, which may as well be understood of knives as swords. The word arms, the generic for the specific term, is still stronger and nobler than swords; and the beautiful conception of vault, which is always indefinite to the eye, while the solidity of walls would but meanly describe the highest

Heaven, gives an idea of grandeur and majesty,
Milton writes, book i, v. 63,

No light, but rather darkness visible
Served only to discover sights of woe

Perhaps borrowed from Spenser :

A little glooming light, much like a shade.
Faery Queen, B. i, C. i, St. 14.

This fine expression of 'darkness visible' the Doctor's critical sagacity has thus rendered clearer :—

'No light, but rather a transpicuous gloom.'

Again our learned critic distinguishes the 74th line of the first book—

As from the centre thrice to the utmost pole, as 'a vicious verse,' and therefore with 'happy conjecture,' and no taste, thrusts in an entire verse of his own composition—

'Distance which to express all measure fails.'

Milton writes,

Our torments also may in length of time
Become our elements.

B. ii, ver 274.

Bentley CORRECTS,

'Then, as was well observ'd, our torments may Become our elements.

A curious instance how the insertion of a single prosaic expression turns a fine verse into something worse than the vilest prose.

To conclude with one more instance of critical emendation: Milton says, with an agreeable turn of expression—

So parted they; the angel up to heaven,
From the thick shade; and Adam to his bower.

Bentley 'conjectures' these two verses to be inaccurate, and in lieu of the last writes—

'Adam to ruminate on past discourse.'

And then our erudite critic reasons! as thus:

After the conversation between the angel and Adam in the bower, it may be well presumed that our first parent waited on his heavenly guest at his departure to some little distance from it, till he began to take his flight towards heaven; and therefore 'sagaciously' thinks that the poet could not with propriety say that the angel parted from the thick shade, that is, the bower, to go to heaven. But if Adam attended the angel no farther than the door or entrance of the bower, then he shrewdly asks 'How Adam could return to his bower if he was never out of it?'

Our editor has made above a thousand similar corrections in this edition of Milton! Some have suspected that the same kind intention which prompted Dryden to persuade Creech to undertake a translation of Horace influenced those who encouraged our Doctor, in thus exercising his 'sagacity' and 'happy conjecture' on the epic of Milton. He is one of those learned critics who have happily 'elucidated their author into obscurity,' and comes nearest to that 'true conjectural critic' whose practice a Portuguese satirist so greatly admired; by which means if he be only followed up by future editors, we might have that immaculate edition, in which little or nothing should be found of the original!

I have collected these few instances as not uninteresting to men of taste; they may convince us that a scholar may be familiarised to Greek and Latin, though a stranger to his vernacular literature; and that a verbal critic may sometimes be successful in his attempts on a single word, though he may be incapable of tasting an entire sentence. Let it also remain as a gibbet on the high roads of literature; that 'conjectural critics' as they pass may not forget the foolish fate of Bentley.

The following epigram appeared on this occasion :—

ON MILTON'S EXECUTIONER.

Did Milton's prose, O Charles! thy death defend?
A furious foe, unconquies, proves a friend;
On Milton's verse does Bentley comment? know,
A weak officious friend becomes a foe.
While he would seem his author's fame to further,
The murderous critic has aveng'd thy murder.

It is acknowledged, that the classical learning of Dr Bentley was singular and acute. But the profound erudition of words is frequently found not to be allied to sensibility of taste, and far removed from the ardent genius.

A JANSENIST DICTIONARY.

When L'Advocat published his concise Biographic Dictionary, the Jansenists, the Methodists of France considered it as having been written with a view to depreciate the merit of their friends. It must be acknowledged there was little foundation for this complaint; but the spirit of party is soon alarmed. The Abbé Barral undertook a dictionary devoted to their cause. In this labour he indulged, assisted by his good friends the Jansenists, all the impetuosity and acerbity of a splenetic adversary. The abbé was, however, an able writer; his anecdotes are numerous and well chosen; and his style is rapid and glowing. The work bears for title 'Dictionnaire Historique, Littéraire, et Critique des Hommes Célèbres,' 6 vols. 8vo. 1759. It is no unuseful speculation to observe in this manner a faction represents those who have not been favourites; for this purpose I select the characters of Fénelon, Cranmer, and Luther.

In their article of Fénelon they write,—'He composed for the instruction of the Dukes of Burgundy, Anjou, &c. Berry, several works, amongst others the Telemachus—a singular book, which partakes at once of the character of a romance, and of a poem, and which substitutes a poetic cadence for versification. But several ludicrous pictures would not lead us to suspect that this book issued from the pen of a sacred minister for the education of prince; and what we are told by a famous poet is not improbable, that Fénelon did not compose it at court, but that it is the fruits of his retreat in his diocese. And indeed the amours of Calpeo and Eucharis should not be the first lessons that a minister should give his scholar and besides, the fine moral maxims which the author's tributes to the Pagan divinities are not well placed in the mouth. Is not this rendering homage to the demons of great truths which we receive from the Gospel, and to dispoil J. C. to render respectable the annihilated gods—paganism?—This prelate was a wretched divine, more familiar with the light of profane authors than with that of the fathers of the church. Phelipeaux has given us in his narrative of 'Quietism,' the portrait of the friend of Madame Guyon. This archbishop has a lively genius, arts and supply, which can flatter and dissimulate if ever as could. Seduced by a woman, he was solicitous to spread his seduction. He joined to the politeness and elegance of conversation a modest air, which rendered him amiable. He spoke of spirituality with the expression and the enthusiasm of a prophet; with such talents he flattered himself that every thing would yield to him.'

In this work the Protestants, particularly the first reformers, find no quarter; and thus virulently their rational catholicism exults over the unhappy end of Thomas Cranmer, the first protestant archbishop.

Thomas Cranmer married the sister of Oslander. A Henry VIII detested married priests, Cranmer kept his second marriage in profound secrecy. This action served to show the character of this great reformer, who is the hero of Burnet, whose history is so much esteemed in England. What blindness to suppose him an Athanasius was at once a Lutheran secretly married, a consecrated archbishop under the Roman pontiff, whose power he detested, saying the mass in which he did not believe, as granting a power to say it! The divine vengeance bore on this sycophantic courtier, who had always prostituted his conscience to his fortune.

His character of Luther is quite Lutheran in essence, for Luther was himself a stranger to modern strictures.

The furious Luther, perceiving himself assisted by the credit of several princes, broke loose against the church with the most inveterate rage, and rung the most terrible alarm against the pope. According to him we should have a fire to every thing, and reduced to one heap of ashes the pope and the princes who supported him. Nothing equal to the rage of this phrenetic man, who was not satisfied with exhaling his fury in horrid declamations, but who was putting all in practice. He raised his excesses to the height by inveighing against the vow of chastity, and by marrying publicly Catherine de Bore, a nun, whom he coaxed with eight others from their convents. He had prepared the minds of the people for this infamous proceeding by a treatise which he entitled 'Examples of the Papist al Doctrine and Theology,' in which he condemns the saints which all the saints had given to continence. He led at length quietly enough, in 1546, at Isleben, his country-place:—God reserving the terrible effects of his vengeance to another life.

Cramer, who perished at the stake, these fanatic religious proclaim as an example of 'divine vengeance;' at Luther, the true parent of the Reformation, 'died justly enough at Ialeben;' this must have puzzled their sense of reasoning; but they extricate themselves out of the dilemma by the usual way. Their curses are never that the lawyers call 'lapsed legacies.'

MANUSCRIPTS AND BOOKS.

It would be no uninteresting literary speculation to describe the difficulties which some of our most favourite writers encountered in their manuscript state, and even after they had passed through the press. Sterne, when he had finished his first and second volumes of Tristram Shandy, offered them to a bookseller at York for fifty pounds; but was refused: he came to town with his MSS; and he and Robert Dodsley agreed in a manner of which neither repented.

The Rocinade, with all its merit, lay for a considerable time in a dormant state, till Churchill and his publisher became impatient, and almost hopeless of success.—Bar's Justice was disposed of by its author, who was weary of soliciting booksellers to purchase the MS for a pile, and which now yields an annual income. Collins sent his MS before the door of his publisher.—The publication of Dr Blair's Sermons was refused by Strahan, and the Essay on the Immutability of Truth, by Dr Beattie, could find no publisher, and was printed by two friends of the author, at their joint expense.

'The sermon in Tristram Shandy' (says Sterne, in his preface to his Sermons) 'was printed by itself some years ago, but could find neither purchasers nor readers.' When it was inserted in his eccentric work, it met with a most favourable reception, and occasioned the others to be collected.

Joseph Warton writes, 'When Gray published his exquisite Ode on Eton College, his first publication, little price was taken of it.' The Polyeucte of Corneille, which is now accounted to be his master-piece, when he read it to the literary assembly held at the Hotel de Rambouillet, was not approved. Voiture came the next day, and in gentle terms acquainted him with the unfavourable opinion of the critics. Such ill judges were then the most formidable wits of France.

It was with great difficulty that Mrs Centlivre could get her 'Busy Body' performed. Wilks threw down his part with an oath of detestation: our comic authoress fell on her knees and wept.—Her tears, and not her wit, prevailed.

A pamphlet published in the year 1738, entitled 'A letter to the Society of Booksellers, on the Method of forming a true Judgment of the Manuscripts of Authors,' contains some curious literary intelligence, and is as follows:—

'We have known books,' says our writer, 'that in the end have been damned, as well as others which seemed to us, since, after their appearance in the world, they have been long by neglected. Witness the "Paradise Lost" of the famous Milton, and the Optics of Sir Isaac Newton, which last, his said, had no character or credit here till noticed in France. "The Historical Connection of the Old and New Testament," by Shuckford, is also reported, to have been seldom inquired after for about a twelve-month's time; however it made a shift, though not without some difficulty, to creep up to a second edition, and afterwards even to a third. And, which is another remarkable instance, the manuscript of Dr Prideaux's "Connection" is well known to have been bandied about from hand to hand, among several, at least five or six of the most eminent booksellers, during the space of at least ten years, to no purpose, none of them undertaking to print that excellent work. It lay in obscurity, till Archdeacon Leake, the author's friend, strongly recommended it to the public. It was purchased, and the publication was very successful. Robinson Crusoe's manuscript also ran through the whole trade, nor would any one print it, though a writer, De Foe, was in good repute as an author. A bookseller at last not remarkable for his discernment, engaged for his speculative turn, engaged in this publication, and the bookseller got above a thousand guineas by it; and the booksellers are accumulating money every hour by means of this work in all shapes. The undertaker of the translation of Rapin, after a very considerable part of the work had been published, was not a little dubious of its success, and was strongly inclined to drop the design. It proved at last to be a most profitable literary adventure. It is, perhaps, useful to record, that while the fine compositions of genius and the elaborate labours of erudition are doomed to encounter these obstacles to fame, and never are but slightly remunerated, works of another description are rewarded in the most princely manner; at the recent sale of a bookseller, the copyright of 'Vyse's Spelling-book' was sold at the enormous price of 12,200; with an annuity of 50 guineas to the author!

THE TURKISH SPY.

Whatever may be the defects of the 'Turkish Spy,' the author has shown one uncommon merit, by having opened a new species of composition, which has been pursued by other writers with inferior success, if we except the charming 'Persian Letters' of Montesquieu. The 'Turkish Spy' is a book which has delighted us in our childhood, and to which we can still recur with pleasure. But its ingenious author is unknown to three parts of his admirers.

In Boswell's 'Life of Johnson' is this dialogue concerning the writer of the 'Turkish Spy.' 'B. Pray, Sir, is the "Turkish Spy" a genuine book? J. No, Sir. Mrs Manley in her "Life" says, that her father wrote the two first volumes; and in another book—"Dunton's Life and Errors," we find that the rest was written by one Sauls at two guineas a sheet, under the direction of Dr Midgeley.'

I do not know on what authority Mrs Manley advances that her father was the author; but this lady was never nice in detailing facts. Dunton, indeed, gives some information in a very loose manner. He tells us, p. 242, that it is probable, by reasons which he insinuates, that one Bradshaw, a hackney author, was the writer of the 'Turkish Spy.' This man probably was engaged by Dr Midgeley to translate the volumes as they appeared at the rate of 40s per sheet. On the whole, all this proves, at least, how little the author was known while the volumes were publishing, and that he is as little known at present by the extract from Boswell.

The ingenious writer of the Turkish Spy is John Paul Marana, an Italian: so that the Turkish Spy is just as real a personage as Cid Hamet, from whom Cervantes says he had his 'History of Don Quixote.' Marana had been imprisoned for a political conspiracy; after his release he retired to Monaco, where he wrote the 'History of the Plot,' which is said to be valuable for many curious particulars. Marana was at once a man of letters and of the world. He had long wished to reside at Paris; in that assemblage of taste and luxury his talents procured him patrons. It was during his residence there that he produced his 'Turkish Spy.' By this ingenious contrivance he gave the history of the last age. He discovers a rich memory, and a lively imagination; but critics have said that he touches every thing, and penetrates nothing. His first three volumes greatly pleased: the rest are inferior. Plutarch, Seneca, and Pliny, were his favourite authors. He lived in a philosophical mediocrity; and in the last years of his life retired to his native country, where he died in 1693.

Charpentier gave the first particulars of this ingenious man. Even in his time the volumes were read as they came out, while its author remained unknown. Charpentier's proof of the author is indisputable; for he preserved the following curious certificate, written in Marana's own hand-writing.

'I, the under-written John Paul Marana, author of a manuscript Italian volume, intitled, 'L'Esploratore Turco, tome terzo,' acknowledge that Mr Charpentier, appointed by the Lord Chancellor to revise the said manuscript, has not granted me his certificate for printing the said manuscript, but on condition to rescind four passages. The first beginning, &c. By this I promise to suppress from the said manuscript the places above marked, so that there shall remain no vestige; since, without agreeing to this, the said certificate would not have been granted to me by the said Mr Charpentier; and for surety of the above, which I acknowledge to be true, and which I promise punctually to execute, I have signed the present writing. Paris, 28th September, 1688.

JOHN PAUL MARANA.'

This paper serves as a curious instance in what manner the censors of books clipped the wings of genius when it was found too daring or excurive.

These rescindings of the Censor appear to be marked by Marana in the printed work. We find more than once, chasms with these words: 'the beginning of this letter is wanting in the Italian translation; the original paper being torn.'

No one has yet taken the pains to observe the dates of the first editions of the French and the English Turkish Spies, which would settle the disputed origin. It appears by the document before us, to have been originally written in Italian, but probably was first published in French. Does the English Turkish Spy differ from the French one?

SPENSER, JONSON, AND SHAKESPEARE.

The characters of these three great masters of English poetry are sketched by Fuller, in his 'Worthies of England.' It is a literary morsel that must not be passed by. The criticisms of those who lived in or near the times when authors flourished merit our observation. They sometimes elicit a ray of intelligence, which later opinions do not always give.

He observes on Spenser.—the many Chaucerisms used (for I will not say affected by him) are thought by the ignorant to be blemishes, known by the learned to be beauties, to his book; which, notwithstanding, had been more saleable, if more conformed to our modern language.*

On Jonson.—His parts were not so ready to run of themselves, as able to answer the spur; so that it may be truly said of him, that he had an elaborate wit, wrought out by his own industry.—He would sit silent in learned company, and suck in (besides wine) their several humours into his observation. What was ore in others, he was able to refine himself.

He was paramount in the dramatic part of poetry, and taught the stage an exact conformity to the laws of comedians. His comedies were above the Volge (which are only tickled with downright obscenity), and took not so well at the first stroke as at the rebound, when beheld the second time; yea, they will endure reading so long as either ingenuity or learning are fashionable in our nation. If his latter be not so sprightly and vigorous as his first pieces, all that are old wit, and all who desire to be old should excuse him therein.

On Shakspeare.—He was an eminent instance of the truth of that rule, poeta non fit, sed nascitur; one is not made, but born a poet. Indeed his learning was but very little; so that as Cornish diamonds are not polished by any lapidary, but are pointed and smoothed, even as they are taken out of the earth, so Nature itself was all the art which was used upon him.

Many were the wit-combats betwixt him and Ben Jonson, which two I behold like a Spanish great galleon, and an English man-of-war. Master Jonson (like the former) was built far higher in learning; solid, but slow in his performances. Shakspeare, with an English man-of-war, lesser in bulk, but lighter in sailing, could turn with all tides, and take advantage of all winds, by the quickness of his wit and invention.

Had these 'Wit-combats,' between Shakspeare and Jonson, which Fuller notices, been chronicled by some faithful Boswell of the age, our literary history would have received an interesting accession. A letter has been published by Dr Berkenhout relating to an evening's conversation between our great rival bards, and Alleyn the actor. Peele, a dramatic poet, writes to his friend Marlow, another poet. The Doctor unfortunately in giving this copy did not recollect his authority.

*Friend Marlow,

'I never longed for thy company more than last night: we were all very merry at the Globe, where Ned Alleyn did not scruple to affirm pleasantly to thy friend Will, that he had stolen his speech about the qualities of an actor's excellency in Hamlet his Tragedy, from conversations manifold which had passed between them, and opinyons given by Alleyn touching this subject. Shakspeare did not take this talk in good sort; but Jonson put an end to the strife, by wittily remarking:—this affaire needeth no contention: you stole it from Ned no doubt; do not marvel; have you not seen him act times out of number?'

This letter is not genuine, but one of those ingenious forgeries which the late George Stevens practised on the literary antiquary; they were not always of this innocent cast. It has been frequently quoted as an original document. I have preserved it as an example of Literary For- geries, and the danger which literary historians incur by such dangerous practices.

BEN JONSON, FELTHAM, AND RANDOLPH.

Ben Jonson, like most celebrated wits, was very unfortunate in conciliating the affections of his brother wits. He certainly possessed a great share of arrogance, and was desirous of ruling the realms of Parnassus with a despotic sceptre. That he was not always successful in his theatrical compositions, is evident from his abusing, in their title-page, the actors and the public. In this he has been imitated by Fielding. I have collected the following three satiric odes, written when the reception of his 'New Inn, or The Light Heart,' warmly exasperated the irritable disposition of our poet.

He printed the title in the following manner:

'New Inn, or The Light Heart, a Comedy never acted, but most negligently played by some, the King's servants; and more squeamishly beheld and censured by others, the King's subjects, 1625. Now at last set at liberty to the readers, his Majesty's servants and subjects, to be judged 1631.'

At the end of the play he published the following Ode in which he threatens to quit the stage for ever; and turn at once a Horace, an Anacreon, and a Pindar.

'The just indignation the author took at the vulgar course of his play, begat this following Ode to himself:

'Come, leave the loathed stage,
And the more loathsome age;
Where pride and impudence (in fashion knid)
Usurp the chair of wit!
Inditing and arraigning every day
Something they call a play.
Let their fastidious, vaine
Commission of braine
Run on, and rage, sweat, censure, and condemn;
They were not made for thee,—leas thou for them.

'Say that thou pour'st them wheat,
And they will scorn eat:
'Twere simply fury, still, thyself to waste
On such as have no taste!
To offer them a surfeit of pure bread,
Whose appetites are dead!
No, give them graines their fill,
Husks, draff, to drink and swill.
If they love leas, and leave the lusty wine,
Envy them not their palate with the swine.

'No doubt some mouldy tale
Like Pericles,* and stale
As the shrieve's crusts, and nasty as his fish-Scraps, out of every dish
Thrown furth, and rak't into the common-tub,
May keep up the play-club;
There sweepings do as well
As the best order'd meals.
Foy who the relish of these guests will fit,
Needs set them but the almes-basket of wit.

'And much good do't you them,
Brave plush and velvet men
Can feed on oats, and safe in your stage clothes,
Dare quit, upon your oathes,
The stagers, and the stage-wrights too (your poet
Of larding your large ears
With their foul comic socks,
Wrought upon twenty blocks:
Which, if they're torn, and turn'd, and patch'd enough
The gamesters share your guilt, and you their stuff.

'Leave things so prostitute,
And take the Alceick lute,
Or thyns own Horace, or Anacreon's lyre;
Warm thee by Pindar's fire;
And, tho' thy nerves be shrunk, and blood be cold
Ere years have made thee old,
Strike that disdainful heat
Throughout, to their defeat;
As curious fools, and envious of thy strain,
May, blushing, swear no paly's in thy brain.†

* This play, Langbaine says, is written by Shakspeare.
† He had the paly at that time

'But when they hear thee sing
The glories of thy King,
His zeal to God, and his just awe o'er men;
They may blood-shaken then,
Feel such a flesh-quake to possess their powers,
As they shall cry like ours,
Is sound of peace, or war,
No harp ere hit the stars,
In tuning forth the acts of his sweet reign,
And raising Charles his chariot 'bove his wain.'

This Magisterial Ode, as Langbaine calls it, was answered by Owen Feltham, author of the admirable 'Re-solves,' who has written with great satiric acerbity the worst courtious. His character of this poet should be attended to:—

An Answer to the Ode, Come leave the loathed Stage, &c.

'Come leave this sawcy way
Of baiting those that pay
Dear for the sight of your declaiming wit:
'Tis known it is not fit
That a sale poet, just contempt once thrown,
Should cry up thus his own.
I wonder by what dower,
Or patent, you had power
From all to rape a judgment. Let 't suffice,
Had you been modest, y' ad been granted wise.

'Tis known you can do well,
And that you do excell
As a translator; but when things require
A genius, and fire,
Not kindled heretofore by other pains,
As oft y'ave wanted brains
And art to strike the white,
As you have levell'd right:
Yet if seen rough not things apocryphal,
You bellow, rave, and spatter round your gall.

Jug, Pierce, Peek, Fly,* and all
Your jests so nominal,
Are things so far beneath an able brain,
As they do throw a stain
Thro' all th' unlikely plot, and to displease
As deep as Pericles,
Where yet there is not laid
Before a chamber-maid
Discourse so weight'd,† as might have serv'd of old
For schools, when they of love and valour told.

'Why rage, then? when the show Should judgment be, and knowledge, there are pluck who scorn to drudge
For stages, yet can judge
Not only poets' looser lines, but wits,
And all their perquisites;
A gift as rich as high
Is noble poeise;
Yet, tho' in sport it be for King's a play,
'Tis next mechanicks' when it works for pay.

'Alcæus lute had none,
Nor loose Anacreon
E'er taught so bold assuming of the bays
When they deserv'd no praise.
To rail men into approbation
Is new to your's alone:
And prospers not: for know,
Fame is as coy, as you
Can be disdainful; and who dares to prove
A rape on her shall gather scorn,—not love.

'Leave then, this humour vain,
And this more humorous strain,
Where self-conceit, and choler of the blood
Eclipse what else is good:
Then, if you please those raptures high to touch,
Whereof you boast so much:
And but forbear your crown
Till the world puts it on:

* The names of several of Jonson's Dramatis Personæ.

† New Inn, Act III, Scene 2.—Act IV, Scene 4.

This break was purposely designed by the poet, to expose backwardness to Ben's third stanza.

No doubt, from all you may amazement draw,
Since braver themes no Phœbus ever saw.'

To console dejected Ben for this just reprimand, Randolph, one of the adopted poetical sons of Jonson, addressed him with all that warmth of grateful affection which a man of genius should have felt on the occasion.

An Answer to Mr Ben Jonson's Ode, to persuade him not to leave the stage.

I.

'Ben, do not leave the stage
Cause 'tis a loathsome age;
For pride and impudence will grow too bold,
When they shall hear it told
They frighted thee; Stand high, as in thy cause;
Their hims is thy applause:
More just were thy disdain,
Had they approved thy vein:
So thou for them, and they for thee were born,
They to incense, and thou as much to scorn.

II.

'Wilt thou engross thy store
Of wheat, and pour no more,
Because their bacon-brains had such a taste
As more delight in mast:
No! set them forth a board of dainties, full
As thy best muse can cull;
Whilst they the while do pine
And thirst, midst all their wine.
What greater plague can hell itself devise,
Than to be willing thus to tantalize?

III.

Thou canst not find them stuff,
That will be bad enough
To please their palates: let 'em then refuse,
For some pye-corner muse;
She is too fair an hostess, 'twere a sin
For them to like thine Inn:
'Twas made to entertain
Guests of a nobler strain;
Yet, if they will have any of the store,
Give them some scraps, and send them from thy door.

IV.

'And let those things in plush
Till they be taught to blush,
Like what they will, and more contented be
With what Broom* swept from thee.
I know thy worth, and that thy lofty strains
Write not to cloaths, but brains:
But thy great spleen doth rise,
'Cause moles will have no eyes:
This only in my Ben I faulty find,
He's angry they'll not see him that are blind.

V.

'Why shou'd the scene be mute
'Cause thou canst touch the lute
And string thy Horace? Let each Muse of name Claim thee, and say, th'art mine.
'Twere fond, to let all other flames expire,
To sit by Pindar's fire:
For by so strange neglect
I should myself suspect
Thy paley† were as well thy brain's disease,
If they could shake thy muse which way they please.

VI.

'And tho' thou well canst sing,
The glories of thy King,

* His man, Richard Broom, wrote with success several comedies. He had been the amanuensis or attendant of Jonson. The epigram made against Pope for the assistance W. Broom gave him, appears to have been borrowed from this pun. Jonson has inserted it in 'Broom's Life.'

† He had the palsy at that time.

And on the wings of verse his chariot bear
 To heaven, and fix it there;
 Yet let thy muse as well some raptures raise
 To please him, as to praise.
 I would not have thee chuse
 Only a treble muse;
 But have this envious, ignorant age to know,
 Thou that canst sing so high, canst reach as low.'

ARIOSTO AND TASSO.

It surprises one to find among the literary Italians the merits of Ariosto most keenly disputed: slaves to classical authority they bend down to the majestic regularity of Tasso. Yet the father of Tasso, before his son had rivalled the romantic Ariosto, describes in a letter the effect of the 'Orlando' on the people:—'There is no man of learning, no mechanic, no lad, no girl, no old man, who are satisfied to read the "Orlando Furioso" once. This poem serves as the solace of the traveller, who fatigued on his journey deceives his lassitude by chaunting some octaves of this poem. You may hear them sing these stanzas in the streets and in the fields every day.' One would have expected that Ariosto would have been the favourite of the people, and Tasso of the critics. But in Venice the gondoliers and others, sing passages which are generally taken from Tasso, and rarely from Ariosto. A different fate, I imagined, would have attended the poet who has been distinguished by the epithet of 'The Divine.' I have been told by an Italian man of letters, that this circumstance arose from the relation which Tasso's poem bears to Turkish affairs; as many of the common people have passed into Turkey, either by chance or by war. Besides that the long antipathy existing between the Venetians and the Turks, gave additional force to the patriotic poetry of Tasso. We cannot boast of any similar poems. Thus it was that the people of Greece and Ionia sung the poems of Homer.

The Academia della Crusca gave a public preference to Ariosto. This irritated certain critics, and none more than Chapelain, who could taste the regularity of Tasso, but not feel the 'brave disorder' of Ariosto. He could not approve of those writers,

'Who snatch a grace beyond the reach of art.'

'I thank you,' he writes, 'for the sonnet which your indignation dictated, at the Academy's preference of Ariosto to Tasso. This judgment is overthrown by the confessions of many of the Cruscani, my associates. It would be tedious to enter into its discussion; but it was passion and not equity that prompted that decision. We confess, that as to what concerns invention and purity of language, Ariosto has eminently the advantage over Tasso; but majesty, pomp, numbers, and a style truly sublime, united to a regularity of design, raise the latter so much above the other that no comparison can fairly exist.

What Chapelain says is perhaps just; though I did not know that Ariosto's language was purer than Tasso's.

Dr Cocchi, the great Italian critic, compared 'Ariosto's poem to the richer kind of Harlequin's habit, made up of pieces of the very best silke and of the liveliest colours. The parts of it are many of them more beautiful than in Tasso's poem, but the whole in Tasso is without comparison more of a piece and better made.' The critic was extricating himself as safely as he could out of this critical dilemma; for the disputes were then so violent, that I think one of the disputants took to his bed, and was said to have died of Ariosto and Tasso.

It is the conceit of an Italian to give the name of April to Ariosto, because it is the season of flowers; and that of September to Tasso, which is that of fruits. Tiraboschi judiciously observes, that no comparison ought to be made between these great rivals. It is comparing 'Ovid's Metamorphoses' with 'Virgil's Æneid;' they are quite different things. In his characters of the two poets, he distinguishes between a romantic poem and a regular epic. Their designs required distinct perfections. But an English reader is not enabled by the wretched versions of Hoole, to echo the verse of La Fontaine, 'Je chers L'Arioste et J'estime Le Tasse.

Boileau, some time before his death, was asked by a critic, if he had repented of his celebrated decision concerning the merits of Tasso, whom some Italians had compared with those of Virgil; this had awakened the vengeance of Boileau, who hurled his bolts at the violators of classical majesty. It is supposed that he was ignorant of the Italian language, but by some expressions in his following answer, we may be led to think that Boileau was not ignorant of Italian.

I have so little changed my opinion, that on a recent late of Tasso, I was sorry that I had not more explained myself on this subject in some of my reflections on "Longinus." I should have begun, by acknowledging that Tasso had a sublime genius, of great compass, and happy dispositions for the higher poetry. But when came to the use he made of his talents, I should have shown that judicious discernment rarely prevailed in his work. That in the greater part of his narrations he attached himself to the agreeable oftener than to the just. That his descriptions are almost always overcharged with superfluous ornaments. That in painting the strongest passions, and the midst of the agitation they excite, frequently he degenerates into witticisms, which abruptly destroy the pathetic. That he abounds with images of too florid a kind affected turns; conceits and frivolous thoughts; which far from being adapted to his Jerusalem, could hardly be supportable in his 'Aminta.' So that all this, opposed to the gravity, the sobriety, the majesty of Virgil, what is butinsel compared with gold?

It must be acknowledged that this passage, which is to be found in the Histoire de l'Academie, t. II, p. 276, may serve as an excellent commentary on our poet's well-known censure. The merits of Tasso are exactly discriminated, and this particular criticism must be valuable to the lovers of poetry. The errors of Tasso, were, however, substantial.

An anonymous gentleman has greatly obliged me with an account of the recitation of these two poets by the gondoliers of Venice, extracted from his travelling pocket book.

VENICE.

In Venice the gondoliers know by heart long passages from Ariosto and Tasso, and often chant them with a peculiar melody. But this talent seems at present on the decline:—at least, after taking some pains, I could find more than two persons who delivered to me in this way passage from Tasso. Goldoni in his life, however, notes the gondolier returning with him to the city: 'he turns the prow of the gondola towards the city, singing all the way the twenty-sixth stanza of the sixteenth canto of Jerusalem Delivered.' The late Mr Barry once chanted me a passage of Tasso in the manner, as he assured me of the Gondoliers. But Lord Byron has recently told me that with the independence of Venice the song of the gondoliers has died away.

'In Venice Tasso's echoes are no more.'

There are always two concerned, who alternately sing the strophes. We know the melody eventually by Rousseau, to whose songs it is printed; it has properly no tedious movement, and is a sort of medium between canto fermo and the canto figurato; it approaches to the former by recitativel declamation, and to the latter by passages and course, by which one syllable is detained and embellished.

I entered a gondola by moonlight: one singer placed himself forwards, and the other aft, and thus proceeded to St Giorgio. One began the song: when he had ended the strophe the other took up the lay, and so continued to sing alternately. Throughout the whole of it, the same notes invariably returned, but, according to the subject-matter of the strophe, they laid a greater or a small stress, sometimes on one, and sometimes on another note and indeed changed the enunciation of the whole strophe as the object of the poem altered.

On the whole, however, their sounds were hoarse and screaming: they seemed, in the manner of all rude and uncivilized men, to make the excellency of their singing the force of their voice: one seemed desirous of conquering the other by the strength of his lungs, and so far from receiving delight from this scene (shut up as I was in the box of the gondola,) I found myself in a very unpleasant situation.

My companion, to whom I communicated this circumstance, being very desirous to keep up the credit of his countrymen, assured me that this singing was very delightful when heard at a distance. Accordingly we went out upon the shore, leaving one of the singers in the gondola, while the other went to the distance of some hundred bed paces. They now began to sing against one another, and I kept walking up and down between them both, so as always to leave him who has to begin his part. Frequently stood still and hearkened to the one and to the other.

Here the scene was properly introduced. The strong declamatory, and, as it were, shrieking sound, met the ear from far, and called forth the attention; the quickly succeeding transitions, which necessarily required to be sung in a lower tone, seemed like plaintive strains succeeding the vociferations of emotion or of pain. The other, who listened attentively, immediately began where the former left off, answering him in milder or more vehement notes, according as the purport of the strophe required. The sleepy canals, the lofty buildings, the splendour of the moon, the deep shadows of the few gondolas that moved like spirits hither and thither, increased the striking peculiarity of the scene, and amidst all these circumstances it was easy to confess the character of this wonderful harmony.

It suits perfectly well with an idle solitary mariner, lying at length in his vessel at rest on one of these canals, waiting for his company, or for a fare: the tiresomeness of which situation is somewhat alleviated by the songs and poetical stories he has in memory. He often raises his voice as loud as he can, which extends itself to a vast distance over the tranquil mirror, and as all is still around, he is as it were in a solitude in the midst of a large and populous town. Here is no rattling of carriages, no noise of foot passengers: a silent gondola glides now and then by him, of which the splashing of the oars are scarcely to be heard.

At a distance he hears another, perhaps utterly unknown to him. Melody and verse immediately attach the two strangers: he becomes the responsive echo to the former, and exerts himself to be heard as he had heard the other. By a tacit convention they alternate verse for verse; though the song should last the whole night through, they entertain themselves without fatigue; the hearers, who are passing between the two, take part in the amusement.

This vocal performance sounds best at a great distance, and is then inexpressibly charming, as it only fulfils its design in the sentiment of remoteness. It is plaintive, but not dismal in its sound, and at times it is scarcely possible to refrain from tears. My companion, who otherwise was not a very delicately organised person, said quite unexpectedly: è singolare come quel canto intenerisce, e molto più quando lo cantano meglio.

It was told that the women of Libo, the long row of islands that divides the Adriatic from the Lagunes, particularly the women of the extreme districts of Malamocua and Palestina, sing in like manner the works of Tasso to these and similar tunes.

They have the custom, when their husbands are fishing out at sea, to sit along the shore in the evenings and vociferate these songs, and continue to do so with great violence, till each of them can distinguish the responses of her own husband at a great distance.

How much more delightful and more appropriate does this song show itself here, than the call of a solitary person uttered far and wide, till another equally disposed shall hear and answer him! It is the expression of a vehement and hearty longing, which is yet every moment near to the happiness of satisfaction.

BAYLE.

Few philosophers were more deserving of the title than Bayle. His last hour exhibits the Socratic intrepidity with which he encountered the formidable approach of death. I have seen the original letter of the bookseller Leers, where he describes the death of our philosopher. 'On the evening preceding his decease, having studied all day, he gave my corrector some copy of his "Answer to Jacquetot," and told him that he was very bad. At nine in the morning his landress entered his chamber; he asked her, with a dying voice, if his fire was kindled? and a few moments after he died.' His disease was an hereditary consumption, and his decline must have been gradual; speaking had become with him a great pain; but he laboured with the same tranquillity of mind to his last hour; and, with Bayle, it was death alone which could interrupt the printer.

The irritability of genius is forcibly characterised by this circumstance in his literary life. When a close friendship had united him to Jurieu, he lavished on him the most flattering eulogiums. He is the hero of his 'Republic of Letters.' Enmity succeeded to friendship; Jurieu is then continually quoted in his 'Critical Dictionary,' whenever an occasion offers to give instances of gross blunders, palpable contradictions, and inconclusive arguments. These inconsistent opinions may be sanctioned by the similar conduct of a Saint! St Jerome praised Rufinus as the most learned man of his age, while his friend; but when the same Rufinus joined his adversary, Origen, he called him one of the most ignorant!

As a logician Bayle had no superior: the best logician will, however, frequently deceive himself. Bayle made long and close arguments to show that La Motte le Vayer never could have been a preceptor to the king; but all his reasonings are overturned by the fact being given in the history of the Academy, by Pellisson.

Basnage said of Bayle, that he read much by his fingers. He meant that he ran over a book more than he read it; and that he had the art of always falling upon that which was most essential and curious in the book he examined.

There are heavy hours in which the mind of a man of letters is unbinged; when the intellectual faculties lose all their elasticity, and when nothing but the simplest actions are adapted to their enfeebled state. At such hours it is recorded of the Jewish Socrates, Moses Mendelssohn, that he would stand at his window, and count the tiles of his neighbour's house. An anonymous writer has told of Bayle, that he would frequently wrap himself in his cloak, and hasten to places where mountebanks resorted; and that this was one of his chief amusements. He is surprised that so great a philosopher should delight in so trifling an object. This observation is not injurious to the character of Bayle; it only proves that the writer himself was no philosopher.

The Monthly Reviewer, in noticing this article, has continued the speculation, by giving two interesting anecdotes. 'The observation concerning "heavy hours," and the want of elasticity in the intellectual faculties of men of letters, when the mind is fatigued, and the attention blunted by incessant labour, reminds us of what is related by persons who were acquainted with the late sagacious magistrate Sir John Fielding; who, when fatigued with attending to complicated cases, and perplexed with discordant depositions, used to retire to a little closet in a remote and tranquil part of the house, to rest his mental powers, and sharpen perception. He told a great physician, now living who complained of the distance of places, as caused by the great extension of London, that "he (the physician) would not have been able to visit so many patients to any purpose, if they had resided nearer to each other; as he could have had no time either to think, or to rest his mind."'

Our excellent logician was little accustomed to a mixed society; his life was passed in study. He had such an infantine simplicity in his nature, that he would speak on anatomical subjects before the ladies with as much freedom as before surgeons. When they inclined their eyes to the ground, and while some even blushed, he would then inquire if what he spoke was indecent? and, when told so, he smiled and stopped. His habits of life were, however, extremely pure; he probably left himself little leisure 'to fall into temptation.'

Bayle knew nothing of geometry, and as Le Clerc informs us, acknowledged that he could never comprehend the demonstration of the first problem in Euclid. Le Clerc, however, was a rival to Bayle; with greater industry and more accurate learning, but with very inferior powers of reasoning and philosophy. Both of these great scholars, like our Locke, were destitute of fine taste, and poetical discernment.

When Fagon, an eminent physician, was consulted on the illness of our student, he only prescribed a particular regimen, without the use of medicine. He closed his consultation by a compliment remarkable for its felicity. 'I ardently wish one could spare this great man all this constraint, and that it were possible to find a remedy as singular, as the merit of him for whom it is asked.'

Voltaire has said that Bayle confessed he would not have made his Dictionary exceed a folio volume, had he written only for himself and not for the booksellers. This Dictionary, with all its human faults, is a stupendous work, which must last with literature itself.

His other productions have claims on our attention: is it possible to read his 'Thoughts on Comets,' and complain of lassitude? His 'Nouvelles de la République des Let- tree,' are a model of periodical criticism, lively, neat, and full of that attic salt which gives a piquancy to the disquisitions of criticism. The mind of Bayle is always acute; but, what is still more engaging, it communicates entertainment. His sceptre of criticism is embellished by followers.

CERVANTES.

I find in the Segraisiana, thus authentic anecdote concerning the inimitable Cervantes.

Mr du Boulay accompanied the French ambassador to Spain, when Cervantes was yet alive. He has told me, that the ambassador one day complimented Cervantes on the great reputation he had acquired by his Don Quixote; and that Cervantes whispered in his ear, 'Had it not been for the Inquisition, I should have made my book much more entertaining.'

Cervantes, at the battle of Lepanto, was wounded and enslaved. He has given his own history in Don Quixote. He was known at the court of Spain, but he did not receive those favours which might have been expected; he was neglected. His first volume is the finest; and his design was to have finished there; but he could not resist the importunities of his friends, who engaged him to make a second, which has not the same force, although it has many splendid passages.

We have lost many good things of Cervantes and other writers, because of the tribunal of religion and dulness.—One Aonius Palearius was sensible of this: and said, 'that the Inquisition was a poniard aimed at the throat of literature.' The image is striking, and the observation just; but the ingenious observer was in consequence immediately led to the stake.

MAGLIABECCHI.

Anthony Magliabechi, who died at the age of eighty, was celebrated for his great knowledge of books. He has been called the Helluo, or the Glutton of Literature, as Peter Comestor received this nick-name from his amazing voracity for food he could never digest; which appeared when having fallen sick of so much false learning, he threw it all up in his 'Sea of Histories,' which proved to be the history of all things, and a bad history of every thing. Magliabechi's character is singular; for though his life was wholly passed in libraries, being librarian to the duke of Tuscany, he never wrote himself. There is a medal which represents him sitting, with a book in one hand, and with a great number of books scattered on the ground. The candid inscription signifies, that 'it is not sufficient to become learned to have read much, if we read without reflection.' This is the only remains we have of his own composition that can be of service to posterity.—A simple truth, which may however be inscribed in the study of every man of letters.

His habits of life were uniform. Ever among his books, he troubled himself with no other concern whatever; and the only interest he appeared to take for any living thing was his spiders; for whom, while sitting among his literary piles, he affected great sympathy; and perhaps contemptuously, to those whose curiosity appeared impertinent, he frequently cried out, 'to take care not to hurt his spiders!' Although he lost no time in writing himself, he gave considerable assistance to authors who consulted him. He was himself an universal index to all authors. He had one book among many others, dedicated to him, and this dedication consisted of a collection of titles of works which he had had at different times dedicated to him, with all the eulogiums addressed to him in prose and verse.—When he died, he left his vast collection of books for the public use; they now compose the public library of Florence.

Heyman, a celebrated Dutch professor, visited this erudite librarian, who was considered as the ornament of Florence. He found him amongst his books, of which the number was prodigious. Two or three rooms in the first story were crowded with them, not only along their sides, but piled in heaps on the floor; so that it was difficult to sit, and more so to walk. A narrow space was contrived, indeed, so that by walking sideways, you might extricate yourself from one room to another. This was not all; the passage below stairs was full of books, and the staircase from the top to the bottom was lined with them. When you reached the second story, you saw with astonishment three rooms, similar to those below, equally full, so crowded, that two good beds in these chambers were also crammed with books.

This apparent confusion did not, however, hinder Magliabechi from immediately finding the books he wanted. He knew them all so well, that even to the least of them it was sufficient to see its outside, to say what it was, and indeed he read them day and night, and never lost sight of any. He eat on his books, he slept on his books, he quitted them as rarely as possible. During his whole life he only went twice from Florence; once to see Fiesole, which is not above two leagues distant, and once some miles further by order of the Grand Duke. Nothing could be more simple than his mode of life; a few eggs, a little bread, and some water, were his ordinary food. A draught of his desk being open, Mr Heyman saw there some eggs, and some money which Magliabechi had placed there for his daily use. But as this drawer was generally open, it frequently happened that the servants of his friends or strangers who came to see him, pilfered some of the things; the money or the eggs.

His dress was as cynical as his repasts. A black doublet, which descended to his knees; large and long breeches, an old patched black cloak; an amorphous hat, very much worn, and the edges ragged; a large neckcloth of coarse cloth, begrimed with snuff; a dirty shirt, which he added to as long as it lasted, and which the broken elbow of his doublet did not conceal; and, to finish this inventory, a pair of ruffles which did not belong to the shirt. This was the brilliant dress of our learned Florentine; and such did he appear in the public streets, as well as in his own house. Let me not forget another circumstance, which warmed his hands, he generally had a stove with fire kindled to his arms, so that his clothes were generally singed and burnt, and his hands scorched. He had nothing of the wise remarkable about him. To literary men he was extremely affable, and a cynic only to the eye; anecdotes almost incredible are related of his memory. It is so, what uncommon that as he was so fond of literary food, he did not occasionally dress some dishes of his own invention, or at least some sandwiches to his own relish. He indeed should have written CURIOSITIES OF LITERATURE. He was a living Cyclopaedia, though a dark lantern.

Of such reading men, Hobbes entertained a very contemptible, if not a rash opinion. His own reading was inconsiderable, and he used to say, that if he had spent as much time in reading as other men of learning, he should have been as ignorant as they. He put little value on a large library, for he considered all books to be merely abstracts and copies, for that most authors were like sheep never deviating from the beaten path. History he treated lightly, and thought there were more lies than truths in it. But let us recollect after all this, that Hobbes was a mere metaphysician, idolising his own vain and empty hypotheses. It is true enough that weak heads carrying a series too much reading may be staggered. Le Clerc observed of two learned men, De Marciy and Bartholin, that they would have composed more useful works had they read less numerous authors, and digested the better writers.

ABRIDGERS.

The present article presents the history of Abridgers, a kind of literary men to whom the indolence of modern readers, and indeed the multiplicity of authors, gives ample employment.

It would be difficult, observe the learned Benedictines the authors of the Literary History of France, to relate all the unhappy consequences which ignorance introduced, and the causes which produced that ignorance. But we must not forget to place in this number the mode of reducing, by way of abridgment, what the ancients have written in bulky volumes. Examples of this practice may be observed in preceding centuries, but in the fifth century it began to be in general use. As the number of students and readers diminished, authors neglected literature, and were disgusted with composition; for to write is seldom done, but when the writer entertains the hope of finding readers. Instead of original authors, there suddenly arose numbers of Abridgers. These men, amidst the prevailing disgust for literature, imagined they should gratify the public by introducing a mode of reading works in a few hours, which otherwise could not be done in many months and, observing that the bulky volumes of the ancients lay buried in dust, without any one condescending to examine them, necessity inspired them, with an invention that might bring those works and themselves into public notice, by the care they took of renovating them. This they imagined to effect by forming abridgments of these ponderous volumes.

All these Abridgers, however, did not follow the same mode. Some contented themselves with making a mere abridgment of their authors, by employing their own expressions, or by inconsiderable alterations. Others formed abridgments in drawing them from various authors, but from whose works they only took what appeared to them most worthy of observation, and embellished them in their own style. Others again, having before them several authors who wrote on the same subject, took passages from each, united them, and thus formed a new work; they executed their design by digesting in common-places, and under various titles, the most valuable parts they could collect, from the best authors they read. To these last ingenious scholars we owe the rescue of many valuable fragments of antiquity. They fortunately preserved the best maxims, characters, descriptions, and curious matters which they had found interesting in their studies.

Some learned men have censured these Abridgers as the cause of our having lost so many excellent entire works of the ancients; for posterity becoming less studious was satisfied with these extracts, and neglected to preserve the originals, whose voluminous size was less attractive. Others, on the contrary, say that these Abridgers have not been so prejudicial to literature; and that had it not been for their care, which snatched many a perishable fragment from that shipwreck of letters which the barbarians occasioned, we should, perhaps, have had no works of the ancients remaining. Many voluminous works have been greatly improved by their Abridgers. The vast history of Trojans Pompeius was soon forgotten and finally perished, after the excellent epitome of it by Justin, who winnowed the abundant chaff from the grain.

Bayle gives very excellent advice to an Abridger, when he shows that Xiphilin, in his 'Abridgment of Dion,' takes no notice of a circumstance very material for entering into the character of Domitian:—the recalling the empress Domitia after having turned her away for her intrigues with a player. By omitting this fact in the abridgment, and which is discovered through Suetonius, Xiphilin has evinced, he says, a deficient judgment; for Domitian's ill qualities are much better exposed, when it is known that he was mean-spirited enough to restore to the dignity of empress the prostitute of a player.

Abridgers, Compilers, and Translators, are now alike regarded with contempt; yet to form their works with skill requires an exertion of judgment, and frequently of taste, of which their contempters appear to have no due conception. Such literary labours it is thought the learned will not be found to want; and the unlearned cannot discern the value. But to such Abridgers as Monsieur Le Grand, in his 'Tales of the Minstrels,' and Mr Ellis, in his 'English Metrical Romances,' we owe much; and such writers must bring to their task a congeniality of genius, and even more taste, than their originals possessed. I must compare such to fine etchers after great masters:—very few give the feeling touches in the right place.

It is an uncommon circumstance to quote the Scriptures on subjects of modern literature; but on the present topic the elegant writer of the books of the Maccabees has delivered in a kind of preface to that history, very pleasing and useful instruction to an Abridger. I shall transcribe the passages, being concise, from Book ii, Chap ii, v. 23, that the reader may have it at hand.—

'All these things,' I say, being declared by Jason, of Cyrene, in five books, we will assay to abridge in one volume. We will be careful that they that will read may have delight, and that they that are desirous to commit to memory might have ease, and that all into whose hands it comes might have profit. How concise and Horatian! He then describes his literary labours with no insensibility:—To us that have taken upon us this painful labour of abridging, it was not easy, but a matter of sweat and watching.—And the writer employs an elegant illustration: 'Even as it is no ease unto him that prepareth a banquet, and seeketh the benefit of others; yet for the pleasing if many, we will undertake gladly this great pain; leaving to the author the exact handling of every particular, and showing to follow the rules of an abridgment.' He now underlines his critical account with a sublime metaphor to distinguish the original from the copier:—For as the master builder of a new house must care for the whole building; but he that undertaketh to set it out, and point it, must seek out fit things to the adorning thereof; even so I think it is with us. To stand upon every point, and go over things at large, and to be curious in particulars, belongeth to the first author of the story; but to use brevity, and avoid much labouring of the work, is to be granted to him that will make an Abridgment.'

Quintilian has not a passage more elegantly composed, nor more judiciously conceived.

PROFESSORS OF PLAGIARISM AND OBSCURITY.

Among the most singular characters in literature may be ranked those who do not blush to profess publicly its most dishonourable practices. The first vender of printed sermons imitating manuscript was, I think, Dr Trueller. He to whom the following anecdotes relate had superior ingenuity. Like the famous orator Henley, he formed a school of his own. The present lecturer openly taught not to imitate the best authors, but to steal from them.

Richesource, a miserable declaimer, called himself 'Moderator of the Academy of Philosophical Orators.' He taught in what manner a person destitute of literary talents might become eminent for literature. He published the principles of his art under the title of 'The Mask of Orators; or the manner of disguising with ease all kinds of composition; briefs, sermons, panegyrics, funeral orations, dedications, speeches, letters, passages, &c.' I will give a notion of the work.—

The author very truly observes, that all who apply themselves to polite literature do not always find from their own funds a sufficient supply to ensure success. For such he labours; and teaches to gather, in the gardens of others, those fruits of which their own sterile grounds are destitute; but so artfully to gather, that the public shall not perceive their depredations. He dignifies this fine art by the title of Plagiarism, and he thus explains it:—

'The Plagiarism of orators is the art, or an ingenious and easy mode, which some adroitly employ to change, or disguise, all sorts of speeches of their own composition or of that of other authors, for their pleasure, or their utility; in such a manner that it becomes impossible even for the author himself to recognise his own work, his own genius, and his own style, so skilfully shall the whole be disguised.'

Our professor proceeds to inform us in what manner we are to manage the whole economy of the piece which is to be copied or disguised; and which consists in giving a new order to the parts, changing the phrases, words &c. An orator, for instance, having said that a plenipotentiary should possess three qualities,—probity, capacity and courage; the plagiarist, on the contrary, may employ courage, capacity, and probity. This is only for a general rule, for it is too simple to practise frequently. To render the part perfect we must make it more complex, by changing the whole of the expressions. The plagiarist in place of courage will put force, constancy, or vigour. For probity he may say religion, virtue or sincerity. Instead of capacity, he may substitute erudition, ability or science. Or he may disguise the whole by saying, that the plenipotentiary should be firm, virtuous, and able.

The rest of this uncommon work is composed of passages, extracted from celebrated writers, which are turned into a new manner by the plagiarist; their beauties, however, are never improved by their dress. Several celebrated writers when young, particularly the famous Flechier, who addressed verses to him, frequented the lectures of this professor!

Richesource became so zealous in the cause of literature, that he published a volume, entitled 'The Art of Writing and Speaking; or a method of composing all sorts of letters, and holding a polite conversation.' He concludes his preface by advertising his readers, that authors who may be in want of essays, sermons, letters of all kinds, written pleadings and verses, may be accommodated on application to him.

Our professor was extremely fond of copious title-pages; which I suppose to be very attractive to certain readers, for it is a custom which the Richesources of the day fail not to employ. Are there persons who value books by the length of their titles; as formerly the ability of a physician was judged by the size of his wig?

To this article may be added an account of another singular school, where the professor taught obscurity in literary composition!

I do not believe, says Charpentier, that those who are unintelligible are very intelligent. Quintilian has justly observed that the obscurity of a writer is generally in proportion to his incapacity. However, as there is hardly a defect which does not find partisans, the same author informs us of a Rhetorician, who was so great an admirer of obscurity, that he always exhorted his scholars to preserve it; and made them correct, as blemishes, those passages of their works which appeared to him too intelligible. Quintilian adds, that the greatest panegyric they could give to a composition in that school was to declare, 'I understand nothing of this piece.' Lycophron possessed this taste, and he protested that he would hang himself if he found a person who should understand his poem, called the 'Prophecy of Cassandra.' He succeeded so well, that this piece has been the stumbling block of all the grammarians, scholasts, and commentators; and remains inexplicable to the present day. Such works Charpentier admirably compares to those subterraneous places, where the air is so thick and suffocating that it extinguishes all torches. A most sophistical dilemma, on the subject of obscurity, was made by Thomas Anglus, or White, an English Catholic priest, the friend of Sir Kenelm Digby. This learned man frequently wandered in the mazes of metaphysical subtleties; and became perfectly unintelligible to his readers. When accused of this obscurity, he replied, 'Either the learned understand me or they do not. If they understand me, and find me in an error, it is easy for them to refute me; if they do not understand me, it is very unreasonable for them to exclaim against my doctrines.'

This is saying all that the wit of man can suggest in favour of obscurity! Many, however, will agree with an observation made by Gravina on the over-refinement of modern composition, 'that we do not think we have attained genius, till others must possess as much themselves to understand us.' Fontenelle, in France, followed by Marivaux, Thomas, and others, first introduced that subtilised manner of writing, which tastes more natural and simple reject; the source of such bitter complaints of obscurity.

LITERARY DUTCH.

Pere Bouhours seriously asks if a German can be a BEL ESPRIT? This concise query was answered by Kramer, in a ponderous volume, which bears for title, Vindicia nominis Germanici. This mode of refutation does not prove that the question was then so ridiculous as it was considered. The Germans of the present day, although greatly superior to their ancestors, are still distant from that acmé of taste which characterises the finished compositions of the French and the English authors. Nations display genius before they form taste; and in some of the productions of the modern Germans, it will be allowed that their imaginations are fertile and fervid; but perhaps the simple question of Bouhours still exists in its full force.

It was once the mode with English and French writers to dishonour them with the epithets of heavy, dull, and phlegmatic compilers, without taste, spirit, or genius; genuine descendants of the ancient Boetians, Crassaque suo aere nat.

Many ingenious performances have lately shown that this censure has now become unjust; and much more forcibly answer the sarcastic question of Bouhours than the thick quarto of Kramer.

Churchill finely says of genius, that it is independent of situation,

'And may hereafter even in Holland rise.'

Vondel, whom, as Marchand observes, the Dutch regard as their Æschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides, was a strange defective taste; the poet himself knew none of these originals, but he wrote on some patriotic subject, the sure way to obtain popularity. The greater part of his tragedies is drawn from the Scriptures; all badly chosen and unhappily executed. In his Deliverance of the Children of Israel one of his principal characters is the Divinity! In his Jerusalem destroyed we are disgusted with a tedious oration by the Angel Gabriel, who proves theologically, and his proofs extend through nine closely printed pages in quarto, that this destruction had been predicted by the prophets. And in the Lucifer of the same author, the subject is grossly scandalized by this haughty spirit becoming stupidly in love with Eve, and it is for her he causes the rebellion of the evil angels, and the fall of our first parents. Poor Vondel kept a hosier's shop, which he left to the care of his wife, while he indulged his poetical genius. His stocking shop failed, and his poems produced him more chagrin than glory; for in Holland even a patriotic poet, if a bankrupt, would, no doubt, be accounted by his fellow-citizens as a madman. Vondel had no other master but his genius, which, with his uncongenial situation, occasioned all his errors.

Another Dutch poet is even less tolerable. Haver been written a long rhapsody concerning Pyramus and Thisbe he concludes it by a ridiculous parallel between the deaths of these unfortunate victims of love, and the passion of Jesus Christ. He says,

Om t'concluderem van onsen begrypt,
Dees Historie moraliserende,
Is in den verstande wel accorderende,
By der Passie van Christus gebenedyt.

And upon this, after having turned Pyramus into the son of God, and Thisbe into the Christian soul, he proceeds with a number of comparisons; the latter always more pertinent than the former.

I believe it is well known that the actors on the Dutch theatre are generally tradesmen, who quit their aprons the hour of public representation. This was the fact when I was in Holland forty years ago. Their comedies are offensive by the grossness of their buffooneries. One of the comic incidents was a miller appearing in distress for want of wind to turn his mill; he had recourse to the novel scheme of placing his back against it, and, by certain imitative sounds behind the scenes, the mill is soon set a-going. It is hard to rival such a depravity of taste.

I saw two of their most celebrated tragedies. The first was Gysbert Van Amstel, by Vondel; that is Gysbert of Amsterdam, a warrior, who in the civil wars preserved this city by his heroism. It is a patriotic historical play, and never fails to crowd the theatre towards Christmas, when it is usually performed successively. One of the acts concludes with a scene of a convent; the sound of warlike instruments is heard; the abbey is stormed; the nuns and fathers are slaughtered; with the aid of 'blatant derbuss and thunder,' every Dutchman appears sensible of the pathos of the poet. But it does not here conclude. After this terrible slaughter, the conquerors and the vanquished remain for ten minutes on the stage, silent and motionless, in the attitudes in which they happened to fall; and this pantomimic pathos is received with loud bursts of applause from the audience.

The other was the Ahasuerus of Schubart, or the Fall of Haman. In the triumphal entry the Batavian Mordocai was mounted on a genuine Flander's mare, that, fortunately, quietly received her applause with a lumpyish majesty resembling her rider. I have seen an English actress once introduced on our stage which did not act with decorum. Our late actors have frequently been beasts;—a Dutch taste!

Some few specimens of the best Dutch poetry which we have had yield no evidence in favour of the national poetical taste. The Dutch poet Katz has a poem on the 'Games of Children,' where all the games are moralized. I suspect the taste of the poet as well as his subject is pedestrian. When a nation has produced no works above mediocrity, with them a certain mediocrity is excellence, and their master-pieces, with a people who have made no greater progress in refinement, are but the works of a pupil.

THE PRODUCTIONS OF THE MIND NOT REIZABLE BY CREDITORS.

When Crebillon, the French tragic poet, published his Catiline, it was attended with an honour to literature, which, though it is probably forgotten (for it was only registered, I think, as the news of the day,) it becomes a collector zealous in the cause of literature to preserve. shall give the circumstance, the petition and the decree.

At the time Catiline was given to the public, the creditors of the poet had the cruelty to attach the produce of this piece, as well as the bookseller's, who had printed the tragedy, as at the theatre where it was performed. The poet, much irritated at these proceedings, addressed a petition to the king, in which he showed that it was a thing yet unknown, that it should be allowed to class amongst seizable effects the productions of the human mind; that if such a practice was permitted, those who had consecrated their vigils to the studies of literature, and who have made the greatest efforts to render themselves, by this means, useful to their country, would see themselves in the cruel predicament of not daring to publish works, otherwise precious and interesting to the state; that the greatest part of those who devote themselves to literature require for the necessities of life those succours which they have a right to expect from their labours; and that it never has been suffered in France to seize the fees of lawyers, and other persons of liberal professions.

In answer to this petition, a decree immediately issued from the King's council, commanding a reply of the arrests and seizures, of which the petitioner complained. This honourable decree was dated 21st May, 1749, and bore the following title: 'Decree of the Council of his Majesty, in favour of Mr Crebillon, author of the tragedy of Canina, which declares that the productions of the mind are not amongst seizable effects.'

Louis XV exhibits the noble example of bestowing a mark of consideration to the remains of a man of letters. This king not only testified his esteem of Crebillon by having his works printed at the Louvre, but also by consecrating to his glory a tomb of marble.

CRITICS.

Writers who have been unsuccessful in original composition have their other productions immediately decried, whatever merit they might once have been allowed to possess. Yet this is very unjust; an author who has given a wrong direction to his literary powers may perceive at length where he can more securely point them. Experience is as excellent a mistress in the school of literature, as in the school of human life. Blackmore's epics are insufferable; yet neither Addison nor Johnson erred when they considered his philosophical poem as a valuable composition. An indifferent poet may exert the art of criticism in a very high degree; and if he cannot himself produce an original work, he may yet be of great service in regulating the happier genius of another. This observation I shall illustrate by the characters of two French critics; the one is the Abbé d'Aubignac, and the other Chapelain.

Boileau opens his Art of Poetry by a precept which though it be common is always important; this critical poet declares, that 'It is in vain a daring author thinks of attaining to the height of Parnassus if he does not feel the secret influence of heaven, and if his natal star has not formed him to be a poet.' This observation he founded on the character of our Abbé, who had excellently written on the economy of dramatic composition. His Pratique du Theatre gained him an extensive reputation. When he produced a tragedy, the world expected a finished piece; it was acted, and reprobated. The author, however did not acutely feel its bad reception; he every where boasted that he, of all the dramatists, had most scrupulously observed the rules of Aristotle. The Prince de Guéméné, famous for his repartees, sarcastically observed, 'I do not quarrel with the Abbé d'Aubignac for having so closely followed the precepts of Aristotle; but I cannot pardon the precepts of Aristotle, that occasioned the Abbé d'Aubignac to write so wretched a tragedy.'

The Pratique du Theatre is not, however, to be despised, because the Tragedy of its author is despicable.

Chapelain's unfortunate epic has rendered him notorious. He had gained, and not undeservedly, great reputation for his critical powers. After a retention of above thirty years, his Pucelle appeared. He immediately became the butt of every unfledged wit, and his former works were eternally condemned! Inasmuch that when Camusat published, after the death of our author, a little volume of extracts from his manuscript letters, it is curious to observe the awkward situation in which he finds himself. In his preface he seems afraid that the very name of Chapelain will be sufficient to repel the reader.

Camusat observes of Chapelain, that 'He found flatterers who assured him his Pucelle ranked above the Æneid; and this Chapelain but feebly denied. However this may be, it would be difficult to make the bad taste which reigns throughout this poem agree with that sound and exact criticism with which he decided on the works of others. So true is it, that genius is very superior to a justness of mind which is sufficient to judge and to advise others.' Chapelain was ordered to draw up a critical list of the chief living authors and men of letters in France, for the king. It is extremely impartial, and performed with an analytical skill of their literary characters which could not have been surpassed by an Aristotle or a Boileau.

The talent of judging may exist separately from the power of execution. An amateur may not be an artist, though an artist should be an amateur. And it is for this reason that young authors are not to condemn the precepts of such critics as even the Abbé d'Aubignac, and Chapelain. It is to Walsh, a miserable versifier, that Pope stands indebted for the hint of our poetry then being deficient in correctness and polish; and it is from this fortunate hint that Pope derived his poetical excellence. Dionysius Halicarnassensis has composed a lifeless history; yet, as Gibbon, observes, how admirably has he judged the masters, and defined the rules of historical composition; Gravina, with great taste and spirit, has written on poetry and poets, but he composed tragedies which gave him no title to be ranked among them.

ANECDOTES OF AUTHORS CENSURED.

It is an ingenious observation made by a journalist of Trevoux, on perusing a criticism not ill written, which pretended to detect several faults in the compositions of Bruyere, that in ancient Rome the great men who triumphed amidst the applauses of those who celebrated their virtues, were at the same time compelled to listen to those who reproached them with their vices. This custom is not less necessary to the republic of letters than it was formerly to the republic of Rome. Without this it is probable that authors would be intoxicated with success, and would then relax in their accustomed vigour; and the multitude who took them for models would, for want of judgment, imitate their defects.

Sterne and Churchill were continually abusing the Reviewers, because they honestly told the one that obscenity was not wit, and obscurity was not sense; and the other, that dissonance in poetry did not excel harmony, and that his rhymes were frequently prose lines of ten syllables cut into verse. They applauded their happier efforts. Notwithstanding all this, it is certain that so little discernment exists amongst common writers, and common readers, that the obscenity and flippancy of Sterne, and the bawl verse and prosaic poetry of Churchill, were precisely the portions which they selected for imitation: the blemishes of great men are not the less blemishes, but they are unfortunately, the easiest parts for imitation.

Yet criticism may be too rigorous, and genius too sensible to its fairest attacks. Racine acknowledged that one of the severe criticisms he received had occasioned him more vexation than the greatest applauses had afforded him pleasure. Sir John Marsham, having published the first part of his 'Chronology,' suffered so much chagrin at the endless controversies which it raised (and some of his critics went so far as to affirm it was designed to be detrimental to Revelation,) that he burned the second part, which was ready for the press. Pope was observed to writhe with anguish in his chair, on hearing mentioned the letter of Cibber, with other temporary attacks; and it is said of Montesquieu, that he was so much affected by the criticisms, true and false, which he daily experienced, that they contributed to hasten his death. Raison's extreme irritability closed in lunacy, while his ignorant reviewers, in the shapes of assassins, were haunting his death-bed. In the preface to his 'Metrical Romances' he says: 'brought to an end in ill health and low spirits—certain to be insulted by a base and prostitute gang of lurking assassins who stab in the dark, and whose poisoned daggers he has already experienced.' Scott, of Amwell, never recovered from a ludicrous criticism, which I discovered had been written by a physician who never pretended to poetical taste.

Pelisson has recorded, in his History of the French Academy, a literary anecdote, which forcibly shows the danger of caustic criticism. A young man from a remote province came to Paris with a play, which he considered as a masterpiece. M. L'Etoile was more than just in his merciless criticism. He showed the youthful bard a thousand glaring defects in his chief d'œuvre. The humbled country author burnt his tragedy, returned home, took to his chamber, and died of vexation and grief. Of all unfortunate men, one of the unhappiest is a middling author endowed with too lively a sensibility for criticism. Athenæus, in his tenth book, has given us a lively portrait of this melancholy being. Anaxandrides appeared one day on horseback in the public assembly at Athens, to recite a dithyrambic poem, of which he read a portion. He was a man of fine stature, and wore a purple robe edged with golden fringe. But his complexion was sallow and melancholy, which was the cause that he never spared his own writings. Whenever he was vanquished by a rival, he immediately gave his compositions to the druggists to be cut into pieces, to wrap their articles in, without over caring to revise his writings. It is owing to this that he destroyed a number of pleasing compositions; age increased his sourness, and every day he became more and more dissatisfied at the awards of his auditors. Hence his 'Tereus,' because it failed to obtain the prize, has not reached us, which, with other of his productions, deserved preservation, though not to have been publicly crowned.

Bataux having been chosen by the French government for the compilation of elementary books for the Military School, is said to have felt their unfavourable reception so acutely, that he became a prey to excessive grief. It is believed that the lamentable death of Dr Hawkesworth was occasioned by a similar circumstance. Government had consigned to his care the compilation of the voyages that pass under his name—how he succeeded is well known. He felt the public reception so sensibly, that he preferred the oblivion of death to the mortifying recollections of life.

On this interesting subject Fontenelle, in his 'Eloge on Newton,' has made the following observation:—'Newton was more desirous of remaining unknown, than of having the calm of life disturbed by those literary storms which genius and science attract about those who rise to eminence. In one of his letters we learn that his Treatise on Optics being ready for the press, several premature objections which appeared, made him abandon its publication.—I should reproach myself (he said) for my imprudence, if I were to lose a thing so real as my ease to run after a shadow.' But this shadow he did not miss: it did not cost him the ease he so much loved, and it had for him as much reality as ease itself. I refer to Bayle, in his curious article 'Hipponax,' note r. To these instances we may add the fate of the Abbé Cassagne, a man of learning, and not destitute of talents. He was intended for one of the preachers at court; but he had hardly made himself known in the pulpit, when he was struck by the lightning of Boileau's muse. He felt so acutely the caustic verses, that they rendered him almost incapable of literary labour; in the prime of life he became melancholy, and shortly afterwards died insane. A modern painter, it is known, never recovered from the biting ridicule of a popular, but malignant wit. Cummins, a celebrated quaker, confessed he died of an anonymous letter in a public paper, which, said he, 'fastened on my heart, and threw me into this slow fever.' Racine, who died of his extreme sensibility to a rebuke, confessed that the pain which one severe criticism inflicted outweighed all the applause he could receive. The feathered arrow of an epigram has sometimes been wet with the heart's blood of its victim. Fortune has been lost, reputation destroyed, and every charity of life extinguished, by the inhumanity of inconsiderate wit.

Literary history records the fate of several who may be said to have died of Criticism. But there is more sense and infinite humour in the mode which Phædrus adopted to answer the cavillers of his age. When he first published his fables, the taste for conciseness and simplicity was so much on the decline, that they were both objected to him as faults. He used his critics as they deserved. To those who objected against the conciseness of his style, he tells a long tedious story (Lib. iii, Fab. 10, ver. 59.) and treats those who condemn the simplicity of his style with a run of bombast verses, that have a great many noisy elevated words in them, without any sense at the bottom—this in Lib. iv, Fab. 6.

VIRGINITY.

The writings of the Fathers once formed the studies of the learned. These labours abound with that subtlety of argument which will repay the industry of the inquisitive, and the antiquary may turn them over for pictures of the manners of the age. A favourite subject with Saint Ambrose was that of Virginity, on which he has several works; and perhaps he wished to revive the order of the vestals of ancient Rome, which afterwards produced the institution of Nuns. His 'Treatise on Virgins' is in three volumes. We learn from this work of the fourth century, the lively impressions his exhortations had made on the minds and hearts of girls, not less in the most distant provinces, than in the neighbourhood of Milan where he resided. The virgins of Bologna, amounting only, it appears, to the number of twenty, performed all kinds of needlework, not merely to gain their livelihood, but also to be enabled to perform acts of liberality, and exerted their industry to allure other girls to join the holy profession of Virginity. He exhorts daughters, in spite of their parents, and even their lovers, to consecrate themselves. 'I do not blame marriage,' he says; 'I only show the advantages of Virginity.'

He composed this book in so florid a style, that he considered it required some apology. A Religious of the Benedictines published a translation in 1689.

So sensible was Saint Ambrose of the rarity of the profession he would establish, that he thus combats his adversaries: 'They complain that human nature will be exhausted; but I ask who has ever sought to marry without finding women enough from amongst whom he might choose? What murder, or what war, has ever been occasioned for a virgin? It is one of the consequences of marriage to kill the adulterer, and to war with the ravisher.'

He wrote another treatise On the perpetual Virginity of the Mother of God. He attacks Bonosius on this subject, and defends her virginity, which was indeed greatly suspected by Bonosius, who, however, got nothing by this bold suspicion, but the dreadful name of Heretic. A third treatise was entitled Exhortation to Virginity; a fourth, On the Fate of a Virgin, is more curious. He relates the misfortunes of one Susannah, who was by no means a companion for her namesake; for, having made a vow of virginity, and taken the veil, she afterwards endeavoured to conceal her shame, but the precaution only tended to render her more culpable. Her behaviour, indeed, had long afforded ample food for the sarcasms of the Jews and the Pagans. Saint Ambrose compelled her to perform public penance, and after having declaimed on her double crime, gave her hopes of pardon, if, like 'Sœur Jeanne,' this early nun would sincerely repent; to complete her chastisement, he ordered her every day to recite the fiftieth psalm.

A GLANCE INTO THE FRENCH ACADEMY.

In the republic of Letters the establishment of an academy has been a favourite project; yet perhaps it is little more than an Utopian scheme. The united efforts of men of letters in Academies have produced little. It would seem that no man likes to bestow his great labours on a small community, for whose members he himself does not feel, probably, the most flattering partiality. The French Academy made a splendid appearance in Europe: yet when this society published their Dictionary, that of Furetiere's became a formidable rival; and Johnson did as much as the forty themselves. Voltaire confesses that the great characters of the literary republic were formed without the aid of academies.—'For what then,' he asks, 'are they necessary?'—'To preserve and nourish the fire which great geniuses have kindled. By observing the Junco at their meetings we may form some opinion of the indolent manner in which they trifled away their time. We are fortunately enabled to do this, by a letter in which Patru describes, in a very amusing manner the visit which Christina of Sweden took a sudden fancy to pay to the academy.'

The Queen of Sweden having resolved to visit the French Academy, gave so short a notice of her design, that it was impossible to inform the majority of the members of her intention. About four o'clock fifteen or sixteen academicians were assembled. Mr Gombaut, one of the members who did not know of the intended royal visit, and who had never forgiven her majesty because she did not relish his verses, thought proper to show his resentment by quitting the assembly.

She was received in a spacious hall. In the middle was a table covered with rich blue velvet, ornamented with a broad border of gold and silver. At its head was placed an arm-chair of black velvet embroidered with gold, and round the table were placed chairs with tapestry backs. The Chancellor had forgotten to hang in the hall the portrait of the queen, which she had presented to the Academy, and which was considered as a great omission. About five, a footman belonging to the Queen inquired if the company were assembled. Soon after, a servant of the king informed the chancellor that the queen was at the end of the street; and immediately her carriage drew up in the court-yard. The chancellor, followed by the rest of the members, went to receive her as she stepped out of her chariot; but the crowd was so great, that few of them could reach her majesty. Accompanied by the chancellor, she passed through the first hall, followed by one of her her, the captain of her guards, and one or two of her suite.

When she entered the Academy she approached the first, and spoke in a low voice to the chancellor. She then asked why Mr Menage was not there? and when she was told that he did not belong to the Academy, she asked why he did not? She was answered, that however he might merit the honour, he had rendered himself unworthy of it by several disputes he had had with its members. She then inquired aside of the chancellor whether the academicians were to sit or stand before her? On this the chancellor consulted with a member, who observed that in the time of Ronsard, there was held an assembly of men of letters before Charles IX several times, and that they were always seated. The queen conversed with M. Bourdieu; and suddenly turning to Madame de Bregis, told her that she believed she must not be present at the assembly; but it was agreed that this lady deserved the honour. As the queen was talking with a member she abruptly quitted him, as was her custom, and in her quick way sat down in the arm-chair; and at the same time the members seated themselves. The queen observing that they did not, out of respect to her, approach the table, desired them to come near; and they accordingly approached it.

During these ceremonious preparations, several officers of state had entered the hall, and stood behind the academicians. The chancellor sat at the queen's left hand by the fire-side; and at the right was placed M. de la Chambre, the director; then Boisrobert, Patru, Pellisson, Cotin, the Abbé Tallemant, and others. M. de Mezeray sat at the bottom of the table facing the queen, with an inkstand, paper, and the portfolio of the company lying before him; he occupied the place of secretary. When they were all seated the director rose, and the academicians followed him, all but the chancellor, who remained in his seat. The director made his complimentary address in a low voice, his body was quite bent, and no person but the queen and the chancellor could hear him. She received his address with great satisfaction.

All compliments concluded, they returned to their seats. The director then told the queen that he had composed a treatise on Pains, to add to his character of the Parlements, and if it was agreeable to her majesty, he would read the first chapter.—Very willingly, she answered.—Harmy read it, he said to her majesty, that he would read no more lest he should fatigue her. Not at all, she replied, for I suppose what follows resembles what I have heard.

Afterwards Mr Mezeray mentioned that Mr Cotin had some verses, which her majesty would doubtless find beautiful and if it was agreeable they should be read. Mr Cotin read them: they were versions of two passages from Lucretius; the one in which he attacks a Providence, and the other, where he gives the origin of the world according to the Epicurean system: to these he added twenty lines of his own, in which he maintained the existence of a Providence. 'This done, an abbé rose, and without being desired or dired, read two sonnets, which by courtesy were allowed to be tolerable. It is remarkable that both the poets read their verses standing, while the rest read their compositions seated.

After these readings, the director informed the queen that the ordinary exercises of the company was to labour on the dictionary; and that if her majesty should not find it disagreeable, they would read a cahier or stitched MS. Very willingly, she answered. Mr de Mezeray then read what related to the word Jeu; Game. Amongst other proverbial expressions was this: Game of Princes, which only pleases the players; to express a malicious violence committed by one in power. At this the queen laughed heartily; and they continued reading all that was finely written. This lasted about an hour, when the queen observing that nothing more remained, arose, made a bow to the company, and returned in the manner she entered.

Further, who was himself an academician, has described the miserable manner in which time was consumed at their assemblies. I confess he was a satirist, and had quarrelled with the academy; there must have been, notwithstanding, sufficient resemblance for the following picture, however it may be overcharged. He has been blamed for these exposing the Eleusinian mysteries of literature to the initiated.

'He who is most clamorous, is he whom they suppose has most reason. They all have the art of making long orations upon a trifle. The second repeats like an echo what the first said; but generally three or four speak together. When there is a bench of five or six members one reads, another decides, two converse, one sleeps, and another amuses himself with reading some dictionary which happens to lie before him. When a second member is to deliver his opinion, they are obliged to read again the article, which at the first perusal he had been too much engaged to hear. This is a happy manner of finishing their work. They can hardly get over two lines without long digressions; without some one telling a pleasant story, or the news of the day; or talking of affairs of state and reforming the government.'

That the French Academy were generally frivolously employed appears also from an epistle to Balzac, by Boisrobert, the amusing companion of Cardinal Richelieu.—'Every one separately,' says he, 'promises great things, when they meet they do nothing. They have been six years employed on the letter F; and I should be happy if I were certain of living till they got through G.'

The following anecdote concerns the forty arm-chairs of the academicians. These cardinals who were academicians for a long time had not attended the meetings of the academy, because they thought that arm-chairs were indispensable to their dignity, and the academy had then only common chairs. These cardinals were desirous of being present at the election of Mr Monnoie, that they might give him a distinguished mark of their esteem.—'The king,' says D'Alembert, 'to satisfy at once the delicacy of their friendship, and that of their cardinalship, and to preserve at the same time that academical equality, of which this enlightened monarch, (Louis XIV.) well knew the advantage, sent to the academy forty arm-chairs for the forty academicians; the same chairs which we now occupy; and the motive to which we owe them is sufficient to render the memory of Louis XIV precious to the republic of letters, to whom it owes so many more important obligations!'

POETICAL AND GRAMMATICAL DEATHS.

It will appear by the following anecdotes, that some men may be said to have died poetically and even grammatically.

There may be some attraction existing in poetry which is not merely fictitious, for often have its genuine votaries felt all its power on the most trying occasions. They have displayed the energy of their mind by composing or repeating verses, even with death on their lips.

The Emperor Adrian, dying, made that celebrated address to his soul, which is so happily translated by Pope. Lucan, when he had his veins opened by order of Nero, expired reciting a passage from his Pharsalia, in which he had described the wound of a dying soldier. Petronius did the same thing on the same occasion.

Patris, a poet of Caen, perceiving himself expiring, composed some verses which are justly admired. In this little poem he relates a dream, in which he appeared to be placed next to a beggar, when having addressed him in the haughty strain he would probably have employed on this side of the grave, he receives the following reprimand:

Ici tous sont egaux : je ne te dois plus rien ;
Je suis sur mon fumier comme toi sur le tien

Here all are equal : now thy lot is mine !
I on my dunghill, as thou art on thine.

Des Barreaux, it is said, wrote on his death-bed that well-known sonnet which is translated in the 'Spectator.'

Margaret of Austria, when she was nearly perishing in a storm at sea, composed her epitaph in verse. Had she perished, what would have become of the epitaph? And if she escaped, of what use was it? She should rather have said her prayers. The verses however have all the nécessité of the times. They are—

Cy gist Margot, la gentie demoiselle,
Qu'eut deux maris, et si mourut pucelle.

Beneath this tomb is high-born Margaret laid,
Who had two husbands, and yet died a maid.

She was betrothed to Charles VIII of France, who forsok her; and being next intended for the Spanish infant, in her voyage to Spain, she wrote these lines in a storm.

Mademoiselle de Serment was surnamed the philosopher. She was celebrated for her knowledge and taste in polite literature. She died of a cancer in her breast, and suffered her misfortune with exemplary patience. She expired in finishing these verses, which she addressed to Death.

Nectare clausa suo,
Dignum tantorum pretium tulit illa laborum.

It was after Cervantes had received extreme unction that he wrote the dedication to his Persiles.

Roscommon, at the moment he expired, with an energy of voice that expressed the most fervent devotion, uttered two lines of his own version of 'Dies Irae!' Waller, in his last moments, repeated some lines from Virgil; and Chaucer seems to have taken his farewell of all human vanities by a moral ode, entitled 'A Balade made by Geoffrey Chauncer upon his dothe-bedde lying in his grete anguisse.'

Cornelius de Wit fell an innocent victim to popular prejudice. His death is thus noticed by Hume: 'This man, who had bravely served his country in war, and who had been invested with the highest dignities, was delivered into the hands of the executioner, and torn in pieces by the most inhuman torments. Amidst the severe agonies which he endured he frequently repeated an ode of Horace, which contained sentiments suited to his deplorable condition.' It was the third ode of the third book which this illustrious philosopher and statesman then repeated.

I add another instance in the death of that delightful poet Metastasio. After having received the sacrament, a very short time before his last moments, he broke out with all the enthusiasm of poetry and religion into the following stanzas:

T'offro il tuo proprio figlio,
Che già d'amore in pugno,
Racchiuso in picciol segno
Sì volte a noi donar.
A lui rivolgi il ciglio.
Quando chi t'offro, e poi Lasci, Signor, se vuoi, Lascia di perdonar.

'I offer to thee, O Lord, thy own son, who already has given the pledge of love, inclosed in this thin emblem; turn on him thine eyes; ah! behold whom I offer to thee and then desist, O Lord! if thou canst desist from mercy.'

'The muse that has attended my course (says the dying Gleim in a letter to Klopstock) still hovers round my steps to the very verge of the grave.' A collection of lyrical poems, entitled 'Last Hours,' composed by old Gleim on his death-bed, were intended to be published. The death of Klopstock was one of the most poetical: in this poet's 'Messiah,' he had made the death of Mary, the sister of Martha and Lazarus, a picture of the death of the just; and on his own death-bed he was heard repeating, with an expiring voice, his own verses on Mary; he was exhorting himself to die by the accents of his own harp, the sublimities of his own muse! The same song of Mary, says Madame de Staël, was read at the public funeral of Klopstock.

Chatellard, a French gentleman, beheaded in Scotland for having loved the queen, and even for having attempted her honour, Brantome says, would not have any other vaticum than a poem of Ronsard. When he ascended the scaffold he took the hymns of this poet, and for his consolation read that on death, which he says is well adapted to conquer its fear.

The Marquis de Montrose, when he was condemned by his judges to have his limbs nailed to the gates of four cities, the brave soldier said, that 'he was sorry he had not limbs sufficient to be nailed to all the gates of the cities in Europe, as monuments of his loyalty.' As he proceeded to his execution, he put this thought into beautiful verse.

Philip Strozzi, when imprisoned by Cosmo the First, great Duke of Tuscany, was apprehensive of the danger to which he might expose his friends who had joined in his conspiracy against the duke, from the confessions which the rack might extort from him. Having attempted every exertion for the liberty of his country, he considered it as no crime therefore to die. He resolved on suicide. With the point of the sword, with which he killed himself, he cut out on the mantle-piece of the chimney this verse of Virgil:

Exoriare aliquis nostris ex ossibus ultor.

'Rise, some avenger, from our blood!

I can never repeat without a strong emotion the following stanzas, begun by André Chenier, in the dreadful period of the French revolution. He was waiting for his turn to be dragged to the guillotine, when he commenced this poem:

Comme un dernier rayon, comme un dernier zéphyre
Âme la fin d'un beau jour;
Au pied de l'échafaud j'essaie encor ma lyre,
Peut-être est ce bientôt mon tour;
Peut-être avant que l'heure en cercle promenée
Ait posé sur l'émali brillant
Dans les solitaires pas ou sa route est bornée
Son pied sonore et vigilant.

Le sommeil du tombeau pressera ma paupière—

Here, at this pathetic line, was André Chenier summoned to the guillotine! Never was a more beautiful effusion of grief interrupted by a more affecting incident!

Several men of science have died in a scientific manner. Haller, the poet, philosopher, and physician, beheld his end approach with the utmost composure. He kept feeling his pulse to the last moment, and when he found the life was almost gone, he turned to his brother physician, observing, 'My friend, the artery ceases to beat,'—and almost instantly expired. The same remarkable circumstance had occurred to the great Harvey; he kept making observations on the state of his pulse, when life was drawing to its close; 'as if,' says Dr Wilson in the oration spoken a few days after the event, 'that he who had taught us the beginning of life might himself, at his departing from it, become acquainted with those of death.'

De Lagny, who was intended by his friends for the study of the law, having fallen on an Euclid, found it so congenial to his dispositions, that he devoted himself to mathematics. In his last moments, when he retained no farther recollection of the friends who surrounded his bed, one of them, perhaps to make a philosophical experiment, thought proper to ask him the square of 12; our dying mathematician instantly, and perhaps without knowing that he answered, replied, '144.'

The following anecdotes are of a different complexion, and may excite a smile.

Pere Bouhours was a French grammarian, who had been justly accused of paying too scrupulous an attention to the minutiae of letters. He was more solicitous of his words than his thoughts. It is said, that when he was dying, he called out to his friends (a correct grammarian to the last), 'Je vas, ou je vais mourir; l'un ou l'autre se dit!'

When Malherbe was dying, he reprimanded his nurse for making use of a solecism in her language! And when his confessor represented to him the felicitous of a future state in low and trite expressions, the dying critic interrupted him:—'Hold your tongue,' he said, 'your wretched style only makes me out of conceit with them!'

The favourite studies and amusements of the learned La Mothe le Vayer consisted in accounts of the most distant countries. He gave a striking proof of the influence of this master-passion, when death hung upon his lips. Bernier, the celebrated traveller, entering and drawing the curtains of his bed to take his eternal farewell, the dying man turning to him, with a faint voice inquired, 'Well, my friend, what news from the Great Mogul?'

SCARRON.

Scarron, as a burlesque poet (but no other comparison exists,) had his merit, but is now little read; for the uniformity of the burlesque style is as intolerable as the uniformity of the serious. From various sources we may collect some uncommon anecdotes, although he was a mere author.

Few are born with more flattering hopes than was Scarron. His father, a counsellor, with an income of 25,000 livres, married a second wife, and the lively Scarron soon became the object of her hatred. He studied, and travelled, and took the clerical tonsure; but discovered dispositions more suitable to the pleasures of his age than to the gravity of his profession. He formed an acquaintance with the wits of the times; and in the carnival of 1638 committed a youthful extravagance, for which his remaining days formed a continual punishment. He disguised himself as a savage; the singularity of a naked man attracted crowds. After having been hunted by the mob, he was forced to escape from his pursuers, and concealed himself in a marsh. A freezing cold seized him, and threw him, at the age of 27 years, into a kind of palsy; a cruel disorder which tormented him all his life. 'It was thus,' he says, 'that pleasure deprived me suddenly of legs which had danced with elegance, and of hands which could manage the pencil and the lute.'

Goujet, in his Bibliothèque Française, vol. xvi, p. 307, without stating this anecdote describes his disorder as an acrid humour, distilling itself on his nerves, and baffling the skill of his physicians; the sciatica, rheumatism, in a word, a complication of maladies attacked him, sometimes successively, sometimes together, and made of our poor Abbé a sad spectacle. He thus describes himself in one of his letters; and who could be in better humour?

'I have lived to thirty: if I reach forty, I shall only add many miseries to those which I have endured these last eight or nine years. My person was well made, though short; my disorder has shortened it still more by a foot. My head is a little broad for my shape; my face is full enough for my body to appear very meagre! I have hair enough to render a wig unnecessary; I have got many white hairs, in spite of the proverb. My teeth, formerly square pearls, are now of the colour of wood, and will soon be of date. My legs and thighs first formed an obtuse angle, afterwards an equilateral angle, and, at length, an acute one. My thighs and my body form another: and my head, always dropping on my breast, makes me not ill represent a Z. I have got my arms shortened as well as legs, and my fingers as well as my arms. In a word, I am an abridgment of human miseries.'

It is said in the Séguisiana, p. 87, that he had the free use of nothing but his tongue and his hands; and that he wrote on a portfolio, which was placed on his knees.

Belzac said of Scarron, that he had gone further in insensibility than the Stoics, who were satisfied in appearing insensible to pain; but Scarron was gay, and amused all the world with his sufferings.

He portrays himself thus humorously in his address to the queen:

Je ne regarde plus qu'en bas,
Je suis torticolle, j'ai la tête penchante:
Ma mine devient si plaineante;

Que quand on en ritrok, je m'en plainsdrois pas.

'I can only see under me; I am wry-necked; my head hangs down; my appearance is so droll, that if people laugh I shall not complain.'

He says elsewhere,

Parmi les torticolis
Je passe pour des plus jolis.

'Among my wry-necked people I pass for one of the handsomest.'

After having suffered this distortion of shape, and these acute pains for four years, he quitted his usual residence, the quarter du Marais, for the baths of the Faubourg Saint Germain. He took leave of his friends, by addressing some verses to them, entitled, Adieux aux Marais; in this piece he highly praises many celebrated persons. When he was brought into the street in a chair, the pleasure of seeing himself there once more overcame the pains which the motion occasioned, and he has celebrated the transport by an ode, which has for title, 'The Way from le Marais to the Faubourg Saint Germain.'

These and other baths which he tried had no effect on his miserable disorder. But a new affliction was added to the catalogue of his griefs.

His father, who had hitherto contributed to his necessities, having joined a party against Cardinal Richelieu, was exiled. This affair was rendered still more unfortunate by his mother-in-law with her children at Paris, in the absence of her husband, appropriating the money of the family to her own use.

Richieu Scarron had had no connexion with Cardinal Richelieu. The behaviour of his father had even rendered his name disagreeable to the minister, who was by no means prone to forgiveness. Scarron, however, when he thought his passion softened, ventured to present a petition; and which is considered by the critics as one of his best productions. Richelieu permitted it to be read to him, and acknowledged that it afforded him much pleasure; and that it was plaisamment daté. This plaisant date is given by Scarron:

Fak à Paris dernier jour d'Octobre,
Par moi, Scarron, qui malgré moi suis sobre,
L'an que l'on prit le fameux Perpignan,
Et, sans canon, la ville de Sedan.

At Paris donc, the last day of October,
By me, Scarron, who wanting wine, am sober,
The year they took fam'd Perpignan,
And, without cannon-ball, Sedan.

This was flattering the minister adroitly in two points very agreeably to him. The poet assured well of the dispositions of the cardinal, and lost no time to return to the charge, by addressing an ode to him, to which he gave the title of Thanks, as if he had already received the favours which he hoped he should receive! But all was lost by the death of the cardinal. In this ode I think he has caught the leading idea from a hymn of Ronsard. Catherine of Medicis was prodigal of her promises, and for this reason Ronsard dedicated to her the hymn to Promise.

When Scarron's father died he brought his mother-in-law into court; and, to complete his misfortunes, lost his suit. The cases which he drew up for the occasion were so extremely burlesque, that the world could not easily conceive how a man could amuse himself so pleasantly on a subject on which his existence depended.

The successor of Richelieu, the Cardinal Mazarin, was insensible to his applications. He did nothing for him, although the poet dedicated to him his Typhon, a burlesque poem, in which the author describes the wars of the giants with the gods. Our bard was so irritated at this neglect, that he suppressed a sonnet he had written in his favour, and aimed at him several satirical bullets. Scarron, however, consoled himself for this kind of disgrace with those select friends who were not inconstant in their visits to him. The Bishop of Mans, also, solicited by a friend gave him a living in his diocese. When Scarron had taken possession of it, he began his Roman Comique, ill translated into English by Comical Romances. He made friends by his dedications. Such resources were indeed necessary, for he not only lived well, but had made his house an asylum for his two sisters, who there found refuge from an unfeeling step-mother.

It was about this time that the beautiful and accomplished Mademoiselle D'Aubigné, afterwards so well known by the name of Madame de Maintenon, she who was to be one day the mistress, if not the queen of France, formed with Scarron the most romantic connexion. She united herself in marriage with one whom she well knew might be a lover, but could not be a husband. It was indeed amidst that literary society she formed her taste, and embellished with her presence his little residence, where the most polished courtiers and some of the finest geniuses of Paris, the party formed against Mazarin, called La Fronde, met. Such was the influence this marriage had over Scarron, that after this period his writings became more correct and more agreeable than those which he had previously composed. Scarron, on his side, gave a proof of his attachment to Madame de Maintenon; for by marrying her he lost his living of Mans. But though without wealth, we are told in the Séguisiana, that he was accustomed to say, that 'his wife and he would not live uncomfortably by the produce of his estate and the Marquisate of Quinét.' Thus he called the revenue which his compositions produced, and Quinét was his bookseller.

Scarron addressed one of his dedications to his dog, to ridicule those writers who dedicate their works indiscriminately, though no author has been more liberal of dedications than himself; but, as he confessed, he made dedication a kind of business. When he was low in cash he always dedicated to some lord, whom he praised as warmly as his dog, but whom probably he did not esteem so much.

Ségrais informs us, that when Scarron was visited, previous to general conversation his friends were taxed with a perusal of whatever he had written since he saw them before. One day Segrais and a friend calling on him, 'Take a chair,' said our author, 'and let me try on you my Roman Comique.' He took his manuscript, read several pages, and when he observed that they laughed, he said, 'Good, this goes well; my book can't fail of success, since it obliges such able persons as yourselves to laugh,' and then remained silent to receive their compliments. He used to call this trying on his romance, as a tailor tries his coat. He was agreeable and diverting in all things, even in his complaints and passions. Whatever he conceived he immediately too freely expressed; but his amiable lady corrected him of this in three months after marriage!

He petitioned the Queen, in his droll manner, to be permitted the honour of being her *patient by right of office. These verses form a part of his address to her majesty:—

* A friend would translate, 'malade de la reine, the queen's sick man.' I think there is more humour in supposing her majesty to be his physician; in which light Scarron might consider her for a pension of 800 crowns

Scarron, par la grace de Dieu,
Malade indigne de la reine,
Homme n'ayant ni feu, ni lieu,
Mais bien du mal et de la peine;
Hopital allant et venant,
Des jambes d'autrui cheminant,
Des siennes n'ayant plus l'usage,
Souffrant beaucoup, dormant bien peu,
Et pourtant faisant par courage
Bonne mine et fort mauvais jeu.

'Scarron, by the grace of God, an unworthy patient of the Queen; a man without a house, though a moving hospital of disorders; walking only with other people's legs, with great sufferings, but little sleep; and yet, in spite of all, very courageously showing a hearty countenance, though indeed he plays a losing game.'

She smiled, granted the title, and, what was better, added a small pension, which losing, by lampooning the minister Mazarin, Fouquet generously granted him a more considerable one.

The termination of the miseries of this facetious genius was now approaching. To one of his friends, who was taking leave of him for some time, Scarron said, 'I shall soon die; the only regret I have in dying is not to be enabled to leave some property to my wife, who is possessed of infinite merit, and whom I have every reason imaginable to admire and to praise.'

One day he was seized with so violent a fit of the hicough, that his friends now considered his prediction would soon be verified. When it was over, 'if ever I recover,' cried Scarron, 'I will write a bitter satire against the hicough.' The satire, however, was never written, for he died soon after. A little before his death, when he observed his relations and domestics weeping and groaning, he was not much affected, but humorously told them, 'My children, you will never weep for me so much as I have made you laugh.' A few moments before he died, he said, that 'he never thought it was so easy a matter to laugh at the approach of death.'

The burlesque compositions of Scarron are now neglected by the French. This species of writing was much in vogue till attacked by the critical Boileau, who annihilated such puny writers as D'Assoucy and Dulot, with their stupid admirers. It is said he spared Scarron because his merit, though it appeared but at intervals, was uncommon. Yet so much were burlesque verses the fashion after Scarron's works, that the booksellers would not publish poems, but with the word 'Burlesque' in the title page. In 1689 appeared a poem, which shocked the pious, entitled 'The Passion of our Lord, in burlesque verses.'

Swift, in his dotage, appears to have been gratified by such puerilities as Scarron frequently wrote. An ode which Swift calls 'A Lilliputian Ode,' consisting of verses of three syllables, probably originated in a long epistle in verses of three syllables, which Scarron addressed to Sarrazin. It is pleasant, and the following lines will serve as a specimen.

Epître a Mr Sarrazin.

The Roman Comique of our author is well known, and abounds with pleasantries, with wit and character. It is likewise full of 'Cotton's Virgil travestied,' which is notwithstanding considerable merit. Buffoonery after certain time exhausts our patience. It is the chase and only who can keep the attention awake for a length of time. It is said that Scarron intended to write a tragedy; this perhaps would not have been the least facetious of his burlesques.

PETER CORNEILLE.

Exact Racine and Corneille's noble fire
Show'd us that France had something to admire
Pope

The great Corneille having finished his studies, devoted himself to the bar; but this was not the stage on which his abilities were to be displayed. He followed the occupation of a lawyer for some time, without taste and without success. A trifling circumstance discovered to the world and to himself a different genius. A young man who was in love with a girl of the same town, having solicited him to be his companion in one of those secret visits which he paid to the lady, it happened that the stranger pleased infinitely more than his introducer. The pleasure arising from this adventure excited in Corneille a talent which had hitherto been unknown to him, and he attempted, as if it were by inspiration, dramatic poetry. On this little subject, he wrote his comedy of Melite, in 1625. At that moment the French Drama was at a low ebb; the most favourable ideas were formed of our juvenile poet, and comedy, it was expected, would now reach its perfection. After the tumult of approbation had ceased, the critics thought that Melite was too simple and barren of incident. Angered by this criticism, our poet wrote his Ciltandre, and in that piece has scattered incidents and adventures with such a licentious profusion, that the critics say, he wrote it rather to expose the public taste than to accommodate himself to it. In this piece the persons combat on the theatre; there are murders and assassinations; heroines fight; officers appear in search of murderers, and women are disguised as men. There is matter sufficient for a romance of ten volumes; 'And yet (says a French critic) nothing can be more cold and tiresome.' He afterwards indulged his natural genius in various other performances; but began to display more forcibly his tragic powers in Medea. A comedy which he afterwards wrote was a very indifferent composition. He regained his full lustre in the famous Cid, a tragedy, of which he preserved in his closet translations in all the European languages, except the Slavonian and the Turkish. He pursued his poetical career with uncommon splendour in the Horaces, Cinna, and at length in Polheutes; which productions (the French critics say) can never be surpassed.

At length the tragedy of 'Partharite' appeared, and proved unsuccessful. This so much disgusted our veteran bard, that, like Ben Jonson, he could not conceal his chagrin in the preface. There the poet tells us that he renounces the theatre for ever! and indeed this eternity lasted for several years.

Disturbed by the fate of his unfortunate tragedy, he directed his poetical pursuits to a different species of composition. He now finished his translation, in verse, of the 'Imitation of Jesus Christ, by Thomas a Kempis.' This work, perhaps from the singularity of its dramatic author becoming a religious writer, was attended with astonishing success. Yet Fontenelle did not find in this translation the prevailing charm of the original, which consists in that simplicity and aiseté, which are lost in the pomp of versification so natural to Corneille. 'This book,' he continues, 'the finest that ever proceeded from the hand of man (since the gospel does not come from man) would not go on direct to the heart, and would not seize on it with shores, if it had not a natural and tender air, to which we that negligence which prevails in the style greatly attributes.' Voltaire appears to confirm the opinion of a critic, in respect to the translation: 'It is reported at Corneille's translation of the Imitation of Jesus Christ as been printed thirty-two times; it is as difficult to bear this as it is to read the book once.'

Corneille seems not to have been ignorant of the truth of it in criticism. In his dedication of it to the pope, he says, 'The translation which I have chosen, by the simplicity [his style, precludes all the rich ornaments of poetry, and from increasing my reputation, must be considered rather as a sacrifice made to the glory of the Sovereign rather of all which I may have acquired by my poetical selections.' This is an excellent elucidation of the truth [that precept of Johnson which respects religious poetry; that of which the author of 'Calvary' seems not to have been sensible. The merit of religious compositions appears, like this 'Imitation of Jesus Christ,' to consist in a simplicity inimical to the higher poetical embellishments; and are too human!]

When Racine, the son, published a long poem on Grace taken in its holy sense, a most unhappy subject almost for poetry, it was said that he had written on Grace without grace.

During the space of six years Corneille rigorously kept his promise of not writing for the theatre. At length, impowered by the persuasions of his friends, and probably by his own inclinations, he once more directed his studies to drama. He recommenced in 1659, and finished in 1660. During this time he wrote ten new pieces, and published a variety of little religious poems, which, although they do not attract the attention of posterity, were then much with delight, and probably preferred to the finest tragedies by the good catholics of the day.

In 1675 he terminated his career. In the last year of his life his mind became so enfeebled as to be incapable of writing; and he died in extreme poverty. It is true that a common genius had been amply rewarded; but except his talents we cannot count that of preserving his favours of fortune which he had acquired.

Festouelle, his nephew, presents a minute and interesting description of this great man. I must first observe, says Marville, that when he saw Corneille he had the appearance of a country tradesman, and that he could conceive how a man of so rustic an appearance could sit in the mouths of his Romans such heroic sentiments. Corneille was sufficiently large and full in his person; his simple and vulgar; always negligent; and very little conscious of pleasing by his exterior. His face had something agreeable, his nose large, his mouth not unhandsome, eyes full of fire, his physiognomy lively, with strong features, well adapted to be transmitted to posterity on a solid or bust. His pronunciation was not very distinct; he read his verses with force, but without grace.

He was acquainted with polite literature, with history and politics; but he generally knew them best as they related to the stage. For other knowledge he had neither taste, curiosity, nor much esteem. He spoke little, even subjects which he perfectly understood. He did not speak what he said, and to discover the great Corneille became necessary to read him.

He was of a melancholy disposition, had something blunt in his manner, and sometimes he appeared rude; but in private he was no disagreeable companion, and made a good friend and husband. He was tender, and his soul was very capable of friendship. His constitution was very favourable to love, but never to debauchery, and rarely to great attachments. His soul was fierce and independent; and never he was managed, for it would never bend. This rendered him very capable of portraying Roman heroes, but incapable of improving his fortune. Nothing could his incapacity for business but his aversion: the great troubles of this kind occasioned him alarm and pain. He was never satiated with praise, although he was continually receiving it; but if he was sensible of fame, he was far removed from vanity.

That Festouelle observes of Corneille's love of fame is fully proved by our great poet himself, in an epistle to his son, in which we find the following remarkable description of himself; an instance that what the world calls vast long interests in a great genius.

Je suis sans gloire un peu, c'est notre sibi à tous;
Le prix que nous valons qui le s'agit mieux que nous?

Et puis la mode en est, et la cour l'autorise,
Tous parlons de nous même avec tout franchise,
La fausse humilité ne met plus en crédit.
Je s'agit ce que je vaudrais, et crois ce qu'on m'en dit,
Pour me faire admirer je ne fais point de ligue;
J'ai peu de voix pour moi, mais je les ai sans brigue;
Et mon ambition, pour faire plus de bruit
Ne les va point querir de reduit en reduit
Mon travail sans appui monte sur le theatre,
Chacun en liberté l'y blâme ou l'idolâtre;
Là, sans que amis prechent leur sentiment,
J'arrache quelquefois leurs applaudissemens,
Là, content du succès que le merite donne,
Par d'illustres avis je n'éblouis personne;
Je satisfais ensemble et peuple et courtisans;
Et mes vers en tous lieux sont mes seuls paraisans;
Par leur seule beauté ma plume est estimée,
Je ne dois qu'à moi seul toute ma renommée;
Et pense toutefois n'avoir point de rival,
A qui je fasse tort, en le traitant d'égal.

I give his sentiments in English verse with more faithfulness than elegance. To write with his energetic expression, one must feel oneself in a similar situation, which only one or two living writers can experience.

Self-love prevails too much in every state;
Who, like ourselves, our secret worth can rate?
Since 'tis a fashion authorised at court,
Frankly our merits we ourselves report.
A proud humility will not deceive;
I know my worth; what others say, believe.
To be admired I form no petty league;
Few are my friends, but gain'd without intrigue.
My bold ambition, destitute of grace,
Scorns still to beg their votes from place to place.
On the fair stage my scenic toils I raise,
While each is free to censure or to praise;
And there, unaided by inferior arts,
I snatch the applause that rushes from their hearts.
Content by Merit still to win the crown,
With no illustrious names I cheat the town.
The galleries thunder, and the pit commands;
My verses, every where, my only friends!
'Tis from their charms alone my praise I claim;
'Tis to myself alone, I owe my fame;
And know no rival whom I fear to meet,
Or injure, when I grant an equal seat.

Voltaire censures Corneille for making his heroes say continually they are great men. But in drawing the character of an hero he draws his own. All his heroes are only so many Corneilles in different situations.

Thomas Corneille attempted the same career as his brother: perhaps his name was unfortunate, for it naturally excited a comparison which could not be favourable to him. Gagon, the Dennis of his day, wrote the following smart impromptu under his portrait:

Voyant le portrait de Corneille,
Gardez vous de crier merveille!
Et dans vos transports n'allez pas,
Prendre ici Pierre pour Thomas.

POETS.

In all ages there has existed an anti-poetical party. This faction consists of those frigid intellects incapable of that glowing expansion so necessary to feel the charms of an art, which only addresses itself to the imagination: or of writers who having proved unsuccessful in their court to the muses, revenge themselves by reviling them; and also of those religious minds who consider the ardent effusions of poetry as dangerous to the morals and peace of society.

Plato, amongst the ancients, is the model of those moderns who profess themselves to be anti-poetical. This writer, in his ideal republic, characterises a man who occupies himself with composing verses as a very dangerous member of society, from the inflammatory tendency of his writings. It is by arguing from its abuse, that he decries this enchanting talent. At the same time it is to be recollected, that no head was more finely organized for the visions of the muse than Plato's: he was a true poet, and had addicted himself in his prime of life to the cultivation of the art, but perceiving that he could not surpass his imitable original, Homer, he employed this insidious manner of depreciating his works. In the Phædrus he describes the feelings of a genuine Poet. To become such, he says, it will never be sufficient to be guided by the rules of art, unless we also feel the ecstasies of that furor, almost divine, which in this kind of composition is the most palpable and least ambiguous character of a true inspiration. Cold minds, ever tranquil and ever in possession of themselves, are incapable of producing exalted poetry.

their verses must always be feeble, diffusive, and leave no impression; the verses of those who are endowed with a strong and lively imagination, and who, like Homer's personification of Discord, have their heads incessantly in the skies, and their feet on the earth, will agitate you, burn in your heart, and drag you along with them; breaking like an impetuous torrent, and swelling your breast with that enthusiasm, which they are themselves possessed.

Such is the character of a poet in a poetical age.—The tuneful race have many corporate bodies of mechanics; Poptool manufacturers, inlayers, burnishers, gilders and filers!

Men of taste are sometimes disgusted in turning over the works of the anti-poetical, by meeting with gross raileries and false judgments concerning poetry and poets.—Locke has expressed a marked contempt of poets; but we see what ideas he formed of poetry by his warm panegyric of one of Blackmore's epics! and besides he was himself a most unhappy poet! Selden, a scholar of profound erudition, has given us his opinion concerning poets. 'It is ridiculous for a lord to print verses; he may make them to please himself. If a man in a private chamber twirls his band-strings, or plays with a rush to please himself, it is well enough; but if he should go into Fleet-street, and sit upon a stall and twirl a band-string, or play with a rush, then all the boys in the street would laugh at him.'—As if 'the sublime and the beautiful are to be compared to the twirling of a band-string or playing with a rush!—A poet, related to an illustrious family, and who did not write unpoetically, entertained a far different notion concerning poets. So persuaded was he that to be a true poet required an elevated mind, that it was a maxim with him, that no writer could be an excellent poet who was not descended from a noble family. This opinion is as absurd as that of Selden's:—but when one party will not grant enough, the other always assumes too much. The great Pascal, whose extraordinary genius was discovered in the sciences, knew little of the nature of poetical beauty. He said 'poetry has no settled object.' This was the decision of a geometrician, not of a poet. 'Why should he speak of what he did not understand?' asked the lively Voltaire. Poetry is not an object which comes under the cognizance of philosophy or wit.

Longuerue had profound erudition; but he decided on poetry in the same manner as those learned men. Nothing so strongly characterises such literary men as the following observations in the Longuerue, p. 170.

'There are two books on Homer, which I prefer to Homer himself. The first is Antiquitates Homericae of Feithius, where he has extracted every thing relative to the usages and customs of the Greeks; the other is Homer Gnomologia per Duportum, printed at Cambridge. In these two books is found every thing valuable in Homer, without being obliged to get through his Contes a dormir debout!—Thus men of science decide on men of taste! There are who study Homer and Virgil as the blind travel through a fine country, merely to get to the end of their journey.—It was observed at the death of Longuerue that in his immense library not a volume of poetry was to be found. He had formerly read poetry, for indeed he had read every thing. Racine tells us, that when young he paid him a visit: the conversation turned on poets; our erudit renewed them all with the most ineffable contempt of the poetical talent, from which he said we learn nothing. He seemed a little charitable towards Ariosto.—'As for that Madame, (said he) he has amused me sometimes.' Dacier, a poetical pedant after all, was asked who was the greater poet, Homer or Virgil? he honestly answered, 'Homer by a thousand years!'

But it is mortifying to find among the anti-poetical even poets themselves! Malherbe, the first poet in France in his day, appears little to have esteemed the art. He used to say, that 'a good poet was not more useful to the state than a skillful player of nine-pins! Malherbe wrote with coactive labour. When a poem was shown to him which had been highly commended, he sarcastically asked if it would lower the price of bread? In these instances he maliciously confounded the useful with the agreeable arts. Be it remembered that Malherbe had a cynical heart, cold and unfeeling; his character may be traced in his poetry; labour and correctness, without one ray of enthusiasm.

Le Clerc was a scholar not entirely unworthy to be ranked amongst the Lockes, the Seldens, and the Longuerues; and his opinions are as just concerning poets. In the Parrhasiana he has written a treatise on poets in a very unpoetical manner. I shall notice his coarse raileries relating to what he calls 'the personal defects of poets.' In vol. i, p. 33, he says, 'In the Scaligeriana we have Joseph Scaliger's opinion concerning poets.—"There never was a man who was a poet, or addicted to the study of poetry, but his heart was puffed up with his greatness."—This is very true. The poetical enthusiasm persuades those gentlemen, that they have something in them superior to others, because they employ a language peculiar to themselves. When the poetic furor seizes them its traces frequently remain on their faces, which make connoisseurs say with Horace,

Aut insanit homo, aut versus facit.

There goes a madman, or a bard!

Their thoughtful air and melancholy gait make them appear insane; for accustomed to versify while they walk, as to bite their nails in apparent agonies, their steps are measured and slow, and they look as if they were reflecting on something of consequence, although they are only thinking, as the phrase runs, of nothing! He proceeds in the same elegant strain to enumerate other defects. He has only transcribed the above description of our jovial scholar, with an intention of describing those exterior marks of that fine enthusiasm, of which the poet is peculiarly susceptible, and which have exposed many an elevated genius to the ridicule of the vulgar.

I find this admirably defended by Charpentier: 'Me may ridicule as much as they please those gesticulations and contortions which poets are apt to make in the act of composing; it is certain however that they greatly assist in putting the imagination into motion. These kinds of agitation do not always show a mind which labours with its sterility; they frequently proceed from a mind which excites and animates itself. Quintilian has nobly compared them to those lashings of his tail which a lion gives himself when he is preparing to combat. Perhaps, who he would give us an idea of a cold and languishing oration, says that its author did not strike his desk nor bit his nails.

Nec pluteum credit, nec demoroso sapit ungues.'

These exterior marks of enthusiasm may be illustrated by the following curious anecdote:—Domenichino, the painter, was accustomed to act the characters of all the figures he would represent on his canvases, and to go through all that the passion he meant to describe could prompt. Painting the martyrdom of St Andrew, Carracci one day caught him in a violent passion, speaking in a terrible and menacing tone. He was at that moment employed on a soldier, who was threatening the saint.—When this fit of enthusiastic abstraction had passed, Carracci ran and embraced him, acknowledging that Domenichino had been that day his master; and that he had learned from him the true manner to succeed in catching the expression; that great pride of the painter's art.

Thus different are the sentiments of the intelligent as the unintelligent on the same subject. A Carracci once braced a kindred genius for what a Le Clerc or a Seld would have ridiculed.

Poets, I confess, frequently indulge themselves, which though they offer no charms to their friends, are too delicious to forego. In the ideal world, peopled with all its fairy inhabitants, and ever open to their contemplation they travel with an unwearied foot. Crebillon, the celebrated tragic poet, was enamoured of solitude, that he might there indulge, without interruption, in those romances with which his imagination teemed. One day when he was in a deep reverie, a friend entered his study and said, 'Don't disturb me,' cried the poet, 'I am enjoying a moment of happiness; I am going to hang a villain of a sister and banish another who is an idiot.'

Amongst the anti-poetical may be placed the fifth the great monarch of Prussia. George the Second was not more the avowed enemy of the muses. Frederick would not suffer the prince to read verses; and when he was desirous of study, or of the conversation of literary men he was obliged to do it secretly. Every poet was sworn to his majesty. One day, having observed some verses written on one of the doors of the palace, he asked a eunuch their signification. They were explained to him; and were latin verses composed by Wachter, a man of letters then resident at Berlin. The king immediately sent for ward, who came warm with the hope of receiving a reward for his ingenuity. He was astonished however to hear the king, in a violent passion, accost him, 'I order you immediately to quit this city and my kingdom.' Wachter took refuge in Hanover. As little indeed was this anti-poetical monarch a friend to philosophers. Two or three such kings might perhaps renovate the ancient barbarism of Europe. Barratier, the celebrated child, was presented to his majesty of Prussia as a prodigy of erudition: the king, to mortify our ingenious youth, coldly asked him, 'if he knew the law?' The learned boy was constrained to acknowledge that he knew nothing of law. 'Go,' was the reply of this Augustus, 'Go, and study it before you give yourself out as a scholar.' Poor Barratier renounces for this pursuit his other studies, and persevered with such ardour, that he became an excellent lawyer at the end of fifteen months; but his exertions cost him at the same time his life!

Every monarch, however, has not proved so destitute of poetic sensibility as this Prussian. Francis I gave repeated marks of his attachment to the favourites of the muses, by composing several occasional sonnets, which are dedicated to their eulogy. Andrelin, a French poet, enjoyed the happy fate of Oppian, to whom the emperor Caracalla presented as many pieces of gold as there were verses in one of his poems; and with great propriety they have been called 'golden verses.' Andrelin when he recited his poem on the conquest of Naples before Charles VIII, received a sack of silver coin, which with difficulty he carried home. Charles IX, says Brantome, loved verses, and recompensed poets, not indeed immediately, but gradually, that they might always be stimulated to excel. He used to say that poets resembled race horses, that must not be fed but not fattened, for then they were good for nothing. Marot was so much esteemed by kings, that he was called the poet of princes, and the prince of poets.

In the early state of poetry what honours were paid to the votaries! Ronsard, the French Chaucer, was the first who carried away the prize at the Floral games. This need of poetic honour was an eglantine composed of silver. The reward did not appear equal to the merit of the work and the reputation of the poet; and on this occasion the city of Toulouse had a Minerva of solid silver struck, of considerable value. This image was sent to Ronsard, accompanied by a decree, in which he was declared, by way of eminence, 'The French poet.'

It is a curious anecdote to add, that when, at a later period, a similar Minerva was adjudged to Maynard for his verses, the Capitouls of Toulouse, who were the exponents of the Floral gifts, to their shame, out of covetousness, never obeyed the decision of the poetical judges. This circumstance is noticed by Maynard in an epigram, which bears this title: On a Minerva of silver, promised but not given.

The anecdote of Margaret of Scotland (wife of the Dauphin of France,) and Alain the poet, is, perhaps, generally known. Who is not charmed with that fine expression of her poetical sensibility? The person of Alain was repulsive, but his poetry had attracted her affections. Passing through one of the halls of the palace, she saw him leaning on a bench; she approached and kissed him. Some of her attendants could not conceal their astonishment that she should press with her lips those of a man so repulsive. The amiable princess answered, smiling, 'I did not kiss the man, but the mouth which has uttered so many fine things.'

The great Colbert paid a pretty compliment to Boileau and Racine. This minister, at his villa, was enjoying the conversation of our two poets, when the arrival of a prince was announced: turning quickly to the servant, he said, 'Let him be shown every thing except myself!' To such attentions from this great minister, Boileau alludes in these verses:

—Pis d'un grand, m'aima jusqu'à la tendresse;
Et me vus à Colbert inspirait l'allégresse.

Several persons have considered it as highly meritorious to obtain from the reading of poetry! A good father, in his account of the last hours of Madame Racine, the wife of the celebrated tragic poet, pays high compliments to her religious disposition, which, he says, was so anxious, that she would not allow herself to read poetry, as she considered it to be a dangerous pleasure: and he highly commends her for never having read the tragedies of her husband! Arnauld, though so intimately connected with Racine for many years, had not read his compositions. When, at length, he was persuaded to read Phœdra, he declared himself to be delighted, but complained that the poet had not a dangerous example, in making the manly Hypolitus dwindle to an effeminate lover. As a critic, Arnauld was right; but Racine had his nation to please. Such persons entertain notions of poetry similar to that of an ancient father, who calls poetry the wine of Satan; or to that of the religious and austere Nicole, who was so ably answered by Racine: he said, that dramatic poets were public poisoners, not of bodies, but of souls.

Poets, it is acknowledged, have foibles peculiar to themselves. They sometimes act in the daily commerce of life, as if every one was concerned in the success of their productions. Poets are too frequently merely poets. Segrais has recorded that the following maxim of Rochefoucault was occasioned by reflecting on the characters of Boileau and Racine. 'It displays,' he writes, 'a great poverty of mind to have only one kind of genius.' On this Segrais observes, and Segrais knew them intimately, that their conversation only turned on poetry; take them from that, and they knew nothing. It was thus with one Du Perrier, a good poet, but very poor. When he was introduced to Pellisson, who wished to be serviceable to him, the minister said, 'In what can he be employed? He is only occupied by his verses.'

All these complaints are not unfounded; yet, perhaps, it is unjust to expect from an excellent artist all the petty accomplishments of frivolous persons, who have studied no art but that of practising on the weaknesses of their friends. The enthusiastic votary, who devotes his days and nights to meditations on his favourite art, will rarely be found that despicable thing, a mere man of the world. Du Bos has justly observed, that men of genius, born for a particular profession, appear inferior to others when they apply themselves to other occupations. That distraction which arises from their continued attention to their ideas renders them awkward in their manners. Such defects are a proof of the activity of genius.

It is a common foible with poets to read their verses to friends. Segrais has ingeniously observed, to use his own words, 'When young I used to please myself in reciting my verses indifferently to all persons; but I perceived when Scarron, who was my intimate friend, used to take his portfolio and read his verses to me, although they were good, I frequently became weary. I then reflected, that those to whom I read mine, and who, for the greater part, had no taste for poetry, must experience the same disagreeable sensation. I resolved for the future to read my verses only to those who entreated me, and to read but a few at a time. We flatter ourselves too much; we conclude that what pleases us must please others. We will have persons indulgent to us, and frequently we will have no indulgence for those who are in want of it.' An excellent hint for young poets, and for those old ones who carry odes and elegies in their pockets, to inflict the pains of the torture on their friends.

The affection which a poet feels for his verses has been frequently extravagant. Bayle, ridiculing that parental tenderness which writers evince for their poetical compositions, tells us, that many have written epitaphs on friends whom they believed on report to have died, could not determine to keep them in their closet, but suffered them to appear in the lifetime of those very friends whose death they celebrated. In another place he says, that such is their infatuation for their productions, that they prefer giving to the public their panegyrics of persons whom afterwards they satirised, rather than suppress the verses which contain those panegyrics. We have many examples of this in the poems, and even in the epistolary correspondence of modern writers. It is customary with most authors, when they quarrel with a person after the first edition of their work, to cancel his eulogies in the next. But poets and letter-writers frequently do not do this; because they are so charmed with the happy turn of their expressions, and other elegancies of composition, that they prefer the praise which they may acquire for their style to the censure which may follow from their inconsistency.

After having given a hint to young poets, I shall offer one to veterans. It is a common defect with them that they do not know when to quit the muses in their advanced age. Bayle says, 'Poets and orators should be mindful to retire from their occupations, which so peculiarly require the fire of imagination; yet it is but too common to see them in their career, even in the decline of life. It seems as if they would condemn the public to drink even the lees of their nectar.' After and Daurat were both poets who had acquired considerable reputation, but which they overturned when they persisted to write in their old age without vigour and without fancy.

What crowds of these impetuously bold,
In sounds and jingling syllables grown old,
They run on poets, in a raging vein,
E'en to the drops and squeezings of the brain :
Strain out the last dull droppings of their sense,
And rhyme with all the rage of impotence.

Pope.

It is probable he had Wycherley in his eye when he wrote this. 'The veteran bard latterly scribbled much indifferent verse ; and Pope had freely given his opinion, by which he lost his friendship !'

It is still worse when aged poets devote their exhausted talents to divine poems, as did Waller ; and Milton in his second epic. Such poems, observes Voltaire, are frequently entitled ' sacred poems ;' and sacred they are, for no one touches them. From a soil so arid what can be expected but insipid fruits ? Corneille told Chevreau several years before his death, that he had taken leave of the theatre, for he had lost his poetical powers with his teeth.

Poets have sometimes displayed an obliquity of taste in their female favourites. As if conscious of the power of ennobling others, some have selected them from the lowest classes, whom having elevated into divinities, they have addressed in the language of poetical devotion. The Chloë of Prior, after all his raptures, was a plump barmaid. Ronsard addressed many of his verses to Miss Cassandra, who followed the same occupation : in one of his sonnets to her, he fills it with a crowd of personages taken from the Iliad, which to the honest girl must have all been extremely mysterious. Colletet, a French bard, married three of his servants. His last lady was called la belle Claudine. Ashamed of such menial alliances, he attempted to persuade the world that he had married the tenth muse ; and for this purpose published verses in her name. When he died, the vein of Claudine became suddenly dry. She indeed published her 'Adieux to the Muses ;' but it was soon discovered that all the verses of this lady, including her 'Adieux,' were the compositions of her husband.

Sometimes, indeed, the ostensible mistresses of poets have no existence ; and a slight occasion is sufficient to give birth to one. Racan and Malherbe were one day conversing on their amours ; that is, of selecting a lady who should be the object of their verses. Racan named one, and Malherbe another. It happening that both had the same name, Catharine, they passed the whole afternoon in forming it into an anagram. They found three : Arthenice, Eracimthe, and Charité. The first was preferred ; and many a fine ode was written in praise of the beautiful Arthenice !

Poets change their opinions of their own productions wonderfully at different periods of life. Baron Haller was in his youth warmly attached to poetic composition. His house was on fire, and to rescue his poems he rushed through the flames. He was so fortunate as to escape with his beloved manuscripts in his hand. Ten years afterwards he condemned to the flames those very poems which he had ventured his life to preserve.

Satirists, if they escape the scourges of the law, have reason to dread the cane of the satirist. Of this kind we have many anecdotes on record ; but none more poignant than the following. Benserade was caned for lampooning the Duke d'Eperron. Some days afterwards he appeared at court, but being still lame from the rough treatment he had received, he was forced to support himself by a cane. A wit, who knew what had passed, whispered the affair to the queen. She, dissembling, asked him if he had the gout ? 'Yes, madam,' replied our lame satirist, 'and therefore I make use of a cane.' 'Not so,' interrupted the malignant Bautru, 'Benserade in this imitates those holy martyrs who are always represented with the instrument which occasioned their sufferings.'

ROMANCES.

Romance has been elegantly defined as the offspring of Fiction and Love. Men of learning have amused themselves with tracing the epochs of romances ; but that erudition is desperate which would fix on the inventor of the first romance : for what originates in nature, who shall hope to detect the shadowy outlines of its beginnings ? The Theagenes and Charicles of Heliodorus appeared in the fourth century ; and this elegant prelate was the Grecian Fenelon. It has been prettily said, that posterior romances seem to be the children of the marriage of Theagenes and Charicles. The Romance of 'The Golden Ass,' by Apuleius, which contains the beautiful tale of Cupid and Psyche, remains unrivalled ; while the 'Daphne and Chloë' of Longus, in the old version of Amiot, is inexpressibly delicate, simple, and marvellous, but sometimes offends us, for nature there 'plays her virgin fancies.'

Beautiful as these compositions are, when the imagination of the writer is sufficiently stored with accurate observations on human nature, in their birth, like many of the fine arts, the zealots of an ascetic religion opposed their progress. However Heliodorus may have delighted those who were not insensible to the felicities of a free imagination, and to the enchanting elegancies of style, he raised himself, among his brother ecclesiastics, enemies, who at length so far prevailed that, in a synod, it was declared that his performance was dangerous to young persons, and that if the author did not suppress it, he must resign his bishoprick. We are told he preferred his romance to his bishoprick. Even so late as in Racine's time it was held a crime to peruse these unhalloved pages. He informs us that the first effusions of his muse were in consequence of studying that ancient romance, which his tutor observing him to devour with the raptures of a fascinated man, snatched from his hands and flung it in the fire. A second copy experienced the same fate. What could Racine do ? He bought a third, and took the precaution of devouring it secretly till he got it by heart ; after which he offered it to the pedagogue with a smile, to burn like the others.

The decision of these ascetic bigots was founded in their opinion of the immorality of such works. They alleged that the writers paint too warmly to the imagination, address themselves too forcibly to the passions, and in general, by the freedom of their representations, hover on the borders of indecency. Let it be sufficient, however, to observe, that those who condemned the liberties which these writers take with the imagination, could indulge themselves with the Anacreontic voluptuousness of the wise Solomon, when sanctioned by the authority of the church.

The marvellous powers of romance over the human mind is exemplified in this curious anecdote of oriental literature.

Mahomet found they had such an influence over the imaginations of his followers, that he has expressly forbidden them in his Koran ; and the reason is given in the following anecdote. An Arabian merchant having long resided in Persia, returned to his own country while the prophet was publishing his Koran. The merchant, among his other riches, had a treasure of romances concerning the Persian heroes. These he related to his delighted countrymen, who considered them to be so excellent, that the legends of the Koran were neglected, and they plainly told the prophet that the 'Persian Tales' were superior to his. Alarmed, he immediately had a visitation from the angel Gabriel, declaring them impious and pernicious, hateful to God and Mahomet. This checked their currency ; and all true believers yielded up the exquisite delight of poetic fictions for the insipidity of religious ones. Yet these romances may be said to have outlived the Koran itself ; for they have spread into regions which the Koran could never penetrate. Even to this day Colonel Capper, in his travels across the Desert, saw 'Arabians sitting round a fire, listening to their tales, with such attention and pleasure, as totally to forget the fatigue and hardship with which an instant before they were entirely overcome.' And Wood, in his journey to Palmyra :—At night the Arabs sat in a circle drinking coffee, while one of the company diverted the rest by relating a piece of history on the subject of Love or War, or with an extemporale tale.

Mr Ellis has given us 'Specimens of the Early English Metrical Romances,' and Ritson and Weber have printed two collections of them entire, valued by the poetical antiquary. Learned inquirers have traced the origin of romantic fiction to various sources.—From Scandinavia issued forth the giants, dragons, witches, and enchanters. The curious reader will be gratified by 'Illustrations of Northern Antiquities, a volume in quarto; where he will extract from 'the Book of Heroes' and 'the Nibelungen Lay,' with many other metrical tales from the old German, Danish, Swedish, and Icelandic languages. In the East, Arabian fancy bent her Iris of many-softened hues, over a delightful land of fiction; while the Welsh, their emigration to Britany, are believed to have brought with them their national fables. That subsequent race of minstrels known by the name of Troubadours in the South of France, composed their erotic or sentimental poems; and these romancers called Trouvours, or finders in the North of France, culled and compiled their domestic tales in Fablesans, Dits, Contes, or Lai. Millot, Sainte Palaye, and Le Grand, have preserved, in their 'Histories of the Troubadours,' their literary compositions. They were a romantic race of ambulatory poets; military and religious subjects their favourite themes; yet bold and satirical on princes, and even on priests: severe moralisers, though sometimes in their verse; so refined and chaste in their manners, that few husbands were alarmed at the enthusiastic language they addressed to their wives. The most romantic incidents are told of their loves. But love and its power passion were clearly distinguished from each other in their singular intercourse with their 'Dames.' The object of their mind was separated from the object of their senses; the virtuous lady to whom they vowed their hearts bore in their language styled 'la dame de ses pensées,' a lady distinct being from their other mistress! Such was the Platonic chimeras that charmed in the age of chivalry; the Laura of Petrarch might have been no other than the lady of his thoughts.

From such productions in their improved state poets of all nations have drawn their richest inventions. The agreeable wildness of that fancy which characterised the Eastern nations was often caught by the crusaders. When they returned home, they mingled in their own the customs of each country. The Saracens, being of another religion, brave, desperate, and fighting for their fatherland, were enlarged to their fears, under the tremendous form of Paganism Giants, while the reader of that day followed with trembling sympathy the Red-cross Knight. This fiction embellished religion, and religion invigorated fiction; and such incidents have enlivened the cantos of Ariosto, and adorned the epic of Tasso. Spenser is the child of their creation; and it is certain that we are indebted to them for some of the bold and strong touches of Milton. Our great poet marks his affection for 'these lofty Fables and Romances, among which his young feet wandered.' Collins was bewildered among their magical seductions; and Dr Johnson was enthusiastically delighted by the old Spanish felio romance of 'Felixmarte of Hircania,' and similar works. The most ancient romances were originally composed in verse before they were converted into prose: no wonder that the lacerated members of the poet have been cherished by the sympathy of poetical souls. Don Quixote's was a very agreeable insanity.

The most voluminous of these ancient Romances is Le Roman de Perceforest. I have seen an edition in six small folio volumes, and its author has been called the French Homer by the writers of his age. In the class of romances of chivalry we have several translations in the black-letter. These books are very rare, and their price is as voluminous. It is extraordinary that these writers were so unconscious of their future fame, that not one of their names has travelled down to us. There were eager readers in their days, but not a solitary bibliographer! All these romances now require some indulgence for their prolixity, and their Platonic amours,—but they have not been surpassed in the wildness of their inventions, the ingenuity of their incidents, the simplicity of their style, and their curious manners. Many a Homer lies hid among them; but a celebrated Italian critic suggested to me that many of the fables of Homer are only disguised and degraded in the romances of chivalry. Those who vilify them as only barbarous imitations of classical fancy, condemn them as some do Gothic architecture, as mere corruptions of a purer style: such critics form their decision by preconceived notions; they are but indifferent philosophers, and to us seem to be deficient in magnitude.

As a specimen I select two romantic adventures:—

The title of the extensive romance of Perceforest is, 'The most elegant, delicious, mellifluous, and delightful history of Perceforest, King of Great Britain, &c.' The most ancient edition is that of 1528. The writers of these Gothic fables, lest they should be considered as mere triflers pretended to an allegorical meaning concealed under the texture of their fable. From the following adventure we learn the power of beauty in making ten days appear as yesterday! Alexander the great, in search of Perceforest, parts with his knights in an enchanted wood, and each vows they will not remain longer than one night in one place. Alexander, accompanied by a page, arrives at Sebilla's castle, who is a sorceress. He is taken by her witcheries and beauty, and the page, by the lady's maid, falls into the same mistake as his master, who thinks he is there only one night. They enter the castle with deep wounds, and issue perfectly recovered. I transcribe the latter part as a specimen of the manner. When they were once out of the castle, the king said, 'Truly, Floridas, I know not how it has been with me; but certainly Sebilla is a very honourable lady, and very beautiful, and very charming in conversation. Sire, (said Floridas,) it is true; but one thing surprises me:—how is it that our wounds have healed in one night? I thought at least ten or fifteen days were necessary. Truly, said the king, that is astonishing! Now king Alexander met Gadifer, king of Scotland, and the valiant knight Le Tors. Well, said the king, have ye news of the king of England? Ten days we have hunted him, and cannot find him out. How, said Alexander, did we not separate yesterday from each other? In God's name, said Gadifer, what means your majesty? It is ten days! Have a care what you say, cried the king. Sire, replied Gadifer, it is so; ask Le Tors: On my honour, said Le Tors, the king of Scotland speaks truth. Then, said the king, some of us are enchanted. Floridas, didst thou not think we separated yesterday? Truly, truly, your majesty, I thought so! But when I saw our wounds healed in one night, I had some suspicion that we were enchanted.'

In the old romance of Melusina, this lovely fairy, though to the world unknown as such, enamoured of Count Raymond, marries him, but first extorts a solemn promise that he will never disturb her on Saturdays. On those days the inferior parts of her body is metamorphosed to that of a mermaid, as a punishment for a former error. Agitated by the malicious insinuations of a friend, his curiosity and his jealousy one day conduct him to the spot she retired to at those times. It was a darkened passage in the dungeon of the fortress. His hand gropes its way till it feels an iron gate oppose it; nor can he discover a single chink, but at length perceives by his touch a loose nail; he places his sword in its head and screws it out. Through this hole he sees Melusina in the horrid form she is compelled to assume. That tender mistress, transformed into a monster bathing in a fount, flashing the spray of the water from a scaly tail! He repents of his fatal curiosity: she reproaches him, and their mutual happiness is for ever lost! The moral design of the tale evidently warns the lover to revere a Woman's Secret!

Such are the works which were the favourite amusements of our English court, and which doubtless had a due effect in refining the manners of the age, in diffusing that splendid military genius, and that tender devotion to the fair sex which dazzle us in the reign of Edward III, and through that enchanting labyrinth of History constructed by the gallant Froissart. In one of the revenue rolls of Henry III, there is an entry of 'Silver claps and studs for his majesty's great book of Romances.' Dr Moore observes that the enthusiastic admiration of chivalry which Edward III manifested during the whole course of his reign was probably in some measure owing to his having studied the clapsed book in his great-grandfather's library.

The Italian romances of the fourteenth century were spread abroad in great numbers. They formed the polite literature of the day. But if it is not permitted to authors freely to express their ideas, and give full play to the imagination, these works must never be placed in the study of the rigid moralist. They, indeed pushed their indelicacy to the verge of grossness, and seemed rather to seek than to avoid scenes, which a modern would blush to describe. They, to employ the expression of one of their authors, were not ashamed to name what God had created. Cinthio, Bandello, and others, but chiefly Boccaccio, rendered libertinism agreeable by the fascinating charms of a polished style and a luxuriant imagination.

This, however, must not be admitted as an apology for immoral works; for poison is not the less poison even when delicious. Such works were, and still continue to be, the favourites of a nation stigmatised for being prone to impure amours. They are still curious in their editions, and are not parsimonious in their price for what they call an uncastrated copy.* There are many Italians, not literary men, who are in possession of an ample library of these old novelists.

If we pass over the moral irregularities of these romances, we may discover a rich vein of invention, which only requires to be released from that rubbish which disfigures it, to become of an invaluable price. The Decamerones, the Hecatomitidi, and the Novellas of these writers, translated into English, made no inconsiderable figure in the little library of our Shakespeare. Chaucer had been a notorious imitator and lover of them. His 'Knight's Tale' is little more than a paraphrase of 'Boccaccio's Teseoide.' Fontaine has caught all their charms with all their licentiousness. From such works, these great poets, and many of their contemporaries, frequently borrowed their plots; not uncommonly kindled at their flame the ardour of their genius; but bending too submissively to the taste of their age, in extracting the ore they have not purified it of the alloy. The origin of these tales must be traced to the inventions of the Trouveteurs, who doubtless often adopted them from various nations. Of these tales, Le Grand has printed a curious collection; and of the writers Mr Ellis observes, in his preface to 'Way's Fables,' that the authors of the 'Cento Novelle Antiche,' Boccaccio, Bandello, Chaucer, Gower,—in short, the writers of all Europe, have probably made use of the inventions of the elder fabulists. They have borrowed their general outlines, which they have filled up with colours of their own, and have exercised their ingenuity in varying the drapery, in combining the groups, and in forming them into more regular and animated pictures.

We now turn to the French romances of the last century, called heroic, from the circumstance of their authors adopting the name of some hero. The manners are the modern-antique; and the characters are of a sort of beings made out of the old epical, the Arcadian pastoral, and the Parisian sentimentality and affectation of the days of Voltaire. The Astrea of D'Urfé greatly contributed to their perfection. As this work is founded on several curious circumstances, it shall be the subject of the following article; for it may be considered as a literary curiosity. The Astrea was followed by the illustrious Bassa, Artamene, or the Great Cyrus, Clelia, &c, which, though not adapted to the present age, once gave celebrity to their authors; and the Great Cyrus, in ten volumes, passed through five or six editions. Their style, as well as that of the Astrea, is diffuse and languid; yet Zaide, and the Princess of Cleves, are master-pieces of the kind. Such works formed the first studies of Rousseau, who, with his father, would sit up all night, till warned by the chirping of the swallows how foolishly they had spent it! Some incidents in his Nouvelle Heloise have been retraced to these sources; and they certainly entered greatly into the formation of his characters.

Such romances at length were regarded as pernicious to good sense, taste, and literature. It was in this light they were considered by Boileau, after he had indulged in them in his youth.

A celebrated Jesuit pronounced an oration against these works. The rhetorician exaggerates, and hurls his thunder on flowers. He entreats the magistrates not to suffer foreign romances to be scattered amongst the people, but to lay on them heavy penalties as on prohibited goods; and represents this prevailing taste as being more pestilential than the plague itself. He has drawn a striking picture of a family devoted to romance reading; he there describes women occupied day and night with their perusal; children just escaped from the lap of their nurse grasping in their little hands the fairy tales; and a country squire seated in an old arm-chair, reading to his family the most wonderful passages of the ancient works of chivalry.

These romances went out of fashion with our squeamish hats; they had exhausted the patience of the public, and from them sprung Novels. They attempted to allure attention by this inviting title, and reducing their works from ten to two volumes. The name of romance, including imaginary heroes and extravagant passions, disgusted; and they substituted scenes of domestic life, and touched our common feelings by pictures of real nature. Heroes were not now taken from the throne: they were something even sought after amongst the lowest ranks of the people. Scarron seems to allude sarcastically to this degradation of the heroes of Fiction: for in hinting at a new odyssey he had projected, he tells us that he gave it up suddenly, because he had 'heard that his hero had just been hanged at Mans.'

* Cinthio's Novels, in two very thick volumes 12mo, are commonly sold at the price of five or six guineas. Bandello is equally high; and even in Pope's time it appears by the correspondence of Lady Pomfret, that a copy sold at fifteen guineas.

Novels, as they were long manufactured, form a library of illiterate authors for illiterate readers; but as they created by genius, are precious to the philosopher. They paint the character of an individual or the manners of an age more perfectly than any other species of composition: it is in novels we observe as it were passing under our eyes the refined frivolity of the French; the gloomy and disordered sensibility of the German; and the petty intrigues of the modern Italian in some Venetian Novel. We have shown the world that we possess writers of the first order in this delightful province of Fiction and Truth; for every Fiction invented naturally must be true. After the abundant invective poured on this class of books it is time to settle for ever the controversy, by asserting that these works of fiction are among the most instructive of every polished nation, and must contain all the useful truths of human life, if composed with genius. They are pictures of the passions, useful to our youth to contemplate. That acute philosopher, Adam Smith, has given an opinion most favourable to Novels. 'The poets and romancers writers who best paint the refinements and delicacies: love and friendship, and of all other private and domestic affections, Racine and Voltaire, Richardson, Marivaux and Riccoboni, are in this case much better instructors than Zeno, Chrysippus, or Epictetus.'

The history of romances has been recently given by B. Dunlop, with many pleasing details; but this work should be accompanied by the learned Lenglet du Fresnoy's Bibliothèque des Romans, published under the name of M. C. Gordon de Perce! which will be found useful for its immediate reference for titles, dates, and a copious catalogue of romances and novels to the year 1734.

THE ASTREA.

I bring the Astrea forwards to point out the ingenious manner by which a fine imagination can veil the common incidents of life, and turn whatever it touches into gold.

Honoré D'Urfé was the descendant of an illustrious family. His brother Anne married Diana of Chateaufort, the wealthy heiress of another great house. After marriage of no less duration than twenty-two years, this union was broken by the desire of Anne herself, for a cause which the delicacy of Diana had never revealed. Anne then became an ecclesiastic. Some time afterwards Honoré, desirous of retaining the great wealth of Diana's family, addressed this lady, and married her. This union, however, did not prove fortunate. Diana, like the goddess of that name, was a huntress, continually surrounded by her dogs.—They dined with her at table, and slept with her in bed.—This insupportable nuisance could not be patiently endured by the elegant Honoré. He was also disgusted with the barrenness of the huntress Diana who was only delivered every year of abortions. He separated from her, and retired to Piedmont, where he passed his remaining days in peace, without feeling the thorns of marriage and ambition ranking in his heart. In this retreat he composed his Astrea; a pastoral romance, which was the admiration of Europe during half a century. It forms a striking picture of human life, for the incidents are facts beautifully concealed. They relate the amours and gallantries of the court of Henry IV. The personages in the Astrea display a rich invention; and the work might be still read, were it not for those wire-drawn and languishing conversations, or rather disputations, which they then introduced into romances. In a modern edition of this work, by the Abbé Souhai, he has corrected these tiresome dialogues; the work still consists of ten duodecimo volumes.

Patru, when a youth, visited Honoré in his retirement, and collected from him with some difficulty a few explanations of those circumstances which he had concealed under a veil of fiction.

In this romance, Celidée, to cure the unfortunate Cédon, and to deprive Thimire at the same time of every reason for jealousy, tears her face with a pointed diamond, and disfigures it in so cruel a manner, that she excites horror in the breast of Thimire; who so ardently admires this exertion of virtue, that he loves her, hideous as she is represented, still more than when she was most beautiful. Heaven, to be just, to these two lovers, restores the beauty of Celidée; which is effected by a sympathetic powder. This romantic incident is thus explained: One of the French princes (Celidon,) when he returned from Italy, treated with coldness his admirable princess (Celidée); this was the effect of his violent passion, which had now become jealousy. The coolness subsisted till the prince was imprisoned, for state-affairs, in the woods of Vincennes. The princess, with the permission of the court, followed him into his confinement. This proof of her love soon brought back the wandering heart and affections of the prince. The small-pox seized her; which is the painted diamond, and the dreadful disfigurement of her face. She was so fortunate as to escape being marked by this disease; which is meant by the sympathetic powder. This trivial incident is happily turned into the marvellous: that a wife should choose to be imprisoned with her husband is not singular; to escape being marked by the small-pox happens every day; but to romance, as he has done, on such common circumstances, is beautiful and ingenious.

D'URFÉ, when a boy, is said to have been enamoured of Diana; this indeed has been questioned. D'URFÉ, however, was sent to the island of Malta to enter into that order of knighthood; and in his absence Diana was married to Anne. What an affliction for Honoré on his return, to see her married, and to his brother! His affection did not diminish, but he concealed it in respectful silence. He had some knowledge of his brother's unhappiness, and on this probably founded his hopes. After several years, during which the modest Diana had uttered no complaint, Anne declared herself; and shortly afterwards Honoré, as we have noticed, married Diana.

Our author has described the parties under this false appearance of marriage. He assumes the names of Celidon and Sylvander, and gives Diana those of Astrea and Dana. He is Sylvander and she Astrea while she is married to Anne; and he Celidon and she Diana when the marriage is dissolved. Sylvander is represented always as a lover who sighs secretly; nor does Diana declare her passion till overcome by the long sufferings of her faithful shepherd. For this reason Astrea and Diana, as well as Sylvander and Celidon, go together, prompted by the same despair, to the Fountain of the Truth of Love.

Sylvander is called an unknown shepherd, who has no other wealth than his flock: because our author was the youngest of his family, or rather a knight of Malta, who possessed nothing but honour.

Celidon in despair throws himself into a river; this refers to his voyage to Malta. Under the name of Alexis he displays the friendship of Astrea for him, and all those innocent freedoms which passed between them as relatives from this circumstance he has contrived a difficulty infinitely delicate.

Something of passion is to be discovered in these expressions of friendship. When Alexis assumes the name of Celidon, he calls that love which Astrea had mistaken for paternal affection. This was the trying moment. For though she loved him, she is rigorous in her duty and honour. She says, 'what will they think of me if I unite myself to him, after permitting, for so many years, those familiarities which a brother may have taken with a sister, who, who knew that in fact I remained unmarried?'

How she got over this nice scruple does not appear; it was, however, for a long time a great obstacle to the felicity of our author. There is an incident which shows the purity of this married virgin, who was fearful the liberties she allowed Celidon might be ill construed. Phillis tells the druid Adamas, that Astrea was seen sleeping by the Fountain of the Truth of Love, and that the unicorns which guarded those waters were observed to approach her and lay their heads on her lap. According to fable, it is one of the properties of these animals never to approach any female but a maiden; at this strange difficulty our druid remains surprised; while Astrea has thus given an incontrovertible proof of her purity.

The history of Philander is that of the elder D'URFÉ. None but boys disguised as girls, and girls as boys, appear in the history. It was in this manner he concealed, without offending modesty, the defect of his brother. To mark the truth of this history, when Philander is disguised as a woman, while he converses with Astrea of his love, he frequently alludes to his misfortune, although in another sense.

Philander, ready to expire, will die with the glorious name of the husband of Astrea. He entreats her to grant him this favour; she accords it to him, and swears before the gods that she receives him in her heart for her husband. The truth is, he enjoyed nothing but the name. Philander dies too, in combating with a hideous Moor, which is the personification of his conscience, and which at length compelled him to quit so beautiful an object, and one so worthy of being eternally beloved.

The gratitude of Sylvander, on the point of being sacrificed, represents the consent of Honoré's parents to dissolve his vow of celibacy, and unite him to Diana; and the druid Adamas represents the ecclesiastical power. The Fountain of the Truth of Love is that of marriage; the unicorns are the symbols of that purity which should ever guard it; and the flaming eyes of the lions, which are also there, represent those inconveniences attending marriage, but over which a faithful passion easily triumphs.

In this manner has our author disguised his own private history; and blended in his works a number of little amours which passed at the court of Henry the Great. I might proceed in explaining these allegories; but what I have noticed will be sufficient to give an idea of the ingenuity of the author.

Fontenelle, in his introduction to his Eclogues, has made a pretty comparison of this species of pastoral romance with that of chivalry, which turned the brain of Don Quixote. When he reads the inimitable acts of Amadis, so many castles forced, giants hacked, magicians confounded, he does not regret that these are only fables; but he adds, when I read the Astrea, where in a softened repose love occupies the minds of amiable heroes, where love decides on their fate, where wisdom itself preserves so little of its rigid air, that it becomes a zealous partisan of love, even to Adamas, the sovereign druid, I then grieve that it is only a romance!

POETS LAUREAT.

The present article is a sketch of the history of Poets Laureat, from a memoir of the French Academy, by the Abbé Rœnel.

The custom of crowning poets is as ancient as poetry itself; it has indeed frequently varied; it existed, however, as late as the reign of Theodosius, when it was abolished as a remain of paganism.

When the barbarians overspread Europe, few appeared to merit this honour, and fewer who could have read their works. It was about the time of Petrarch, that Poetry resumed its ancient lustre; he was publicly honoured with the Laurel Crown. It was in this century (the thirteenth) that the establishment of Bachelor and Doctor, was fixed in the universities. Those who were found worthy of the honour obtained the laurel of Bachelor, or the laurel of Doctor; Laurea Baccalariatus; Laurea Doctoratus. At their reception they not only assumed this title, but they also had a crown of laurel placed on their heads.

To this ceremony the ingenious writer attributes the revival of the custom. The poets were not slow in putting in their claims to what they had most right; and their patrons sought to encourage them by these honourable distinctions.

The following formula is the exact style of those which are yet employed in the universities to confer the degree of Bachelor and Doctor, and serves to confirm the conjecture of Rœnel.

'We, count and senator,' (Count d'Anguillara, who bestowed the laurel on Petrarch) 'for us and our College declare Francis Petrarch, great poet and historian, and for a special mark of his quality of poet, we have placed with our hands on his head a crown of laurel, granting to him, by the tenor of these presents, and by the authority of King Robert, of the senate and the people of Rome, in the poetic, as well as in the historic art, and generally in whatever relates to the said arts, as well in this holy city as elsewhere, the free and entire power of reading, disputing, and interpreting all ancient books, to make new ones, and compose poems, which, God assisting, shall endure from age to age.'

In Italy these honours did not long flourish; although Tasso dignified the laurel crown by his acceptance of it. Many got crowned who were unworthy of the distinction. The laurel was even bestowed on Querno, whose character is given in the Dunciad:

'Not with more glee, by hands pontific crown'd,
With scarlet hats wide-waving circled round,
Rome in her capitol saw Querno sit,
Thron'd on seven hills, the Antichrist of wit.'

Canto II.

This man was made laureate, for the joke's sake; his poetry was inspired by his cups, a kind of poet who came in with the dessert; and he recited twenty thousand verses. He was rather the arch-buffoon than the arch-poet to Leo X, though honoured with the latter title. They invented for him a new kind of laureated honour, and in the intermixture of the foliage raised to Apollo, sily inserted the vine and the cabbage leaves, which he evidently deserved, from his extreme dexterity in clearing the pontiff's dishes and emptying his goblets.

Urban VIII had a juster and more elevated idea of the children of Fancy. It appears that he possessed much poetic sensibility. Of him it is recorded, that he wrote a letter to Chiabrera to felicitate him on the success of his poetry: letters written by a pope were then an honour only paid to crowned heads. One is pleased also with another testimony of his elegant dispositions. Charmed with a poem which Bracciolini presented to him, he gave him the surname of DELLE-APE, of the bees; which were the arms of this amiable pope. He, however, never crowned these favourite bards with the laurel, which, probably, he deemed unworthy of them.

In Germany the laureate honours flourished under the reign of Maximilian the First. He founded in 1504 a poetical College at Vienna; reserving to himself and the regent the power of bestowing the laurel. But the institution, notwithstanding this well-concerted scheme, fell into disrepute, owing to a crowd of claimants who were fired with the rage of versifying, and who, though destitute of poetic talents, had the laurel bestowed on them. Thus it became a prostituted honour; and satires were incessantly levelled against the usurpers of the crown of Apollo: it seems, notwithstanding, always to have had charms in the eyes of the Germans, who did not reflect, as the Abbé elegantly expresses himself, that it faded when it passed over so many heads.

The Emperor of Germany retains the laureate ship in all its splendour. The select bard is called Il Poeta Cesareo. Apostolo Zeno, as celebrated for his erudition as for his poetic powers, was succeeded by that most enchanting poet, Metastasio.

The France never had a Poet Laureate, though they had Regal Poets; for none were ever solemnly crowned. The Spanish nation, always desirous of titles of honour, seem to have known the Laureate; but little information concerning it can be gathered from their authors.

Representing our own country little can be said but what is mentioned by Selden. John Kay, who dedicated a History of Rhodes to Edward IV, takes the title of his humble Poet Laureate. Gower and Chaucer were laureates; so was likewise the rhyming Skelton of Henry VIII. In the Acts of Rymer, there is a character of Henry VII with the title of pro Poeta Laureato.

It does not appear that our poets were ever solemnly crowned as in other countries. Selden, after all his recondite researches, is satisfied with saying, that some trace of this distinction is to be found in our nation. It is, however, certain that our kings from time immemorial have placed a miserable dependant in their household appointment, who was sometimes called the King's poet, and the King's versificator. It is probable that at length the selected bard assumed the title of Poet Laureat, without receiving the honours of the ceremony; or at the most, the crown of laurel was a mere obscure custom practised at our universities, and not attended with great public distinction. It was often placed on the skull of a pedant than wreathed on the head of a man of genius.

ANGELO POLITIAN.

Angelo Politian, an Italian, was one of the most polished writers of the fifteenth century. Bailett has placed him amongst his celebrated children; for he was a writer at twelve years of age. The Muses indeed cherished him in his cradle, and the Graces hung round it their most beautiful wreaths. When he became professor of the Greek language, such were the charms of his lectures, that one Chalcondylas, a native of Greece, saw himself abandoned by his pupils, who resorted to the delightful disquisitions of the elegant Politian. Critics of various nations have acknowledged that his poetical versions have frequently excelled the originals. This happy genius was lodged in a most unhappy form; nor were his morals untainted: it is only in his literary compositions that he appears perfect.

Monnoye, in his edition of the Menagiana, as a specimen of his Epistles, gives a translation of the letter, which serves as prefatory and dedicatory; and has accompanied it by a commentary. The letter is replete with literature, though void of pedantry; a barren subject is embellished by its happy turns. It is addressed to his patron Monsignor Pietro de Medicis; and was written about a month before the writer's death. Perhaps no author has so admirably defended himself from the incertitude of criticism and the fastidiousness of critics. His wit and his humour are delicate; and few compositions are sprinkled with such Attic salt.

MY LORD!

You have frequently urged me to collect my letters, to revise and to publish them in a volume. I have now gathered them, that I might not omit any mark of that obedience which I owe to him, on whom I rest all my hopes, and all my prosperity. I have not, however, collected them all, because that would have been a more laborious task, than to have gathered the scattered leaves of the Sibyl. It was never, indeed, with an intention of forming my letters into one body that I wrote them, but merely at occasion prompted, and as the subjects presented themselves without seeking for them. I never retained copies except of a few, which less fortunate, I think, than the others, were thus favoured for the sake of the verses they contained. To form, however a tolerable volume, I have also inserted some written by others, but only those with which several ingenious scholars favoured me, and which, perhaps, may put the reader in good humour with my own.

There is one thing for which some will be inclined to censure me; the style of my letters is very unequal; and, to confess the truth, I did not find myself always in the same humour, and the same modes of expression were not adapted to every person and every topic. They will not fail then to observe, when they read such a diversity of letters (I mean if they do read them) that I have composed not epistles, but (once more) miscellanies.

I hope, my Lord, notwithstanding this, that amongst such a variety of opinions, of those who write letters, and of those who give precepts how letters should be written, I shall find some apology. Some, probably, will deny that they are Ciceronian. I can answer such, and not without good authority, that in epistolary composition we must not regard Cicero as a model. Another perhaps will say, that I imitate Cicero. And him I will answer by observing, that I wish nothing better, than to be capable of grasping something of this great man, were it but his shadow!

Another will wish that I had borrowed a little from the manner of Pliny the orator, because his profound sense and accuracy were greatly esteemed. I shall oppose him by expressing my contempt of all the writers of the age of Pliny. If it should be observed, that I have imitated the manner of Pliny, I shall then screen myself by what Sidenius Apollinaris, an author who is by no means disreputable, says in commendation of his epistolary style.—Do I resemble Symmachus? I shall not be sorry, for they distinguish his openness and conscience. Am I considered in no wise resembling him? I shall confess that I am not pleased with his dry manner.

Will my letters be condemned for their length? Plato, Aristotle, Thucydides, and Cicero, have all written long ones. Will some of them be criticised for their brevity? I allege in my favour the examples of Dion, Brutus Appollonius Philostratus, Marcus Antonius, Alciphron, Julian, Symmachus, and also Lucian, who vulgarly, but falsely, is believed to have been Phalaris.

I shall be censured for having treated of topics which are not generally considered as proper for epistolary composition. I admit this censure, provided while I am condemned, Seneca also shares in the condemnation. Another will not allow of a sententious manner in my letters; I will still justify myself by Seneca. Another, on the contrary, desires abrupt sententious periods; Dyonysius shall answer him for me, who maintains, that pointed sentences should not be admitted into letters.

Is my style too perspicuous? It is precisely that which Plinius admires. Is it obscure? Such is that of Cicero to Atticus. Negligent? An agreeable negligence in letters is more graceful than elaborate ornaments. Labour? Nothing can be more proper, since we send epistles to our friends as a kind of presents. If they display too nice an arrangement, the Halicarnassian shall vindicate me. If there is none, Artemon says there should be none.

Now as a good and pure Latinity has its peculiar taste, its manners, and (to express myself thus) its Atticisms; if in this sense a letter shall be found not sufficiently Attic, so much the better; for what was Herod the sophist censured? but that having been born an Athenian, he affected too much to appear one in his language. Should a letter seem too Attical; still better, since it was by discovering Theophrastus, who was no Athenian, that a good old woman of Athens laid hold of a word, and shamed him.

Shall one letter be found not sufficiently serious? I love to jest. Or is it too grave? I am pleased with gravity. Is another full of figures? Letters being the images of discourse, figures have the effect of graceful action in conversation. Are they deficient in figures? This is just what characterises a letter, this want of figures! Does it discover the genius of the writer? This frankness is recommended. Does it conceal it? The writer did not think proper to paint himself; and it is one requisite in a letter, that it should be void of ostentation. You express yourself, some one will observe, in common terms on common topics, and in new terms on new topics. The style is thus adapted to the subject. No, no, he will answer; it is in common terms you express new ideas, and in new terms common ideas. Very well! It is because I have not forgotten an ancient Greek precept which expressly recommends this.

It is thus by attempting to be ambidexterous I try to ward off attacks. My critics will however criticise me as they please. It will be sufficient for me, my Lord, to be assured of having satisfied you, by my letters, if they are good; or by my obedience, if they are not so.

Florence, 1494.

ORIGINAL LETTER OF QUEEN ELIZABETH.

In the Cottonian Library, Vespasian, F. III, is preserved a letter written by Queen Elizabeth (then Princess) to her sister Queen Mary. It appears, by this epistle, that Mary had desired to have her picture; and in gratifying the wishes of her majesty, Elizabeth accompanies the present with the following elaborate letter. It bears no date of the year in which it was written; but her place of residence is marked to be at Hatfield. There she had retired to enjoy the silent pleasures of a studious life, and to be distant from the dangerous politics of the time. When Mary died Elizabeth was at Hatfield; the letter must have been written shortly before this circumstance took place. She was at the time of its composition in habitual intercourse with the most excellent writers of antiquity; her letter displays this in every part of it; it is polished and re-polished. It has also the merit of now being first published.

LETTER.

'Like as the riche man that dayly gathereth riches to riches, and to one bag of money layeth a greater sort til it come to infinit, so me thinkes, your Maiestie not beinge cōfused with many benefites and gentlines shewed to me afore this time, dothe now increase them in askinge and desiring wher you may bid and commaunde, requiring a thinge not worthy the desirings for it selfe, but made worthy for your highnes request. My pictur I mene, in which if the inward good mynde towards your grace might as wel be declared as the outwarde face and countenance shal be seen, I wold not have taried the commaundment but prevent it, nor have bide the last to graunt but the first to offer it. For the face, I graunt, I wold wel blischie to offer, but the mynde I shal neuer be ashamed to present. For thogh from the grace of the pictur, the colours may fade by time, may glue by water, may be spotted by chance, yet the other nor time with her swift winges shall ouertake, nor the mistie cloudes with their loweringes may darken, nor chance with her slippery fote may overthrow. Of this althogh yet the profe could not be greate because the occasions be to bide but smal, notwithstandinge as a dog hathe a day, so may I perchance haue time to declare it in diides wher now I do write them but in wordes. And further I shall most humbly beseeche your Maiestie that when you shal loke on my pictur you wil witnesse to thinke that as you haue but the outwarde shadow of the body afore you, so my inward minde wisheth, that the body it selfe wer oftener in your presence; howbeit because bothe my so beinge I thinke couldo do your Maiestie litle pleasure thogh my selfe great good, and againe because I se as yet not the time agreeing thereuto, I shal lerne to folow this sainge of Orace, Feras non culpes quod vitari non potest. And thus I wil (trobblinge your Maiestie I fere) ende with my most humble thankes, beseeching God longe to preserue you to his honour, to your confort, to the realmes profit, and to my joy. From Hatfild this 1 day of May.

Your Maiesties most humbly Sister and Seruante.

ELIZABETH.

ANNE BULLEN.

That minute detail of circumstances frequently found in writers of the history of their own times is more interesting than the elegant and general narratives of later, and probably of more philosophical historians. It is in the artless recitals of memoir-writers, that the imagination is struck with a lively impression, and fastens on petty circumstances which must be passed over by the classical historian. The writings of Brantome, Comines, Froissart, and others, are dictated by their natural feelings; while the passions of modern writers are temperate with dispassionate philosophy, or inflamed by the virulence of faction. History instructs, but Memoirs delight. These prefatory observations may serve as an apology for Anecdotes, which are gathered from obscure corners, on which the dignity of the historian must not dwell.

In Housaie's Memoirs, Vol. I, p. 435, a little circumstance is recorded concerning the decapitation of the unfortunate Anne Bullen, which illustrates an observation of Hume. Our historian notices that her executioner was a Frenchman of Calais, who was supposed to have uncommon skill; it is probable that the following incident might have been preserved by tradition in France, from the account of the executioner himself.—Anne Bullen being on the scaffold, would not consent to have her eyes covered with a bandage, saying, that she had no fear of death. All that the divine who assisted at her execution could obtain from her was, that she would shut her eyes. But as she was opening them at every moment, the executioner could not bear their tender and mild glances; fearful of missing his aim, he was obliged to invent an expedient to behead the queen. He drew off his shoes, and approached her silently: while he was at her left hand, another person advanced at her right, who made a great noise in walking, so that this circumstance drawing the attention of Anne, she turned her face from the executioner, who was enabled by this artifice to strike the fatal blow, without being disarmed by that spirit of affecting resignation which shone in the eyes of the lovely Anne Bullen.

'The common Executioner,
Whose heart th' accusum'd sight of death makes hard,
Falls not the axe upon the humbled neck
But first begs pardon.'

Shakespeare.

JAMES I.

It was usual, in the reign of James the First, when they compared it with the preceding glorious one, to distinguish him by the title of Queen James, and his illustrious predecessor by that of King Elizabeth! Sir Anthony Weldon informs us, 'that when James the First sent Sir Roger Aston as his messenger to Elizabeth, Sir Roger was always placed in the lobby: the hangings being turned so that he might see the queen dancing to a little fiddle, which was to no other end than that he should tell his master, by her youthful disposition, how likely he was to come to the crown he so much thirsted after.'—and indeed, when at her death this same knight, whose origin was low, and whose language was suitable to that origin, appeared before the English council, he could not conceal his Scottish rapture, for, asked how the king did? he replied, 'even, my lords, like a poore man wandering about forty years in a wilderness and barren soyle, and now arrived at the Land of Promise.' A curious anecdote, respecting the economy of the court in these reigns, is noticed in some manuscript memoirs written in James's reign, preserved in a family of distinction. The lady, who wrote these memoirs, tells us that a great change had taken place in cleanliness, since the last reign; for having rose from her chair, she found, on her departure, that she had the honour of carrying upon her some companions who must have been inhabitants of the palace. The court of Elizabeth was celebrated occasionally for its magnificence, and always for its nicety. James was singularly effeminate; he could not behold a drawn sword without shuddering; was much too partial to handsome men; and appears to merit the bitter satire of Churchill. If wanting other proofs, we should only read the second volume of 'Royal Letters,' 6987, in the Harleian collections, which contains Stenies's correspondence with James. The gross familiarity of Buckingham's address is couched in such terms as these:—he calls his majesty 'Dere dad and Gossope!' and concludes his letters with 'your humble slave and dogge, Stenie.' He was a most weak, but not quite a vicious man; yet his expertness in the art of dissimulation was very great indeed. He called this King-Craft. Sir Anthony Weldon gives a lively anecdote of this dissimulation in the king's behaviour to the Earl of Somerset at the very moment he had prepared to disgrace him. The earl accompanied the king to Royston, and, to his apprehension, never parted from him with more seeming affection, though the king well knew he should never see him more. 'The earl when he kissed his hand, the king hung about his neck, slapping his cheeks, saying—for God's sake, when shall I see thee again? On my soul I shall neither eat nor sleep until you come again. The earl told him on Monday (this being on the Friday.) For God's sake let me, said the king:—Shall I, shall I?—then lolled about his neck;—then for God's sake give thy lady this kisses for me, in the same manner at the stayre's head, at the middle of the stayres, and at the stayre's foot. The earl was not in his coach when the king used these very words (in the hearing of four servants, one of whom reported it instantly to the author of this history.) "I shall never see his face more."

He displayed great imbecility in his amusements, which are characterised by the following one, related by Arthur Wilson.—When James became melancholy in consequence of various disappointments in state matters, Buckingham and his mother used several means of diverting him. Amongst the most ludicrous was the present.—They had a young lady, who brought a pig in the dress of a new-born infant: the countess carried it to the king, wrapped in a rich mantle. One Turpin, on this occasion, was dressed like a bishop in all his pontifical ornaments. He began the rites of baptism with the common prayer-book in his hand; a silver ewer with water was held by another. The marquis stood as godfather. When James turned to look at the infant, the pig squeaked: an animal which he greatly abhorred. At this, highly displeased, he exclaimed,—'Out! Away for shame! What blasphemy is this!'

This ridiculous joke did not accord with the feelings of James at that moment; he was not 'i' the vein.' Yet we may observe, that had not such artful politicians as Buckingham and his mother been strongly persuaded of the success of this puerile fancy, they would not have ventured on such 'blasphemies.' They certainly had witnessed amusements heretofore not less trivial, which had gratified his majesty. The account which Sir Anthony Weldon gives, in his Court of King James, exhibits a curious scene of James's amusements. 'After the king supped, he would come forth to see pastimes and fooleries; in which Sir Ed Zouch, Sir George Goring, and Sir John Finit, were the chiefs and master fools, and surely this fooling got them more than any others' wisdom; Zouch's part was to sing bawdy songs, and tell bawdy tales; Finit's to compose these songs; there was a set of fiddlers brought to court on purpose for this fooling, and Goring was master of the game for fooleries, sometimes presenting David Droman and Archee Armstrong, the king's fools, on the back of the other fools, to tilt one at another, till they fell together by the eares; sometimes they performed antic dances. But Sir John Millicent (who was never known before) was commended for notable fooling; and was indeed the best extemporary foole of them all.' Weldon's Court of James' is a scandalous chronicle of the times.

His dispositions were, however, generally grave and studious. He seems to have possessed a real love of letters, but attended with that mediocrity of talent which in a private person had never raised him into notice. 'While there was a chance,' writes the author of the Catalogue of Noble Authors, 'that the dyer's son, Vorstius, might be divinity-professor at Leyden, instead of being burnt, as his majesty hinted to the Christian prudence of the Dutch that he deserved to be, our ambassadors could not receive instructions, and consequently could not treat, on any other business. The king, who did not resent the massacre at Amboyna, was on the point of breaking with the States for supporting a man who professed the heresies of Enejadius, Ostodorus, &c. points of extreme consequence to Great Britain! Sir Dudley Carleton was forced to threaten the Dutch, not only with the hatred of King James, but also with his pen.'

This royal pedant is forcibly characterised by the following observations of the same writer:

'Among his majesty's works is a small collection of poetry. Like several of his subjects, our royal author has condescended to apologize for its imperfections, as having been written in his youth, and his maturer age being otherwise occupied. So that (to employ his own language) when his ingyne and age could, his affaires and facherie would not permit him to correct them, scarcely but at stolen moments, he having the leisure to blenk upon any paper.' When James sent a present of his harangues, turned into Latin, to the protestant princes in Europe, it is not unentertaining to observe in their answers of compliments and thanks, how each endeavoured to insinuate that he had read them, without positively asserting it! Buchanan, when asked how he came to make a pedant of his royal pupil, answered, that it was the best he could make of him. Sir George Mackenzie relates a story of his tutelage, which shows Buchanan's humour, and the veneration of others for royalty. 'The young king being one day at play with his fellow pupil, the master of Erskine, Buchanan was reading, and desired them to make less noise. As they disregarded his admonition, he told his majesty, if he did not hold his tongue, he would certainly whip his breach. The king replied, he would be glad to see who would bell the cat, alluding to the fable. Buchanan lost his temper, and throwing his book from him, gave his majesty a sound flogging. The old Countess of Mar rushed into the room, and taking the king in her arms, asked how he dared to lay his hands on the lord's anointed? Madam, replied the elegant and immortal historian, I have whipped his a—, you may kiss it if you please!'

Many years after this was published, I discovered a curious anecdote.—Even so late as when James I was seated on the throne of England, once the appearance of his frowning tutor in a dream greatly agitated the king, who vainly attempted to pacify his illustrious pedagogue in this portentous vision. Such was the terror which the remembrance of this inexorable republican tutor had left on the imagination of his royal pupil.*

James I, was suddenly a zealous votary of literature; his wish was sincere, when at viewing the Bodleian Library at Oxford, he exclaimed, 'were I not a king I would be an university man; and if it were so that I must be a prisoner, if I might have my wish, I would have no other prison than this library, and be chained together with these good authors.'

Hume has informed us, that 'his death was decreed. The following are the minute particulars; I have drawn them from an imperfect manuscript collection, made by the celebrated Sir Thomas Browne:

'The lord keeper, on March 22, received a letter from the court, that it was feared his majesty's sickness was dangerous to death; which fear was more confirmed, for he, meeting Dr Harvey in the road, was told by him that the king used to have a beneficial evacuation of nature, a sweating in his left arm, as helpful to him as any fontaine could be, which of late failed.

'When the lord keeper presented himself before him, he moved to cheerful discourse, but it would not do. He said by his bed-side until midnight. Upon the consultations of the physicians in the morning he was out of comfort, and by the prince's leave told him, kneeling by his pallet, that his days to come would be but few in this world.—"I am satisfied," said the king; but pray you assist me to make me ready for the next world, to go away hence for Christ, whose mercies I call for and hope to find."

'From that time the keeper never left him, or put off his cloaths to go to bed. The king took the communion, and professed he died in the bosom of the Church of England, whose doctrine he had defended with his pen, being persuaded it was according to the mind of Christ, as he should shortly answer it before him.

'He staid in the chamber to take notice of every thing the king said, and to repulse those who crept much about the chamber door, and into the chamber; they were for the most addicted to the Church of Rome. Being rid of them, he continued in prayer, while the king lingered on, and at last cast his eyes with his own hands.'

Thus in the full powers of his faculties, a timorous prince encountered the horrors of dissolution. Religion rendered cheerful the abrupt night of futurity; and what can philosophy do more, or rather can philosophy do as much?

I proposed to have examined with some care the works of James I.—but that uninviting task has been now postponed till it is too late. As a writer his works may not be valuable, and are infected with the pedantry and the superposition of the age; yet I suspect that James was not that degraded and feeble character in which he ranks by the contagious voice of criticism. He has had more critics than readers. After a great number of acute observations and witty allusions, made extempore, which we find continually recorded of him by contemporary writers, and some not friendly to him, I conclude that he possessed a great promptness of wit, and much solid judgment and acute ingenuity. It requires only a little labour to prove this.

That labour I have since zealously performed. This article, composed thirty years ago, displays the effects of first impressions, and popular clamours. About ten years I suspected that his character was grossly injured, and lately I found how it has suffered from a variety of causes. That monarch preserved for us a peace of more than twenty years; and his talents were of a higher order than the calumnies of the party who degraded him have allowed a common inquirer to discover. For the rest I must refer the reader to 'An Inquiry into the Literary and Political Character of James I.' where, though I have there introduced a variety of irrelevant topics, the reader may find many correctives for this article.

GENERAL MONK AND HIS WIFE.

From the same MS collection of Sir Thomas Browne, I shall rescue another anecdote, which has a tendency to show that it is not advisable to permit ladies to remain at home, when political plots are to be secretly discussed. And while it displays the treachery of Monk's wife, it will also appear that, like other great revolutionists, it was ambition that first induced him to become the reformer he pretended to be.

'Monk gave fair promises to the Rump, but last agreed with the French Ambassador to take the government on himself; by whom he had a promise from Mazarin of assistance from France. This bargain was struck late at night: but not so secretly but that Monk's wife, who had posed herself conveniently behind the hangings, finding what was resolved upon, sent her brother Clarges away immediately with notice of it to Sir A. A. She had promised to watch her husband, and inform Sir A. how matters went. Sir A. caused the Council of state, whereof he was a member, to be summoned, and charged Monk that he was playing false. The general insisted that he was true to his principles, and firm to what he had promised, and that he was ready to give them all satisfaction. Sir A. told him if he were sincere he might remove all scruples, and should instantly take away their commissions from such and such men in his army, and appoint others, and that before he left the room. Monk consented; a great part of the commissions of his officers were changed, and Sir Edward Harley, a member of the council, and then present, was made governor of Dunkirk, in the room of Sir William Lockhart; the army ceased to be at Monk's devotion; the Ambassador was recalled, and broke his heart.'

Such were the effects of the infidelity of the wife of General Monk!

PHILIP AND MARY.

Houssae in his Memoires, vol. i. p. 381, has given the following curious particulars of this singular union:

'The second wife of Philip was Mary Queen of England—a virtuous princess (Houssae in a good catholic,) but who had neither youth nor beauty. This marriage was as little happy for the one as for the other. The husband did not like his wife, although she doted on him; and the English hated Philip still more than he hated them. Silhon says, that the rigour which he exercised in England against heretics, partly hindered Prince Carlos from succeeding to that crown, and for which purpose Mary had invited him in case she died childless.—But no historian speaks of this pretended inclination, and it is probable that Mary ever thought proper to call to the succession of the English throne the son of the Spanish monarch? This marriage had made her nation detest her, and in the last years of her life she could be little satisfied with him from his marked indifference for her. She well knew that the Parliament would never consent to exclude her sister Elizabeth, whom the nobility loved for being more friendly to the new religion, and more hostile to the house of Austria.'

In the Cottonian Library, Vespasian, F. 122, is preserved a note of instructions in the hand-writing of Queen Mary, of which the following is a copy. It was, probably, written when Philip was just seated on the English throne.

'Instructions for my lorde Previsel.

'Firste, to tell the Kinge the whole state of this realme, wt all thyngs appartaynyng to the same, as myche as ye knowe to be trewe.

'Seconde, to obey his commandment in all thyngs.'

'Thyrde, in all things he shall aske your aduyse to declare your opinion as becometh a faithfull conceytlour to do.

'Marye the Quene.'

Houssae proceeds: 'After the death of Mary, Philip sought Elizabeth in marriage; and she, who was yet unfixed at the beginning of her reign, amused him at first with hopes. But as soon as she unmasked herself to the Pope, she laughed at Philip, telling the Duke of Feria, his ambassador, that her conscience would not permit her to marry the husband of her sister.'

This monarch, however, had no such scruples. Incest appears to have had in his eyes peculiar charms; for he offered himself three times to three different sisters-in-law. He seems also to have known the secret of getting quit of his wives when they became inconvenient. In state matters he spared no one whom he feared; to them he sacrificed his only son, his brother, and a great number of princes and ministers.

'It is said of Philip, that before he died he advised his son to make peace with England, and war with the other powers. Pacem cum Anglo, bellum cum reliquis. Queen Elizabeth, and the ruin of his invincible fleet, physicked his phrensy into health, and taught him to fear and respect that country which he thought he could have made a province of Spain!

On his death-bed he did every thing he could for salvation. The following protestation, a curious morsel of bigotry, he sent to his confessor a few days before he died:

'Father confessor! as you occupy the place of God, I protest to you that I will do every thing you shall say to be necessary for my being saved; so that what I omit doing will be placed to your account, as I am ready to acquit myself of all that shall be ordered to me.'

Is there in the records of history a more glaring instance of the idea which a good catholic attaches to the power of a confessor than the present authentic example? The most licentious philosophy seems not more dangerous than a religion whose votary believes that the accumulation of crimes can be dissipated by the breath of a few orisons, and which, considering a venal priest to 'occupy the place of God,' can traffic with the divine power at a very moderate price.

After his death a Spanish grandee wrote with a coal on the chimney-piece of his chamber the following epitaph, which ingeniously paints his character in four verses:

Siendo moco luxurioso ;
Siendo hombre, fue cruel ;
Siendo viejo, condicioeo ;
Que se puede esperar del ?

In youth he was luxurious ;
In manhood he was cruel ;
In old age he was avaricious ;
What could be hoped from him ?

CHARLES THE FIRST.

Of his romantic excursion into Spain for the Infanta, many curious particulars are scattered amongst foreign writers, which display the superstitious prejudices which prevailed on this occasion, and, perhaps, develop the mysterious politics of the courts of Spain and Rome.

Cardinal Gaetano, who had long been nuncio in Spain, observes, that the people, accustomed to revere the inquisition as the oracle of divinity, abhorred that proposal of marriage of the Infanta with an heretical prince; but that the king's council, and all wise politicians, were desirous of its accomplishment. Gregory XV held a consultation of cardinals, where it was agreed that the just apprehension which the English catholics entertained of being more cruelly persecuted, if this marriage failed, was a sufficient reason to justify the pope. The dispensation was therefore immediately granted, and sent to the nuncio of Spain, with orders to inform the Prince of Wales, in case of rupture, that no impediment of the marriage proceeded from the court of Rome, who, on the contrary, had expedited the dispensation.

The prince's excursion to Madrid was, however, universally blamed, as being inimical to state interests. Nani, author of a history of Venice, which, according to his dispassionate manner, is the universal history of his times, has noticed this affair. 'The people talked, and the English murmured more than any other nation to see the only son of the king, and heir of his realms, venture on so long a voyage, and present himself rather as a hostage than a husband to a foreign court, which so widely differed in government and religion, to obtain by force of prayer and supplications a woman whom Philip and his ministers made a point of honour and conscience to refuse.'

Houssaye observes, 'The English council were against it, but King James obstinately resolved on it; being overpersuaded by Gondomar, the Spanish Ambassador, whose facetious humour and lively repartees greatly delighted him. Gondomar persuaded him that the presence of the prince would not fail of accomplishing this union, and also the restitution of the electorate to his son-in-law the palatine. Add to this the Earl of Bristol, the English ambassador extraordinary at the court of Madrid, finding it his interest, wrote repeatedly to his majesty, that the success was certain if the prince came there, for that the Infanta would be charmed with his personal appearance and polished manners. It was thus that James, seduced by these two ambassadors, and by his paternal affection for both his children, permitted the Prince of Wales to travel into Spain.' This account differs from Clarendon.

Wicquefort says, that James in all this was the dupe of Gondomar, who well knew the impossibility of this marriage, which was alike inimical to the interests of politics and the inquisition. For a long time he amused his majesty with hopes, and even got money for the household expenses of the future queen. He acted his part so well, that the King of Spain recompensed the knave, on his return, with a seat in the council of state. There is preserved in the British Museum a considerable series of letters which passed between James I, and the Duke of Buckingham and Charles, during their residence in Spain.

I shall glean some further particulars concerning this mysterious affair from two English contemporaries, Howell and Wilson who wrote from their own observations. Howell had been employed in this projected match, and resided during its negotiation at Madrid.

Howell describes the first interview of Prince Charles and the Infanta. He says, 'The Infanta wore a blue riband about her arm, that the prince might distinguish her, and as soon as she saw the prince her colour rose very high.' Wilson informs us that 'two days after their interview the prince was invited to run at the ring, where his fair mistress was a spectator, and to the glory of his fortune, and the great contentment both of himself and the lookers on, he took the ring the very first course.' Howell, writing from Madrid, says 'The people here do mightily magnify the gallantry of the journey, and cry out that he deserved to have the Infanta thrown into his arms the first night he came.' The people appear, however, some time after to doubt if the English had any religion at all. Again, 'I have seen the prince nave his eyes immovably fixed upon the Infanta half an hour together in a thoughtful speculative posture.' Olivares, who was no friend to this match, coarsely observed that the prince watched her as a cat does a mouse. Charles indeed acted every thing that a lover in one of the old romances could have done. He once leapt over the walls of her garden, and only retarded by the entreaties of the old marquiss who then guarded her, and who, falling on his knees, solemnly protested that if the prince spoke to her his head would answer for it.

He watched hours in the street to meet with her. Wilson says he gave such liberal presents to the court as well as Buckingham to the Spanish beauties, that the Treasurer Middlesex complained repeatedly of their want of prodigality.

Let us now observe by what mode this match was presented to by the courts of Spain and Rome. Wilson informs us that Charles agreed 'That any one should be proposed to him the arguments in favour of the catholic religion, without giving any impediment; but that he would never, directly or indirectly, permit any one to speak in Infanta against the same.' They probably had tampered with Charles concerning his religion. A letter of Gregory XV to him is preserved in Wilson's life. Olivares to Buckingham, you gave me some assurance and hope the prince's turning catholic. The duke roundly answered that it was false. The Spanish minister, comforted at the bluntness of our English duke, broke from him in violent rage, and lamented that state matters would suffer him to do himself justice. This insult was not forgiven; and some time afterwards he attempted to avenge himself on Buckingham, by endeavoring to persuade James that he was at the head of a conspiracy against him.

We hasten to conclude these anecdotes not to be found in the pages of Hume and Smolett. Wilson says that both kingdoms rejoiced. 'Preparations were made in England to entertain the Infanta; a new church was built at St James's, the foundation-stone of which was laid by the Spanish ambassador, for the public exercise of her religion; her portrait was multiplied in every corner of town; such as hoped to flourish under her eye suddenly began to be powerful. In Spain (as Wilson quaintly presses himself) the substance was as much courted as the shadow here. Indeed the Infanta, Howell tells was applying hard to the English language, and was ready called the Princess of England. To conclude Charles complained of the repeated delays; and he, the Spanish court, parted with a thousand civilities. The Infanta however observed, that had the prince loved her he would not have quitted her.'

How shall we dispel those clouds of mystery with which politics have covered this strange transaction? It appears that James had in view the restoration of the Palatine to his daughter, whom he could not effectually assist; that the court of Rome had speculations of the most dangerous tendency to the Protestant religion; that the marriage was broken off by that personal hatred which existed between Olivares and Buckingham; and that, if there was any sincerity existing between the parties concerned, it rested with the Prince and the Infanta, who were both youthful and romantic, and were but two beautiful ivory balls in the hands of great players.

DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM.

The Duke of Buckingham, in his bold and familiar manner, appears to have been equally a favourite with James I, and Charles I. He behaved with singular indiscretion both at the courts of France and Spain.

Various anecdotes might be collected from the memoir writers of those countries, to convince us that our court was always little respected by its ill choice of this ambassador. His character is hit off by one master-stroke from the pen of Hume; 'He had,' says this penetrating observer of men, 'English familiarity and French levity: so that he was in full possession of two of the most offensive qualities an ambassador can possess.'

Sir Henry Wotton has written an interesting life of our duke. At school his character fully discovered itself, even at that early period of life. He would not apply to any serious studies, but excelled in those lighter qualifications adapted to please in the world. He was a graceful horseman, musician, and dancer. His mother withdrew him from school at the early age of thirteen, and he soon became a domestic favourite. Her fondness permitted him to indulge in every caprice, and to cultivate those agreeable talents which were natural to him. His person was beautiful, and his manners insinuating. In a word, he was adapted to become a courtier. The fortunate opportunity soon presented itself; for James saw him, and invited him to court, and showered on him, with a prodigal hand, the cornucopia of royal patronage.

Houssaye, in his political memoirs, has detailed an anecdote of this duke, only known to the English reader in the general observation of the historian. When he was sent to France, to conduct the Princess Henrietta to the arms of Charles I, he had the insolence to converse with the Queen of France, not as an ambassador, but as a lover! The Marchioness of Senecy, her lady of honour, enraged at seeing this conversation continue, seated herself in the arm-chair of the Queen, who that day was confined to her bed; she did this to hinder the insolent duke from approaching the queen, and probably taking other liberties. As she observed that he still persisted in the lover, 'Sir, (he said, in a severe tone of voice,) you must learn to be silent; it is not thus we address the queen of France.'

This audacity of the duke is further confirmed by Nani, in his sixth book of the History of Venice; an historian who is not apt to take things lightly. For when Buckingham was desirous of once more being ambassador at that court, in 1628, it was signified by the French ambassador, that for reasons well known to himself, his person would not be agreeable to his most Christian majesty. In a romantic threat, the duke exclaimed, he would go and see the queen in spite of the French court: and to this petty affair is to be ascribed the war between the two nations!

The Marshal de Bossompierre, in the journal of his embassy, affords another instance of his 'English familiarity.' He says, 'The king of England gave me a long audience, and a very disputatious one. He put himself in a passion, while I, without losing my respect, expressed myself freely. The Duke of Buckingham, when he observed the king and myself very warm, leapt suddenly betwixt his majesty and me, exclaiming, I am come to set all at rights betwixt you, which I think is high time.'

Cardinal Richelieu hated Buckingham as sincerely as did the Spaniards Olivares. This enmity was apparently owing to the cardinal writing to the duke without leaving any space open after the title of Monsieur; the duke, to show his equality, returned his answer in the same 'paper-sprung' manner. From such petty circumstances many wars have taken their source.

This ridiculous circumstance between Richelieu and Buckingham reminds me of a similar one, which happened to two Spanish lords.—One signed at the end of his letter, el Marques (THE MARQUIS) as if the title had been peculiar to himself for its excellence. His national vanity expressed a dreadful reproach from his correspondent, who, jealous of his equality, signed otro Marques (ANOTHER MARQUIS.)

An anecdote given by Sir Henry Wotton offers a characteristic trait of Charles and his favourite:

'They were now entered into the deep time of Lent, and could get no flesh into their innu; whereupon fell out a pleasant passage (if I may insert by the way among more serious).—There was near Bayon a herd of goats with their young ones; on which sight Sir Richard Graham (master of the horse to the marquis) tells the marquis he could snap one of the kids, and make some shift to carry him close to their lodgings; which the prince overhearing, "Why, Richard," says he, "do you think you may practise here your old tricks again upon the borders?" Upon which word they first gave the goat-herd good contentment, and then while the marquis and his servants, being both on foot, were chasing the kid about the flock, the prince from horseback killed him in the head with a Scottish pistol. Let this serve for a journal parenthesis which may show how his highness, even in such light and trivial damage, had a noble sense of just dealing.'

THE DEATH OF CHARLES IX.

Dr Cayot is an old French controversial writer, but is better known in French literature as an historian. His Chronologie Nouveaue is full of anecdotes unknown to other writers. He collected them from his own observations, for he was under preceptor to Henry IV. The dreadful massacre of St Bartholomew took place in the reign of Charles IX; on which occasion the English court went this morning. The singular death of Charles has been recorded by the Huguenots as an interposition of Divine justice: he died bathed in his blood, which burst from his eyes. The horrors of this miserable prince on his dying bed are forcibly depicted by the anecdotes I am now collecting. I shall premise, however, that Charles was a few moments in the hands of his mother, the political and cruel Catherine de Medicis.

Dr Cayot, with honest naïveté, thus relates what he knew to have passed a few hours before his death.

'King Charles, feeling himself near his end, after having passed some time without pronouncing a word, said, as he turned himself on one side, and as if he seemed to awake, "Call my brother!" The queen mother was present, who immediately sent for the Duke of Anlençon (who was afterwards Henry III.) The king perceiving him, turned his back and again said, "Let my brother come!" The queen his mother replied, "Sir, I do not know whom you mean; here is your brother." The king was displeased, and said, "Let them bring my brother the King of Navarre; it is he who is my brother." The queen mother observing the dying monarch's resolute order, sent for him; but, for reasons known only to herself, she commanded the captain of the guards to conduct him under the vaults. They went to the King of Navarre, and desired him to come and speak to the king; at that moment, this prince has since repeatedly said, he felt a shuddering and apprehension of death so much that he would not go. But King Charles persisting on his coming, the queen mother assured him that he should receive no injury. In this promise, however, he put little trust. He went, accompanied by the Viscount d'Auchy, on whose word he chiefly relied. Having, however, observed under these vaults a great number of halberdiers and arquebusers in ranks, he would have returned, when the viscount and the captain reassured him that no harm should happen to him. The soldiers bowed, and their behaviour was respectful. By a private staircase he entered the chamber of the king, who, immediately on perceiving him, turned towards him, and stretched out his arms. The King of Navarre was affected; he sighed and wept, and fell on his knees at the side of the bed. Charles embraced, and having kissed him, said, "My brother, you lose a good master and a good friend. I know it is not you who occasions me so much trouble; had I believed what they said, you would not have been alive; but I have always loved you. It is to you alone I trust my wife and daughter; earnestly do I recommend them to your care. Do not trust the queen, but God protect you!"

The queen mother here interrupted him, "Ah, sir! do not say that!"—"Yes, madam, I must say it; it is the truth. Believe me, my brother; love me; assist my wife and daughter, and implore God for mercy on me. Adieu, my brother, adieu." The King of Navarre remained till his majesty expired.

The following minute particulars are drawn from the journal of Pierre de L'Etoile. In the simplicity of his narration, so pleasing in the old writers, the narrator and the monarch; the religious remorse of the one, and the artless consolation of the other, become interesting objects.

'King Charles, two days before his death, having called for Mazille, his chief physician, and complaining of the pains he suffered, asked him if it was not possible that he, and so many other celebrated physicians that were in his realms, could give some alleviation to his disorder: "for I am," said he, "cruelly and horribly tormented." To which Mazille replied, that whatever had depended on them had been tried, but that in truth God only could be the sovereign physician in such complaints. "I believe," said the king, that "what you say is true, and that you know nothing else. Draw from me my custode (or large cap) that I may try to rest." Mazille withdrew, and left orders that all should leave the king except three, viz. La Tour, St Pris, and his nurse, whom his majesty greatly loved, although she was a Huguenot. As she had just seated herself on a coffin, and began to doze, she heard the king groan bitterly, weeping and sighing; she then approached the bed softly, and drawing away his custode, the king said to her, giving vent to a heavy sigh, and shedding tears plentifully, inasmuch that they interrupted his discourse: "Ah! my dear nurse! my beloved woman, what blood! what murders! Ah! I have followed wicked advice! O my God! pardon me, and be merciful. I know not where I am, they have made me so perplexed and agitated. How will all this end?—What shall I do? I am lost forever! I know it."—Then the nurse thus addressed him:—"Sir, be the murders on those who forced you to order them; your majesty could not help it, and since you never consented, and now regret them, believe God will never impute them to you, and will cover them with the mantle of justice of his Son, to whom alone you should look for aid. Ah! for the honour of God, let your majesty cease from this weeping." Having said this, she rose for a handkerchief, for his was drenched with tears; Charles having taken it from her, made a sign that she should retire and leave him to repose.'

The dreadful narrative of the massacre of St Bartholomew is detailed in the history of De Thou; and the same scene is painted in glowing, though in faithful colours, by Voltaire in the Henriade.—Charles, whose last miserable moments we come from contemplating, when he observed several fugitive Huguenots about his palace, in the morning after the massacre of 30,000 of their friends, took a fowling piece and repeatedly fired at them.

Such was the effect of religion operating, perhaps not on a malignant, but on a feeble mind!

ROYAL PROMOTIONS.

If the golden gate of preferment is not usually opened to men of real merit, persons of no worth have entered it in a most extraordinary manner.

Chevreau informs us that the Sultan Osman has observed a gardener planting a cabbage with some peculiar dexterity, the manner so attracted his imperial eye that he raised him to an office near his person, and shortly afterwards he rewarded the planter of cabbages by creating him beglerbeg or viceroy of the Isle of Cyprus!

Marc Antony gave the house of a Roman citizen to a cook, who had prepared for him a good supper. Many have been raised to extraordinary preferment by capricious monarchs for the sake of a jest. Lewis XI promoted a poor priest whom he found sleeping in the porch of a church, that the proverb might be verified, that to lucky men good fortunes will come even when they are asleep! Our Henry VII made a viceroy of Ireland if not for the sake of, at least with a clench. When the king was told that all Ireland could not rule the Earl of Kildare, he said, then shall this earl rule all Ireland.

It is recorded of Henry VIII that he raised a servant to a considerable dignity, because he had taken care to have a roasted boar prepared for him, when his majesty happened to be in the humour of feasting on one; and the title of Sugar-loaf-court, in Leadenhall-street, was probably derived from another piece of magnificence of this monarch: the widow of a Mr Cornwallis was rewarded by the gift of a dissolved priory there situated, for some fine puddings with which she had presented his majesty!

When Cardinal de Monte was elected pope, before he left the conclave he bestowed a cardinal's hat upon a servant whose chief merit consisted in the daily attentions he paid to his holiness's monkey!

Louis Barber owed all his good fortune to the familiar knowledge he had of Rabelais. He knew his Rabelais by heart. This served to introduce him to the Duke of Orleans, who took great pleasure in reading that author. It was for this he gave him an abbey, and he was gradually promoted till he became a cardinal.

George Villiers was suddenly raised from a private station, and loaded with wealth and honours by James the first merely for his personal beauty. Almost all the favourites of James became so from their handsomeness.

M. De Chamillart, minister of France, owed his promotion merely to his being the only man who could beat Louis XIV at billiards. He retired with a pension after ruining the finances of his country.

The Duke of Luines was originally a country lad, who insinuated himself into the favour of Louis XIII then young, by making bird-traps (pié grieches) to catch sparrows. It was little expected, (says Voltaire,) that these puerile amusements were to be terminated by a most sanguinary revolution. De Luines, after causing his patron the Marshal of Ancre to be assassinated, and the queen mother to be imprisoned, raised himself to a title and the most tyrannical power.

Sir Walter Raleigh owed his promotion to an act of gallantry to Queen Elizabeth, and Sir Christopher Hatton owed his preferment to his dancing: Queen Elizabeth, observes Granger, with all her sagacity could not see the future lord chancellor in the fine dancer. The same writer says, 'Nothing could form a more curious collection of memoirs than anecdotes of preferment.' Could the secret history of great men be traced, it would appear that merit is rarely the first step to advancement. It would much oftener be found to be owing to superficial qualifications, and even vices.

NOBILITY.

Francis the First was accustomed to say, that when the nobles of the kingdom came to court, they were received by the world as so many little kings; that the day after they were only beheld as so many princes; but on the third day they were merely considered as so many gentlemen, and were confounded among the crowd of courtiers.—It was supposed that this was done with a political view of humbling the proud nobility; and for this reason Henry IV frequently said aloud, in the presence of the princes of the blood, We are all gentlemen.

It is recorded of Philip the Third of Spain, that when he exacted the most punctilious respect from the grandees he saluted the peasants. He would never be addressed but on the knees; for which he gave this artful excuse, that as he was of low stature, every one would, have appeared too high for him. He showed himself rarely even to his grandees, that he might the better support his haughtiness and repress their pride. He also affected to speak to them by half words; and reprimanded them if they did not guess at the rest. In a word, he omitted nothing that could mortify his nobility.

MODES OF SALUTATION, AND AMICABLE CEREMONIES, OBSERVED IN VARIOUS NATIONS.

When men writes the philosophical compiler of L'Esprit des Usages et des Coutumes, salute each other in an amicable manner, it signifies little whether they move a particular part of the body, or practise a particular ceremony. In these actions there must exist different customs. Every nation imagines it employs the most reasonable ones; but all are equally simple, and none are to be treated as ridiculous.

This infinite number of ceremonies may be reduced to two kinds; to reverences or salutations; and to the touch of some part of the human body. To bend and prostrate one's self to express sentiments of respect, appears to be a natural motion; for terrified persons throw themselves on the earth when they adore invisible beings: and the affectionate touch of the person they salute is an expression of tenderness.

As nations decline from their ancient simplicity, much farce and grimace are introduced. Superstition, the manners of a people, and their situation, influence the modes of salutation; as may be observed from the instances we collect.

Modes of salutation have sometimes very different characters, and it is no uninteresting speculation to examine their shades. Many display a refinement of delicacy, while others are remarkable for their simplicity or for their sensibility. In general, however, they are frequently the same in the infancy of nations, and in more polished societies. Respect, humility, fear, and esteem, are expressed much in a similar manner, for these are the natural consequences of the organization of the body.

These demonstrations become in time only empty civilities which signify nothing; we shall notice what they were originally, without reflecting on what they are.

The first nations have no peculiar modes of salutation; they know no reverences or other compliments, or they despise and disdain them. The Greenlanders laugh when they see an European uncover his head, and bend his body before him whom he calls his superior.

The Islanders, near the Philippines, take the hand or foot of him they salute, and with it they gently rub their face. The Laplanders apply their nose strongly against that of the person they salute. Damper says, that at New Guinea they are satisfied to put on their heads the leaves of trees, which have ever passed for symbols of friendship and peace. This is at least a picturesque salute.

Other salutations are very inconvenient and painful; it requires great practice to enable a man to be polite in an island situated in the straits of the Sound. Houtmann tells us they saluted him in this grotesque manner: 'They raised his left foot, which they passed gently over the right leg, and from thence over his face.' The inhabitants of the Philippines use a most complex attitude; they bend their body very low, place their hands on their cheeks, and raise at the same time one foot in the air with their knee bent.

An Ethiopian takes the robe of another, and ties it about his own waist, so that he leaves his friend half naked. This custom of undressing on these occasions takes other forms; sometimes men place themselves naked before the person whom they salute; it is to show their humility, and that they are unworthy of appearing in his presence. This was practised before Sir Joseph Banks, when he received the visit of two female Otaheiteans. Their innocent simplicity, no doubt, did not appear immodest in the eyes of the virtuous.

Sometimes they only undress partially. The Japanese take off a slipper: the people of Arracan their sandals in the street, and their stockings in the house.

In the progress of time it appears service to uncover itself. The grandees of Spain claim the right of appearing covered before the king, to show that they are not so much subjected to him as the rest of the nation; and (this writer truly observes (we may remark that the English do not uncover their heads so much as the other nations of Europe. Mr Hobhouse observes, that uncovering the head, with the Turks, is a mark of indecent familiarity; in their mosques the Franks must keep their hats on. The Jewish custom of wearing their hats in their synagogues is, doubtless the same oriental custom.

In a word there is not a nation, observes the humorous Montaigne, even to the people who when they salute turn their backs on their friends, but that can be justified in their customs.

The negroes are lovers of ludicrous actions, and hence all their ceremonies seem farcical. The greater part pull the fingers till they crack. Snelgrave gives an odd representation of the embassy which the king of Dahomy sent him. The ceremonies of salutation consisted in the most ridiculous contortions. When two negro monarchs met, they embrace in snapping three times the middle finger.

Barbarous nations frequently imprint on their salutations the dispositions of their character. When the inhabitants of Carmenta (says Athenus) would show a peculiar mark of esteem, they breathed a vein, and presented for the beverage of their friend the blood as it issued. The Franks tore the hair from their head, and presented it to the person they saluted. The slave cut his hair, and offered it to his master.

The Chinese are singularly affected in their personal civilities. They even calculate the number of their reverences. These are the most remarkable postures. The men move their hands in an affectionate manner, while they are joined together on the breast, and bow their head a little. If they respect a person, they raise their hands joined, and then lower them to the earth in bending the body. If two persons meet after a long separation, they both fall on their knees and bend the face to the earth, and this ceremony they repeat two or three times. Surely we may differ here with the sentiment of Montaigne, and confess this ceremony to be ridiculous. It arises from their national affectation. They substitute artificial ceremonies for natural actions.

Their expressions mean as little as their ceremonies. If a Chinese is asked how he finds himself in health? He answers, Very well; thanks to your abundant felicity. If they would tell a man that he looks well, they say, Prosperity is painted on your face; or, Your air announces your happiness.

If you render them any service, they say, My thanks shall be immortal. If you praise them, they answer, How shall I dare to persuade myself of what you say of me? If you dine with them, they tell you at parting, We have not treated you with sufficient distinction. The various titles they invent for each other it would be impossible to translate.

It is to be observed that all these answers are prescribed by the Chinese ritual, or Academy of Compliments. There, are determined the number of bows; the expressions which are to be made to the right or left hand; the salutations of the master before the chair where the stranger is to be seated, for he salutes it most profoundly, and wipes the dust away with the skirts of his robe; all these and other things are noticed, even to the silent gestures by which you are entreated to enter the house. The lower class of people are equally nice in these punctilios; and ambassadors pass forty days in practising them before they are enabled to appear at court. A tribunal of ceremonies has been erected; and every day very odd decrees are issued, to which the Chinese most religiously submit.

The marks of honour are frequently arbitrary; to be seated, with us is a mark of repose and familiarity; to stand up, that of respect. There are countries, however, in which princes will only be addressed by persons who are seated, and it is considered as a favour to be permitted to stand in their presence. This custom prevails in despot countries! a despot cannot suffer without disgust the devoted figure of his subjects; he is pleased to hand their bodies with their genius; his presence must lay those who behold him prostrate on the earth: he desires no eagerness, no attention, he would only inspire terror.

SINGULARITIES OF WAR.

War kindles enthusiasm, and therefore occasions strange laws and customs. We may observe in it whatever is most noble and heroic mixed with what is most strange and wild. We collect facts, and the reader must draw his own conclusions.

They frequently condemned at Carthage their generals to die after an unfortunate campaign, although they were accused of no other fault. We read in Du Halde that Captain Manchou, a Chinese, was convicted of giving battle without obtaining a complete victory, and he was punished.—With such a perspective at the conclusion of a battle generals will become intrepid, and exert themselves as much as possible, and this is all that is wanted.

When the savages of New France take flight, they pile the wounded in baskets, where they are bound and corded down as we do children in swaddling clothes.—If they should happen to fall into the hands of the conquerors, they would expire in the midst of torments. It is better therefore that the vanquished should carry them away in any manner, though frequently even at the risk of their lives.

The Spartans were not allowed to combat often with the same enemy. They wished not to incur those to battle; and if their enemies revolted frequently, they were accustomed to exterminate them.

The governors of the Scythian provinces gave annually a feast to those who had valiantly, with their own hands, despatched their enemies. The skulls of the vanquished served for their cups; and the quantity of wine they were allowed to drink was proportioned to the number of skulls they possessed. The youth, who could not yet boast of such martial exploits, contemplated distantly the solemn feast, without being admitted to approach it. This institution formed courageous warriors.

War has corrupted the morals of the people, and has occasioned them to form horrible ideas of virtue. When the Portuguese attacked Madrid, in the reign of Philip V, the courtizans of that city were desirous of displaying their patriotic zeal: those who were most convinced of the envenomed state of their body perfumed themselves, and went by night to the camp of the enemy; the consequence was that in less than three weeks there were more than six thousand Portuguese disabled with venereal maladies, and the greater part died.

Men have frequently fallen into unpardonable contradictions, in attempting to make principles and laws meet which could never agree with each other. The Jews suffered themselves to be attacked without defending themselves on the Sabbath-day, and the Romans profited by these pious scruples. The council of Trent ordered the body of the constable of Bourbon, who had fought against the Pope, to be dug up, as if the head of the church was not as much subjected to war as others, since he is a temporal prince.

Pope Nicholas, in his answer to the Bulgarians, forbids them to make war in Lent, unless, he prudently adds, there be an urgent necessity.

FIRE, AND THE ORIGIN OF FIRE-WORKS.

In the Memoirs of the French Academy, a little essay on this subject is sufficiently curious; the following contain the facts:—

Fire-works were not known to antiquity. It is certainly a modern invention. If ever the ancients employed fires at their festivals, it was only for religious purposes.

Fire, in primeval ages, was a symbol of respect, or an instrument of terror. In both these ways God manifested himself to man. In the holy writings he compares himself sometimes to an ardent fire, to display his holiness and his purity; sometimes he renders himself visible under the form of a burning bush, to express himself to be as formidable as a devouring fire: again, he rains sulphur; and often, before he speaks, he attracts the attention of the multitude by flashes of lightning.

Fire was worshipped as a divinity by several idolaters: the Platonists confounded it with the heavens, and considered it as the divine intelligence. Sometimes it is a symbol of majesty.—God walked (if we may so express ourselves) with his people, preceded by a pillar of fire; and the monarchs of Asia, according to Herodotus, commanded that such ensigns of their majesty should be carried before them. These fires, according to Quintus Curtius, were considered as holy and eternal, and were carried at the head of their armies on little altars of silver, in the midst of the magi who accompanied them and sang their hymns.

Fire was also a symbol of majesty amongst the Romans; and if it was used by them in their festivals, it was rather employed for the ceremonies of religion than for a peculiar mark of their rejoicings. Fire was always held to be most proper and holy for sacrifices; in this the Pagans imitated the Hebrews. The fire so carefully preserved by the Vestals was probably an imitation of that which fell from heaven on the victim offered by Aaron, and long afterwards religiously kept up by the priests. Servius, one of the seven kings of Rome, commanded a great fire of straw to be kindled in the public place of every town in Italy to consecrate for repose a certain day in seed-time, or sowing.

The Greeks lighted lamps at a certain feast held in honour of Minerva, who gave them oil; of Vulcan, who was the inventor of lamps; and of Prometheus, who had rendered them service by the fire which he had stolen from heaven. Another feast to Bacchus was celebrated by a grand nocturnal illumination, in which wine was poured forth profusely to all passengers. A feast in memory of Ceres, who sought so long in the darkness of hell for her daughter, was kept by burning a number of torches.

Great illuminations were made in various other meetings; particularly in the Secular Games, which lasted three whole nights; and so carefully were they kept up, that these nights had no darkness.

In all their rejoicings the ancients indeed used fires, but they were intended merely to burn their sacrifices, and which, as the generality of them were performed at night, the illuminations served to give light to the ceremonies.

Artificial fires were indeed frequently used by them, but not in public rejoicings: like us, they employed them for military purposes; but we use them likewise successfully for our decorations and amusement.

From the latest times of paganism to the early ages of Christianity, we can but rarely quote instances of fire lighted up for other purposes, in a public form, than for the ceremonies of religion; illuminations were made at the baptism of princes, as a symbol of that life of light in which they were going to enter by faith; or at the tombs of martyrs, to light them during the watchings of the night. All these were abolished from the various abuses they introduced.

We only trace the rise of feux de joie, or fire works, given merely for amusing spectacles to delight the eye, to the epocha of the invention of powder and cannon, at the close of the thirteenth century. It was these two inventions, doubtless, whose effects furnished the idea of all those machines and artifices which form the charms of these fires.

To the Florentines and the Siennese are we indebted not only for the preparation of powder with other ingredients to amuse the eyes, but also for the invention of elevated machines and decorations adapted to augment the pleasure of the spectacle. They began their attempts at the feasts of Saint John the Baptist and the Assumption, on wooden edifices, which they adorned with painted statues, from whose mouth and eyes issued a beautiful fire. Calot has engraved numerous specimens of the pageants, triumphs, and processions, under a great variety of grotesque forms;—dragons, swans, eagles, &c. which were built up large enough to carry many persons, while they vomited forth the most amusing fire-work.

This use passed from Florence to Rome, where, at the creation of the popes, they displayed illuminations of hand-grenades, thrown from the height of a castle. Pyrotechnics from that time have become an art, which, in the degree the inventors have displayed ability in combining the powers of architecture, sculpture, and painting, have produced a number of beautiful effects, which even give pleasure to those who read the descriptions without having beheld them.

A pleasing account of decorated fire-works is given in the Secret Memoirs of France. In August, 1764, Torre, an Italian artist, obtained permission to exhibit a pyrotechnic operation.—The Parisians admired the variety of the colours, and the ingenious forms of his fire. But this first exhibition was disturbed by the populace, as well as by the apparent danger of the fire, although it was displayed on the Boulevards. In October it was repeated: and proper precautions having been taken, they admired the beauty of the fire, without fearing it. These artificial fires are described as having been rapidly and splendidly executed. The exhibition closed with a transparent triumphal arch, and a curtain illuminated by the same fire, admirably exhibiting the palace of Pluto.—Around the columns, stanzas were inscribed, supported by Cupids, with other fanciful embellishments. Among these little pieces of poetry appeared the following one, which ingeniously announced a more perfect exhibition;

Les vents, les frimats, les orages,
Etindront ces feux, pour un tems;
Mais, ainsi que les fleurs, avec plus d'avantage,
Ils renaîtront dans le printemps.

IMITATED.

The icy gale, the falling snow,
Exinction to these fires shall bring;
But, like the flowers, with brighter glow,
They shall renew their charms in spring.

The exhibition was greatly improved, according to this promise of the artist. His subject was chosen with much felicity: it was a representation of the forges of Vulcan under Mount Etna. The interior of the mount discovered Vulcan and his Cyclope. Venus was seen to descend, and demand of her consort armour for Æneas.—Opposite to this was seen the palace of Vulcan, which presented a deep and brilliant perspective. The labours of the Cyclope produced numberless very happy combinations of artificial fires. The public with pleasing astonishment beheld the effects of the volcano, so admirably adapted to the nature of these fires. At another entertainment he gratified the public with a representation of Orpheus and Eurydice in hell; many striking circumstances occasioned a marvellous illusion. What subjects indeed could be more analogous to this kind of fire? And let me ask, what is the reason we do not see these artificial fires display more brilliant effects in London? What man of taste can be gratified with stars, wheels, and rockets?

THE BIBLE PROHIBITED AND IMPROVED.

The following are the express words contained in the regulation of the popes to prohibit the use of the Bible.

'As it is manifest by experience, that if the use of the holy writers is permitted in the vulgar tongue more evil than profit will arise, because of the temerity of man; it is for this reason all bibles are prohibited (prohibetur Biblia) with all their parts, whether they be printed or written, in whatever vulgar language soever; as also are prohibited all summaries or abridgments of bibles, or any books of the holy writings, although they should only be historical, and that in whatever vulgar tongue they be written.'

It is there also said, 'That the reading the bibles of catholic editors may be permitted to those by whose personal power the faith may be spread, and who will not criticise it. But this permission is not to be granted without an express order of the bishop, or the inquisitor, with the advice of the curate and confessor; and their permission must first be had in writing. And he who, without permission presumes to read the holy writings, or to have them in his possession, shall not be absolved of his sins before he first shall have returned the bible to his bishop.'

A spanish author says, that if a person should come to his bishop to ask for leave to read the bible, with the best intention, the bishop should answer him from Matthew ch. xx, ver. 20, 'You know not what you ask.' And indeed he observes, the nature of this demand indicates an antichristian disposition.

The reading of the bible was prohibited by Henry VIII except by those who occupied high offices in the state; a noble lady or gentleman might read it in 'their garden or orchard,' or other retired places; but men and women in the lower ranks were positively forbidden to read it, or to have it read to them.

Dr Franklin, in his own Life, has preserved a single anecdote of the bible being prohibited in England in the time of our true Catholic Mary. His family had the early embraced the reformation; 'They had an English bible, and to conceal it the more securely, they concealed the project of fastening it open with pack-threads and the leaves, on the inside of the lid of a close-stool! What my grandfather wished to read to his family, he opened the lid of the close-stool upon his knees, and passed the leaves from one side to the other, which were held out on each by the packthread. One of the children was at placed at the door to give notice if he saw an officer of the Criminal Court make his appearance; in that case the lid was restored to its place, with the bible concealed under his before.*

I shall leave the reader to make his own reflections on this extraordinary account. He may meditate on what the pope did, and what they probably would have done, had not he so happily been in a humour to abuse the pope, and begin a Reformation. It would be curious to sketch an account of the probable situation of Europe at the present moment, had the pontiffs preserved the singular power of which they had possessed themselves.

It appears by an act dated in 1516, that in those days the bible was called Bibliotheca, that is per emphasim, the Library. The word library was limited in its signification then to the biblical writings; no other books, compared with the holy writings, appear to have been worthy to rank with them, or constitute what we call a library.

We have had several remarkable attempts to re-compose the bible; Dr Geddes's version is aridly literal, and often ludicrous by its vulgarity; but the following attempts are of a very different kind. Sebastian Castillon, who afterwards changed his name to Castellan, with his accustomed affectation referring to Castalia, the fountain of the Muses, took a very extraordinary liberty with the sacred writings. He fancied he could give the world a more classical version of the bible, and for this purpose introduced phrases and entire sentences from profane writers into the text of holy writ. His whole style is finically quaint, overloaded with quaintness, and all the ornaments of false taste. Of the simplicity of the scriptures he seems not to have had the remotest conception.

But an attempt by Pere Berruyer is more extraordinary; in his Histoire du Peuple de Dieu, he has recomposed the Bible as he would have written a fashionable novel. With absurd refinement he conceives that the great legislator of the Hebrews is too barren in his descriptions, too concise in the events he records, nor is careful to enrich his history by pleasing reflections and interesting conversational pieces, and hurries on the catastrophes, by which means he omits much entertaining matter: as for instance, in the loves of Joseph and the wife of Potiphar, Moses is very dry and concise, which, however, our Pere Berruyer is not. His histories of Joseph, and of King David, are embellishing morsels, and were devoured eagerly in all the salons of Paris. Take a specimen of the style. 'Joseph combined with a regularity of features, and a brilliant complexion, an air of the noblest dignity; all which contrived to render him one of the most amiable men in Egypt.' At length 'she declares her passion, and pressed him to answer her. It never entered her mind that the advances of a woman of her rank could ever be rejected. Joseph at first only replied to all her wishes by his cold embraces. She would not yet give him up. In vain he flies from her: she was too passionate to waste even the moments of his astonishment.' This good father, however, does ample justice to the gallantry of the Patriarch Jacob. 'He offers to serve Laban seven years for Rachel. 'Nothing is too much,' cries the venerable novelist, 'when one really loves'; and this admirable observation he confirms by the facility with which the obliging Rachel allows Leah for one night to her husband! In this manner the patriarchs are made to speak in the tone of the tenderest lovers: Judith is a Parisian coquette, Holofernes is rude as a German baron; and their dialogues are tedious with all the reciprocal politeness of metaphysical French lovers! In Moses in the desert, it was observed, is precisely as pedantic as Pere Berruyer addressing his class at the university. One cannot but smile at the following expressions: 'By the easy manner in which God performed miracles, one might easily perceive they cost no effort.' When he has narrated an 'Adventure of the Patriarchs,' he proceeds, 'After such an extraordinary, or curious, or interesting adventure, &c.' This good father had caught the language of the beau monde, but with such perfect simplicity that, in employing it on sacred history he was not aware of the ludicrous he was writing.

A Gothic bishop translated the scriptures into the Gothic language, but omitted the Book of Kings! lest the wars, of which so much is there recorded, should increase their inclination to fighting, already too prevalent. Jortin notices this castrated copy of the bible in his Remarks on Ecclesiastical History.

As the Bible, in many parts, consists merely of historical transactions, and as too many exhibit a detail of offensive ones, it has often occurred to the fathers of families, as well as the popes, to prohibit its general reading. Archbishop Tillotson formed a design of purifying the historical parts. Since some have given us a Family Shakespeare, it were desirable that the same spirit would present us with a Family Bible.

ORIGIN OF THE MATERIALS OF WRITING.

From the 'Literary History of France,' by the learned Benedictines, I have collected the chief materials of the present article. It is curious to observe the various substitutes for paper before its discovery.

When men had not yet discovered the art of recording events by writing, they planted trees, erected rude altars, or heaps of stone, as remembrances of past events. Hercules probably could not write when he fixed his famous pillars.

The most ancient mode of writing was on brick, tile, and oyster-shells, and on tables of stone; afterwards on plates of various materials, on ivory, on bark of trees, on leaves of trees.*

Engraving memorable events on hard substances, it has been prettily observed, was giving, as it were speech to rocks and metals. In the book of Job mention is made of writing on stone, on rocks, and on sheets of lead. It was on tables of stone that Moses received the law written by the finger of God himself. Herod's works were written on lead; lead was used for writing, and rolled up like a cylinder, as Pliny states. Mienthacon notices a very ancient book of eight leaden leaves, which on the back had rings fastened by a small leaden rod to keep them together. They afterwards engraved on bronze: the laws of the Cretans were on bronze tables, the Romans etched their public records on brass. The speech of Claudius, engraved on plates of bronze, is yet preserved in the town-hall of Lyons, in France. Several bronze tables, with Etruscan characters, have been dug up in Tuscany. The Treaties between the Romans, Spartans, and the Jews were written on brass; and estates, for better security, were made over on this enduring metal. In many cabinets may be found the discharges of soldiers, written on copper-plates. This custom has been discovered in India; a bill of feoffment on copper has been dug up near Bengal, dated a century before the birth of Christ.

Among these early inventions many were singularly rude, and miserable substitutes for a better material. In the shepherd state they wrote their songs, with thorns and awls on straps of leather, which they wound round their crooks. The Icelanders appear to have scratched their runes, a kind of hieroglyphics on walls; and Olof, according to one of the Sagas, built a large house, on the bulks and spars of which he had engraved the history of his own and more ancient times; while another northern hero appears to have had nothing better than his own chair and bed to perpetuate his own heroic acts on. At the town-hall, in Hanover, are kept twelve wooden boards, overlaid with bees'-wax, on which are written the names of owners of houses, but not the names of streets. These wooden manuscripts must have existed before 1423, when Hanover was first divided into streets. Such manuscripts may be found in public collections. This exhibits a very curious, and the rudest state of society. The same event occurred among the ancient Arabs, who, according to the history of Mahomet, seem to have taken the shoulder-bones of sheep, on which they carved remarkable events with a knife, and after tying them with a string they hung these chronicles up in their cabinets.

The laws of the twelve tables which the Romans chiefly copied from the Grecian code were, after they had been approved by the people, engraven on brass; they were melted by lightning, which struck the capitol and con-burned other laws; a loss highly regretted by Augustus. This manner of writing we still retain, for the inscriptions, epitaphs, and other memorials designed to reach posterity.

* Specimens of most of these modes of writing may be seen in the British Museum. No. 2478, in the Sloanean library, is a Nabob's letter, on a piece of bark about two yards long, and richly ornamented with gold. No. 2307, is a book of Mexican hieroglyphics painted on bark. In the same collection are various species, many from the Malabar coast and the East. The latter writings are chiefly on leaves. There are several copies of Bibles written on palm leaves, still preserved in various collections in Europe. The ancients, doubtless, wrote on any leaves they found adapted for the purpose. Hence the leaf of a book, alluding to that of a tree, seems to be derived. At the British Museum we have recently received Babylonian tiles, or broken pots, which the people used, and made their contracts of business on. A custom mentioned in the scriptures.

These early inventions led to the discovery of tables of wood; and as cedar has an anti-septic quality from its bitterness, they chose this wood for cases or chests to preserve their most important writings. The well-known expression of the ancients, when they meant to give the highest eulogium of an excellent work, at cedro digna locati, that it was worthy to be written on cedar, alludes to the oil of cedar, with which, valuable mass of parchment were anointed, to preserve them from corruption and moths. Persius illustrates this in the excellent version of Mr Gifford:

'Who would not leave posterity such rhymes,
As cedar oil might keep to latest times!'

They stained materials for writing upon with purple, and rubbed them with exudations from the cedar. The laws of the emperors were published on wooden tables, painted with ceruse; to which custom Horace alludes, Leges incideris ligno. Such tables, now softened into tablets, are still used, but in general are made of other materials than wood. The same reason for which they preferred the cedar to other wood induced to write on wax, which, from its nature, is incorruptible. Men generally used it to write their testaments on, the better to preserve them; thus Juvenal says, Ceras implere capaces. This thin paste of wax was also used on tablets of wood, that it might more easily admit of erasure.

They wrote with an iron bodkin, as they did on the other substances we have noticed. The stylus was made sharp at one end to write with, and blunt and broad at the other, to deface and correct easily: hence the phrase vertere stylium, to turn the stylus, was used to express blotting out. But the Romans forbade the use of this sharp instrument, from the circumstance of many persons having used them as daggers. A school-master was killed by the Pugillares or table-books, and the styles of his own scholars. They substituted a stylus made of the bone of a bird, or other animal; so that their writings resembled engravings. When they wrote on softer materials, they employed reeds and quills split like our pens at the points, which the orientals still use to lay their colour or ink neater on the paper.

Naudé observes, that when he was in Italy, about 1645, he saw some of those waxen tablets, called Pugillares, so called because they were held in one hand; and others composed of the barks of trees, which the ancients employed in lieu of paper.

On these tablets, or table-books, Mr Astle observes, that the Greeks and Romans continued the use of waxed table-books long after the use of the papyrus, leaves, and skins became common; because they were so convenient for correcting extemporaneous compositions; from these table-books they transcribed their performances correctly into parchment books, if for their own private use; but if for sale, or for the library, the Librarii, or scribes, had the office. The writing on table-books is particularly recommended by Quintilian in the third chapter of the tenth book of his Institutions; because the wax is readily effaced for any corrections: he confesses weak eyes do not see so well on paper, and observes that the frequent necessity of dipping the pen in the inkstand retards the hand, and is but ill suited to the celerity of the mind. Some of these table-books are conjectured to have been large, and perhaps heavy, for in Plautus, a school-boy is represented breaking his master's head with his table-book. According to Cicero, it appears that the critics were accustomed in reading their wax manuscripts to notice obscure or vicious phrases by joining a piece of red wax, as we should underscours such by red ink.

Table-books written upon with styles were not entirely laid aside in Chaucer's time, who describes them in his Somper's tale.

'His fellow had a staffe tipp'd with borne,
A paire of tables all of iverie;
And a pointell polished fetouille,
And wrote alwaies the names, as he should,
Of all folke, that gave him any good.'

By the word pen in the translation of the Bible, we must understand an iron style. Table-books of ivory are still used for memoranda, written with black-lead pencils. The Romans used ivory to write the edicts of the senate on, with a black colour; and the expression of libris elephatis, which some authors imagine alludes to books of ivory, for their size were called elephantine, were most probably composed of ivory, the tusk of the elephant; among the Romans they were undoubtedly scarce and dear.

The pumice stone was a writing-material of the ancients; they used it to smooth the roughness of the parchment, to sharpen their reeds.

In the progress of time the art of writing consisted in painting with different kinds of ink. This novel mode of writing occasioned them to invent other materials proper to receive their writing; the thin bark of certain trees as plants, or linen; and at length, when this was found apt to become mouldy, they prepared the skins of animals. Those of asses are still in use; and on those of serpents &c. were once written the Iliad and Odyssey. The first place where they began to dress these skins was Pergamum in Asia; whence the Latin name is derived of Pergamen or parchment. These skins are, however, better known amongst the authors of the purest Latin under the name of membrana; so called from the membranes of various animals of which they were composed. The ancients had parchments of three different colours, white, yellow, or purple. At Rome white parchment was disliked, because it was more subject to be soiled than the others, and dazzled the eye. They generally wrote in letters of gold and silver on purple or violet parchment. This custom continued in the early ages of the church; and copies of the evangelists of this kind are preserved in the British Museum.

When the Egyptians employed for writing the bark of a plant or reed, called papyrus, or paper-rush, it superseded all former modes, from its convenience. Formerly it grew in great quantities on the sides of the Nile. This plant has given its name to our paper, although the latter is now composed of linen or rags, and formerly had been of cotton-wool, which was but brittle and yellow; and is proved by using cotton-rags, which they glazed. At the eighth century the papyrus was superseded by parchment. The Chinese make their paper with silk. The use of paper is of great antiquity. It is what the ancient Latinists call charta or charta. Before the use of parchment and paper passed to the Romans, they used the bark peeled found between the wood and the bark of trees. The skinniest substance they call liber, from whence the Latin word liber, a book, and library and librarian in the European languages, and the French livre for book; but we have northern origin derive our book from the Danish bag, or beech-tree, because that being the most plentiful in Denmark was used to engrave on. Anciently, instead of folding this bark, this parchment, or paper, as we fold ours, they rolled it according as they wrote on it; and the Latin name which they gave these rolls has passed into our languages as well as the others. We say a volume or volumes, although our books are composed of pages cut and bound together. The books of the ancients on the shelves of their libraries were rolled up on a pin, and placed cross-titled on the outside in red letters, or rubrics, and appeared like a number of small pillars on the shelves.

The ancients were as curious as ourselves in having their books richly conditioned. Propertius describes tables with gold borders, and Ovid notices their red titles; but later times, besides the tint of purple with which they tinged their vellum, and the liquid gold which they employed for their ink, they enriched with precious stones the covers of their books. In the early ages of the church they painted on the outside commonly a dying Christ. The curious library of Mr Douce is a Psalter, supposed once to have appertained to Charlemagne; the vellum purple, and the letters gold. The Eastern nations likewise tinged their wax with different colours and decorations. Astle possessed Arabian wax, of which some leaves were of a deep yellow, and others of a lilac colour. Sir William Jones describes an oriental wax, in which the name of Mohammed was fancifully adorned with a garland of tulips and carnations, painted in the brightest colours. The favourite works of the Persians are written on a silky paper, the ground of which is often powdered with gold or silver dust; the leaves are frequently illuminated and the whole book is sometimes perfumed with essences of roses or sandal wood. The Romans had several sorts of paper to which they had given different names; it was the Charta Augusta, in compliment to the emperor; another Liviana, named after the empress. There was

* Of which we have fine specimens in the British Museum.

Charta blanca, which obtained its title from its beautiful whiteness, and which we appear to have retained by applying it to a blank sheet of paper which is only signed; Charta blanche. They had also a Charta Nigra painted black, and the letters were in white or other colours.

Our present paper surpasses all other materials for ease and convenience of writing. The first paper-mill in England was erected at Darford, by a German, in 1588, who was knighted by Elizabeth; but it was not before 1713, that one Thomas Watkine, a stationer, brought the art of paper-making to any perfection, and to the industry of the individual we owe the origin of our numerous paper-mills. France had hitherto supplied England and Holland. The manufacture of paper was not much encouraged at home, even so late as in 1682; and the following observations by Fuller are curious, respecting the paper of his times. 'Paper participates in some sort of the characters of the country which makes it; the Venetian, being neat, subtle, and court-like; the French, light, slight, and slender; and the Dutch, thick, corpulent, and gross, sucking up the ink with the sponginess thereof.' He complains that the paper manufacturers were not then sufficiently encouraged, 'considering the vast sums expended in our land for paper, out of Italy, France, and Germany, which might be lessened were it made in our nation. To such only object that we can never equal the perfection of Venetian paper, I return, neither can we match the purity of Venice glasses; and yet many green ones are blown in Buxer, profitable to the makers, and convenient for the users. Our home-grown paper might be found beneficial.' The present German printing-paper is made so disagreeable both to printers and readers from their paper-manufacturers making many more reams of paper from one cwt of flax than formerly. Rags are scarce, and German writers, as well as the language, are voluminous.

Mr Aesth deeply complains of the inferiority of our inks to those of antiquity; an inferiority productive of the most serious consequences, and which appears to originate merely in negligence. From the important benefits arising from the use of ink, and the injuries individuals suffer from the frauds of designing men, he wishes the legislature would frame some new regulations respecting it.

The composition of ink is simple, but we possess none equal in beauty and colour to that used by the ancients; the Saxon ssæ written in England exceed in colour any thing of the kind. The rolls and records from the fifteenth century to the end of the seventeenth, compared with those of the fifth to the twelfth centuries, show the excellence of the earlier ones, which are all in the finest preservation, while the others are so much defaced, that they are scarcely legible. It is a very serious consideration, in respect to the security of property, that the Records of Parliament, the decisions and adjudications of the courts of justice, conveyances, wills, testaments, &c. should be written on ink of such durable quality as may best resist the destructive power of time and the elements.

The ink of the ancients had nothing in common with ours, but the colour and gum. Gall-nuts, coppers, and so on make up the composition of our ink, whereas ssæ or Iron-black was the chief ingredient in that of the ancients. Ink has been made of various colours; we find gold and red ink, and red, green, yellow, and blue inks; but the black is considered as the best adapted to its purpose.

ANECDOTES OF EUROPEAN MANNERS.

The following circumstances probably gave rise to the many of the feudal power, and are the facts on which the scenes of romance are raised. Castles were erected to repulse the vagrant attacks of the Normans, and in place, from the year 769 to 967, these places disturbed the public repose. The petty despots who raised these castles pillaged whoever passed, and carried off the females who pleased them. Rapine, of every kind, were the privileges of the feudal lords! Mezeray observes, that from these circumstances romancers have invented the tales of knights errant, monsters, and giants. De Saint Foix, in his 'Historical Essays,' informs us: 'Women and girls were not in greater security when passed by abbots. The monks sustained an assault on them to relinquish their prey: if they saw themselves on ground, they brought to their walls the relics of a saint. Thus it generally happened that the assailant, seized with awful veneration, retired, and dared not take their vengeance. This is the origin of the enchantere, of the enchanted mts, and of the enchanted castles described in romances.'

To these may be added what the author of 'Northern Antiquities,' Vol. I, p. 243, writes, that as the walls of the castles ran winding round them, they often called them by a name which signified serpents or dragons; and in these were commonly secured the women and young maids of distinction, who were seldom safe at a time when so many bold warriors were rambling up and down in search of adventures. It was this custom which gave occasion to ancient romancers, who knew not how to describe any thing simple, to invent so many fables concerning princesses of great beauty guarded by dragons.

A singular and barbarous custom prevailed during this period; it consisted in punishments by mutilation. It became so general that the abbots, instead of bestowing canonical penalties on their monks, obliged them to cut off an ear, an arm, or a leg!

Velly, in his History of France, has described two festivals, which gave a just idea of the manners and devotion of a later period, 1230, which like the ancient mysteries consisted of a mixture of farce and piety; religion in fact was their amusement! The following one existed even to the reformation.

In the church of Paris, and in several other cathedrals of the kingdom, was held the Fest of Fools or madmen. The priests and clerks assembled, elected a pope, an archbishop, or a bishop, conducted them in great pomp to the church, which they entered dancing, masked, and dressed in the apparel of women, animals, and merry-andrews; sung infamous songs, and converted the altar into a banquet, where they ate and drank during the celebration of the holy mysteries; played with dice; burned, instead of incense, the leather of their old sandals; ran about, and leaped from seat to seat, with all the indecent postures with which the merry-andrews know how to amuse the populace.

The other does not yield in extravagance. 'This festival was called the Fest of Asses, and was celebrated at Beauvais. They chose a young woman, the handsomest in the town; they made her ride on an ass richly harnessed, and placed in her arms a pretty infant. In this state followed by the bishop and clergy, she marched in procession from the cathedral to the church of St Stephens's; entered into the sanctuary; placed herself near the altar, and the mass began; whatever the choir sung was terminated by this charming burthen, Hihan, hihan! Their prose, half Latin and half French, explained the fine qualities of the animal. Every strophe finished by this delightful invitation:

Hez, sire Ane, ça chantes
Belle bouche rechignes,
Vous aurés du foin asses
Et de l'avoine à plantos.

They at length exhorted him in making a devout genuflection, to forget his ancient food, for the purpose of repeating without ceasing, Amen, Amen. The priest, instead of the missæ est, sung three times, Hihan, hihan, hihan! and the people three times answered, Hihan, hihan, hihan! to imitate the braying of that grave animal.

What shall we think of this imbecile mixture of superstition and farce? This ass was perhaps typical of the ass which Jesus rode? The children of Israel worshipped a golden ass, and Balaam made another speak. How unfortunate then was James Nayler, who desirous of entering Bristol on an ass, Hume informs us—it is indeed but a piece of cold pleasantry—that all Bristol could not afford him one!

At the time when all these follies were practised, they would not suffer men to play at chess! Velly says, 'A statute of Eudes de Bully prohibits clergymen not only from playing at chess, but even from having a chess-board in their house.' Who could believe, that while half the ceremonies of religion consisted in the grossest buffoonery, a prince preferred death rather than cure himself by a remedy which offended his chastity. Louis VIII being dangerously ill, the physicians consulted and agreed to place near the monarch while he slept, a young and beautiful lady, who when he awoke, should inform him of the motive which had conducted her to him. Louis answered, 'No, my girl, I prefer dying rather than to save my life by a mortal sin! And, in fact, the good king died! He would not be prescribed for, out of the whole Pharmacopœia of Love!

An account of our taste in female beauty is given by Mr

Ellis, who observes, in his notes to Wray's Fabliaux, 'In the times of chivalry the minstrels dwell with great complacency on the fair hair and delicate complexion of their damsels. This taste was continued for a long time, and to render the hair light was a great object of education. Even when wigs first came into fashion they were all flaxen. Such was the colour of the Gauls and their German conquerors. It required some centuries to reconcile their eyes to the swarthy beauties of their Spanish and their Italian neighbours.'

The following is an amusing anecdote of the difficulty in which an honest Vicar of Bray found himself in those contentious times.

When the court of Rome, under the pontificates of Gregory IX and Innocent IV set no bounds to their ambitious projects, they were opposed by the Emperor Frederic; who was of course anathematised. A curate of Paris, a humorous fellow, got up in his pulpit with the bull of Innocent in his hand. You know, my brethren, (said he) that I am ordered to proclaim an excommunication against Frederic. I am ignorant of the motive. All that I know is, that there exists between this prince and the Roman Pontiff great differences, and an irreconcilable hatred. God only knows which of the two is wrong. Therefore with all my power I excommunicate him who injures the other; and I absolve him who suffers, to the great scandal of all Christianity.

The following anecdotes relate to a period which is sufficiently remote to excite curiosity, yet not so distant as to weaken the interest we feel in those minutiae of the times.

The present one may serve as a curious specimen of the despotism and simplicity of an age not literary, in discovering the author of a libel. It took place in the reign of Henry VIII. A great jealousy subsisted between the Londoners and those foreigners who traded here. The foreigners probably (observes Mr Lodge, in his Illustrations of English History) worked cheaper and were more industrious.

There was a libel affixed on St Paul's door, which reflected on Henry VIII and these foreigners, who were accused of buying up the wool with the king's money, to the undoing of Englishmen. This tended to inflame the minds of the people. The method adopted to discover the writer of the libel must excite a smile in the present day, while it shows the state in which knowledge must have been in this country. The plan adopted was this: In every ward one of the king's council, with an alderman of the same, was commanded to see every man write that could, and further took every man's book and sealed them, and brought them to Guildhall to confront them with the original. So that if of this number many wrote alike, the judges must have been much puzzled to fix on the criminal.

Our hours of recreation are singularly changed in little more than two centuries. In the reign of Francis I, (observes the author of Recreations Historiques) they were yet accustomed to say,

Lever a cinq, diner a neuf,
Souper a cinq, coucher a neuf,
Fait vivre d'ans nonante et neuf.

Historians observe of Louis XII, that one of the causes which contributed to hasten his death was the entire change of his regimen. The good king, by the persuasion of his wife, says the history of Bayard, changed his manner of living; when he was accustomed to dine at eight o'clock, he agreed to dine at twelve; and when he was used to retire to bed at six o'clock in the evening, he frequently sat up as late as midnight.

Houssais gives the following authentic notice drawn from the registers of the court, which presents a curious account of domestic life in the fifteenth century. Of the dauphin Louis, son of Charles VI, who died at the age of twenty, we are told: 'That he knew the Latin and French languages; that he had many musicians in his chapel; passed the night in vigils; dined at three in the afternoon, supped at midnight, went to bed at the break of day, and thus was accursed (that is threatened) with a short life.' Froissart mentions waiting upon the Duke of Lancaster at five o'clock in the afternoon, when he had supped.

The custom of dining at nine in the morning relaxed greatly under Francis I, his successor. However, persons of quality dined then the latest at ten; and supper was at five or six in the evening. We may observe this in the preface to the Hephestemon of the Queen of Navarre, where this princess delineating the mode of life which lords and ladies (whom she assembles at the castle Madame Oysille, one of her characters) should follow be agreeably occupied, and to banish languor, is express in these terms. 'As soon as the morning rose, she went to the chamber of Madame Oysille, whom they found already at her prayers; and when they had heard dawn a good hour her lecture, and then the mass, they went to dine at ten o'clock; and afterwards each retired to her room to do what was wanted, and did not fail at noon to meet in the meadow.' Speaking of the end of this first day (which was in September) the same lady Oysille says 'Say where is the sun? and hear the bell of the Abbe which has for some time called us to vespers; and in seeing this they all rose and went to the religionists, who waited for them above on horse. Vespers heard, they went to supper, and after having played at a thousand sports in the meadow, they retired to bed.' All this exactly corresponds with the lines above quoted. Charles V of France, however, who lived near two centuries before Francis, dined at ten, supped at seven, and all the court was in bed by nine o'clock. They sounded the curfew, which he warned them to cover their fire, at six in the winter, as between eight and nine in the summer. A custom which exists in most religious societies: who did not then distinguish themselves from the ordinary practice. (This was written in 1767.) Under the reign of Henry IV the hour of dinner at court was eleven, or at noon the latest; a custom which prevailed even in the early part of the reign of Louis XIV. In the provinces distant from Paris, it is now common to dine at nine; they make a second repast at two o'clock, and sup at five; and their last meal is now just before they retire to bed. The labourer and peasant in France have preserved this custom, and make three meals; one at nine, another at three, and the last at setting of the sun.

The Marquis of Mirabeau, in 'L'Ami des Hommes' Vol. I, p. 261, gives a striking representation of the singular industry of the French citizens of that age. He is learnt from several ancient citizens of Paris, that if in the youth a workman did not work two hours by candle-light either in the morning or evening (he even adds in the longest days) he would have been noted as an idler, and would not have found persons to employ him. Mirabeau adds that it was the 12th of May, 1688, when Henry III ordered his troops to occupy various posts in Paris. Davila writes that the inhabitants, warned by the noise of the drums began to shut their doors and shops, which, according to the custom of that town to work before daybreak, were a ready opened. This must have been, taking it at the least, about four in the morning. 'In 1780,' adds the ingenious writer, 'I walked on that day through Paris at six in the morning; I passed through the most busy and populous part of the city, and I only saw open some stalls the vendors of brandy!'

To the article, 'Anecdotes of Fashions,' in a former volume, we may add, that in England a taste for splendid dress existed in the reign of Henry VII; as is observed by the following description of Nicholas Lord Vaux. 'In the 17th of that reign, at the marriage of Prince Arthur, a brave young Vaux appeared in a gown of purple velvet adorned with pieces of gold so thick and massive, that exclusive of the silk and furs, it was valued at a thousand pounds. About his neck he wore a collar, of S. S. weighing eight hundred pounds in nobles. In those days it only required great bodily strength to support the weight of their cumbersome armour; their very luxury of apparel for the drawing-room would oppress a system of adorning muscles.'

In the following reign, according to the monarch's of Wolsey's magnificent taste, their dress was, perhaps, not generally sumptuous. We then find the following rich garments in vogue. Shirts and shifts were embroidered with gold, and bordered with lace. Strutt notices a perfumed gloves lined with white velvet, and splendidly worked with embroidery and gold buttons. Not only gloves but various other parts of their habits, were perfumed; shoes were made of Spanish perfumed skins.

Carriages were not then used, so that lords would carry princesses on a pillow behind them, and in bad weather the ladies covered their heads with hoods of cloth. A custom that has been generally continued to the middle of the seventeenth century. The use of coaches was introduced into England by Fitzalan Earl of Arundel in 1580, and at first were only drawn by a pair of horses.

The favourite Buckingham, about 1619, began to have them drawn by six horses, and Wilson, in his life of James I, tells us this 'was wondered at as a novelty, and imputed to him as a mastering pride.' The same arbitræ elegantiarum introduced sedan chairs. In France, Catherine de Medici was the first who used a coach, which had leather doors, and curtains instead of glass windows. If the carriage of Henry IV had had glass windows, this circumstance might have saved his life. Carriages were so rare in the reign of this monarch, that in a letter to his minister Sully, he notices that having taken medicine that day, though he had intended to have called on him, he was prevented, because the queen had gone out with the carriage. Even as late as in the reign of Louis XIV, the courtiers rode a horseback to their dinner parties, and wore their light boots and spurs. Count Hamilton describes his boots of white Spanish leather with gold spurs. Saint Foix observes, that in 1658 there were only 310 coaches in Paris, and in 1758 there were more than 3000.

Strutt has judiciously observed, that though 'luxury and grandeur were so much affected, and appearances of state and splendour carried to such lengths, we may conclude that their household furniture and domestic necessaries were also carefully attended to; on passing through their houses, we may expect to be surprised at the neatness, elegance, and superb appearance of each room, and the richness of every ornament; but herein we may be deceived. The taste of elegance amongst our ancestors was very different from the present, and however we may find them extravagant in their apparel, excessive in their domestics, and expensive in their trains of attendants; yet, follow them home, and within their houses you shall find their furniture is plain and homely; no great choice, but what was useful, rather than any for ornament or show.'

Erasmus, as quoted by Jortin, confirms this account, and makes it worse: he gives a curious account of English dirtiness; he ascribes the plague from which England was hardly ever free, and the sweating-sickness, partly to the incommensurable form, and bad exposition of the houses, the filthiness of the streets, and to the sluttishness within doors. The floors, says he, are commonly of clay, strewed with rushes; under which lies, unmolested, an ancient collection of beer, grease, fragments, bones, spittole, excrement of dogs and cats, and every thing that is nasty.

I shall give a sketch of the domestic life of a nobleman in the reign of Charles the First, 'from the 'Life of the Duke of Newcastle,' written by his Duchess, whom I have already noticed. It might have been impertinent at the time of its publication; it will now please those who are curious of English manners.

'Of his Habit.

He accoutres his person according to the fashion, if it be one that is not troublesome and uneasy for men of heroic exercises and actions. He is neat and cleanly; which makes him to be somewhat long in dressing, though not so long as many effeminate persons are. He shifts ordinarily once a day, and every time when he uses exercise, or if his temper is more hot than ordinary.

'Of his Diet.

'In his diet he is so sparing and temperate, that he never eats nor drinks beyond his set proportion so as to satisfy only his natural appetite; he makes but one meal a day, at which he drinks two good glasses of small beer, the first about the beginning, the other at the end thereof, and a little glass of sack in the middle of his dinner; which glass of sack he also uses in the morning for his breakfast, with a morsel of bread. His supper consists of an egg and a draught of small beer. And by this temperance he keeps himself very healthful, and may yet live many years, as being now of the age of seventy-three.

'His Recreation and Exercise.

His prime pastime and recreation hath always been the exercise of manège and weapons, which heroic arts he used to practice every day; but I observing that when he had overheard himself he would be apt to take cold, preferred so far, that at last he left the frequent use of the manège, using nevertheless still the exercise of weapons; though he doth not ride himself so frequently as he used to do, yet he taketh delight in seeing his horses of manège rid by his escuyers, whom he instructs in that art for his own pleasure. But in the art of weapons (in which he has a method beyond all that ever was famous for it, found out by his own ingenuity and practise) he never taught any body but the now Duke of Buckingham, whose guardian he hath been, and his own two sons. The rest of his time he spends in music, poetry, architecture, and the like.'

The value of money, and the increase of our opulence, might form, says Johnson, a curious subject of research. In the reign of Edward the Sixth, Latimer mentions it as a proof of her father's prosperity, that though but a yeoman, he gave his daughters five pounds each for their portion. At the latter end of Elizabeth's reign, seven hundred pounds were such a temptation to courtship, as made all other motives suspected. Congreve makes twelve thousands more than a counterbalance to the affection of Belinda. No poet will now fly his favourite character at less than fifty thousand. Clarissa Harlowe had but a moderate fortune.

In Sir John Vanbrugh's Confederacy, a woman of fashion is presented with a bill of millinery as long as herself. Yet it only amounts to a poor fifty pounds! at present this sounds oddly on the stage. I have heard of a lady of quality and fashion, who had a bill of her fancy-dress maker, for the expenditure of one year, to the tune or rather which closed in the deep diapason of, six thousand pounds!

THE EARLY DRAMA.

It is curious to trace the first rude attempts of the drama, in various nations; to observe at that moment, how crude is the imagination, and to trace the caprices it indulges; and that the resemblance in these attempts holds in the earliest essays of Greece, of France, of Spain, of England, and what appears extraordinary, even in China and Mexico.

The rude beginnings of the drama in Greece are sufficiently known, and the old mysteries of Europe have been exhibited in the preceding pages of this work. The progress of the French theatre has been this:—

Etienne Jodelle, in 1552, seems to have been the first who had a tragedy represented of his own invention, entitled Cleopatra—it was a servile imitation of the form of the Grecian tragedy; but if this did not require the highest genius, it did the utmost intrepidity; for the people were, through long habit, intoxicated with the wild amusement they simply received from their farces and moralities.

The following curious anecdote, which followed this first attempt at classical imitation, is very observable. Jodelle's success was such, that his rival poets, touched by the spirit of the Grecian muse, showed a singular proof of their enthusiasm for this new poet, in a classical festivity which gave room for no little scandal in that day; yet as it was produced by a carnival, it was probably a kind of drunken bout. Fifty poets, during the carnival of 1552, went to Arcueil. Chance, says the writer of the life of the old French bard Ronsard, who was one of the present profane party, threw across their road a goat—which having caught, they ornamented the goat with chaplets of flowers, and carried it triumphantly to the hall of their festivity, to appear to sacrifice to Bacchus, and to present it to Jodelle; for the goat, among the ancients, was the prize of the tragic bards; the victim of Bacchus, who presided over tragedy.

Carmine, qui tragico, vitem certavit ob hircum.

Horace.

This goat thus adorned, and his beard painted, was hunted about the long table, at which the fifty poets were seated; and after having served them for a subject of laughter for some time, he was hunted out of the room, and not sacrificed to Bacchus. Each of the guests made verses on the occasion, in imitation of the Bacchanalia of the ancients. Ronsard composed some dithyrambs to celebrate the festival of the goat of Etienne Jodelle; and another, entitled 'Our travels to Arcueil.' However, this Bacchanalian freak did not finish as it ought, where it had begun, among the poets. Several ecclesiastics sounded the alarm, and one Chandieu accused Ronsard with having performed an idolatrous sacrifice; and it was easy to accuse the moral habits of fifty poets assembled together, who were far, doubtless from being irreproachable. They repented for some time of their classical sacrifice of a goat to Tragedy.

Hardi, the French Lope de Vega, wrote 800 dramatic pieces from 1600 to 1637; his imagination was the most fertile possible; but so wild and unchecked, that though its extravagances are very amusing, they served as so many instructive lessons to his successors. One may form a notion of his violation of the unities by his piece, 'La force du Sang.' In the first act Leocadia is carried off and ravished. In the second she is sent back with an evident sign of pregnancy. In the third she lies in, and at the close of this act, her son is about ten years old. In the fourth the father of the child acknowledges him; and in the fifth, lamenting his son's unhappy fate, he marries Leocadia. Such are the pieces in the infancy of the drama!

Rotrou was the first who ventured to introduce several persons in the same scene; before his time they rarely exceeded two persons; if a third appeared, he was usually a mute actor, who never joined the other two. The state of the theatre was even then very rude; freedoms of the most lascivious embraces were publicly given and taken; and Rotrou even ventured to introduce a naked page in the scene, who in this situation holds a dialogue with one of his heroines. In another piece, 'Scedase, ou l'hospitalité violée,' Hardy makes two young Spartans carry off Scedase's two daughters, ravish them on the theatre, and violating them in the side scenes, the spectators heard their cries and their complaints. Cardinal Richelieu made the theatre one of his favourite pursuits, and though not successful as a dramatic writer, he gave that encouragement to the drama, which gradually gave birth to genius. Scudery was the first who introduced the twenty-four hours from Aristotle; and Mairet studied the construction of the fable, and the rules of the drama. They yet groped in the dark, and their beauties were yet only occasional; Corneille, Racine, Moliere, Crebillon, and Voltaire, perfected the French drama.

In the infancy of the tragic art in our country, the bowl and dagger were considered as the great instruments of a sublime pathos; and the 'Dieu' and 'Dieu noble' of the exquisite and affecting tragedy of Fielding were frequently realised in our popular dramas. Thomas Godd, of the university of Oxford, in the reign of James I, was considered as no contemptible tragic poet; he concludes the first part of his courageous Turk, by promising a second, thus:

If this first part, gentles! do like you well,
The second part shall greater murders tell.

Specimens of extravagant bombast might be selected from his tragedies. The following speech of Amurath the Turk, who coming on the stage, and seeing an appearance of the heavens being on fire, comets and blazing stars, thus addresses the heavens, which seemed to have been as mad a condition as the poet's own mind.

—How now ye heavens! grow you
So proud, that you must needs put on curled locks,
And clothe yourselves in periwigs of fire!

In the raging Turk, or Bajazet the Second, he is introduced with this most raging speech:

Am I not emperor? he that breathes a no
Dams in that negative syllable his soul;
Durst any god gainsay it, he should feel
The strength of fiercest giants in my armies,
Mine anger's at the highest, and I could shake
The firm foundation of the earthly globe:
Could I but grasp the poles in these two hands
I'd pluck the world asunder.

He would scale heaven, and would then when he had —got beyond the utmost sphere,
Besiege the concave of this universe.
And hunger-starve the gods till they could feed
What furies did oppress his sleeping soul.

These plays went through two editions; the last printed in 1856.

The following passage from a similar bard is as precious. The king in the play exclaims,

By all the ancient gods of Rome and Greece,
I love my daughter!—better than my niece!
If any one should ask the reason why,
I'd tell them—Nature makes the stronger tie!

One of these rude French plays, about 1600, is entitled 'La Rebellion, ou mécontentement des Grenouilles contre Jupiter,' in five acts. The subject of this tragicomic piece is nothing more than the fable of the frogs who asked Jupiter for a king. In this ridiculous effusion of a wild fancy, it must have been pleasant enough to have seen the actors, croaking in their fens, and climbing up the steep ascent of Olympus; they were dressed so as to appear gigantic frogs; and in pleading their cause before Jupiter and his court, the dull humour was to croak sublimely, whenever they did not agree with their judge.

Clavigero, in his curious history of Mexico, has given Acosta's account of the Mexican theatre which appears to resemble the first scene among the Greeks, and then French frogs, but with more fancy and taste. Acosta writes, 'The small theatre was curiously whitened, adorned with boughs, and arches made of flowers and feathers from which were suspended many birds, rabbits and other pleasing objects. The actors exhibited baroque characters feigned themselves deaf, sick with colds, lame, blind, crippled, and addressing an idol for the return of health.—The deaf people answered at cross purposes; those who had colds by coughing; and the lame by halting; all recited their complaints and misfortunes, which produced infinite mirth among the audience. Others appeared under the names of different little animals; some disguised as beetles, some like toads, some like lizards, and upon encountering each other, reciprocally explained their employments, which was highly satisfactory to the people, as they performed their parts with infinite ingenuity. Several little boys also belonging to the temple, appeared in the disguise of butterflies, and birds of various colours, and mounting upon the trees which were fixed there on purpose, little balls of earth were thrown at them with slings occasioning many humorous incidents to the spectators.'

Something very wild and original appears in this singular exhibition; where at times, the actors seem to have been spectators, and the spectators were actors.

THE MARRIAGE OF THE ARTS.

As a literary curiosity can we deny a niche to that 'old quip of distorted wit,' of Barton Holiday, who has composed a strange comedy, in five acts, performed at Christ Church, Oxford, 1630, not for the entertainment, as an anecdote records, of James the First.

The title of the comedy of this unclassical classic, for Holiday is known as the translator of Juvenal with a very learned commentary, is TEXNOTAMIA, or the Marriage of the Arts, 1630, quarto extremely dull, exceedingly rare, and extraordinarily high-priced among collectors.

It may be exhibited as one of the most extravagant inventions of a pedant. Who but a pedant could have conceived the dull fancy of forming a comedy, of five acts, of the subject of marrying the Arts? They are the dramatic persons of this piece, and the bachelor of arts prescribes their intrigues and characters. His actors are Polites, a magistrate;—Physica;—Astronomia, daughters to Physica;—Ethicus, an old man;—Geographus, a traveller and courtier, in love with Astronomia;—Arithmetus in love with Geometry;—Logicus;—Grammaticus, schoolmaster;—Poeta;—Historia, in love with Poetica;—Rhetorica, in love with Logicus;—Melancholicus, Poeta's man;—Phantastes, servant to Geographus;—Cholus Grammaticus's man.

All these abstract and refined ladies and gentlemen have as bodily feelings, and employ as gross language, as if they had been every-day characters. A specimen of his grotesque dullness may entertain;—'fruits of du heat, and soterkins of wit.'

Geographus opens the play with declaring his passion! Astronomia, and that very rudely indeed! See the pedant wreathing the roses of Love!

Geog. Come, now you shall, Astronomia.

Ant. What shall I, Geographus?

Geog. Kiss!

Ant. What in spite of my teeth!

Geog. No, not so I hope you do not use too kind with your teeth.

Ant. Marry, and I hope I do not use to kiss with them.

Geog. Ay, but my fine wit-catcher, I mean you do show your teeth when you kiss.

He then kisses her, as he says, in the different manner of a French, Spanish, and Dutch kiss. He wants to tell off the zone of Astronomia. She begs he would not let her like an elephant as he is; and Geographus says again, 'Won't you then?

Ant. Won't I what?

Geog. Bee kind?

Ant. Bee kind! how?

Fortunately Geographus is here interrupted by Astronomia's mother Physica. This dialogue is a specimen of the whole piece; very flat and very gross. Yet the piece still curious,—not only for its absurdity, but for that odd ingenuity, which so whimsically contrived to bring together the different arts; this pedantic writer, however owes more to the subject, than the subject derived to in; without wit or humour, he has at times an extravagance of invention. As for instance,—Geographus, and a man Phantastes, describe to Poeta the lying wonders they pretend to have witnessed; and this is one:

Phan. Sir, we met with a traveller that could speak languages at the same instant.

Poeta. How? at the same instant, that's impossible?

Phan. Nay, sir, the actuality of the performance puts beyond all contradiction. With his tongue he'd so swell you out as smooth Italian as any man breathing; with his eye he would sparkle forth the proud Spanish; with his nose blow out most robustous Dutch; the creaking of his high-beeled shoe would articulate exact Polonian; the knocking of his shin-bone feminine French; and his belly would grumble most pure and scholar-like Hungary. This, though extravagant without fancy, is not the worst part of the absurd humour which runs through this pedantic comedy.

The classical reader may perhaps be amused by the following strange conceits. Poeta, who was in love with Historia capriciously falls in love with Astronomia, and thus compares his mistress:

Her brow is like a brave heroic line
That does a sacred majesty inshrine;
Her nose, Phalœciacke-like, in comely sort Ends in a Trochæ, or a long and short
Her mouth is like a pretty Diameter;
Her ele-brow is like a little-longer Trimeter.
Her chinne is an adonickæ, and her tongue
Is an Hypermeter, somewhat too long
Her eyes I may compare them unto two Quick-turning Dactyles, for their nimble view
Her ribs like statues of Sapphicks do descend
Thither, which but to name were to offend.
Her arms like two lambicks raised on his
Do with her brow bear equal majestie;
Her legs like two straight spondeeæ keep space,
Slow as two scæzons, but with stately grace.

The piece concludes with a speech by Polites, who settles all the disputes, and loves, of the Arts. Poeta promises for the future to attach himself to Historia. Rhetorica, though she loves Logicus, yet as they do not mutually agree, she is united to grammaticus. Polites counsels Phlegmatico, who is Logicus's man, to leave off smoking, and to learn better manners; and Choler, Grammaticus's man, to bridle himself;—that Ethicus and Geocosma would vouchsafe to give good advice to Poeta and Historia;—and Physica to her children Geographus and Astronomia: for Grammaticus and Rhetoric, he says, their tongues will always agree and will not fall out; and for Geometres and Arithmetica they will be very regular. Melancholico, who is Poeta's man, is left quite alone, and agrees to be married to Musica; and at length Phantastes, by the entreaty of Poeta, becomes the servant of Melancholico and Musica. Physiognomus and Cheiromantæ, who are in the character of gypsies and fortune-tellers, are finally exiled from the island of Fortunata, where lies the whole scene of the action in the residence of the married arts.

The pedant-comic-writer has even attended to the dresses of his characters, which are minutely given. Thus Melancholico wears a black suit, a black hat, a black cloak, and black worked bands, black gloves, and black shoes. Sanguis, the servant of Medicus, is in a red suit; on the breast is a man with his nose bleeding; on the back, one letting blood in his arm; with a red hat and band, red stockings, and red pumps.

It is recorded of this play, that the Oxford scholars, resolving to give James I a relish of their genius, requested leave to act this notable piece. Honest Anthony Wood tells us, that it being too grave for the king, and too scholastic for the auditory, or, as some have said, the actors had taken too much wine, his majesty offered several times, after two acts, to withdraw. He was prevailed to sit it out, in mere charity to the Oxford scholars. The following humorous epigram was produced on the occasion:

At Christ church marriage done before the king,
Least that those mates should want an offering,
The king himself did offer.—What, I pray?
He offered twice or thrice—to go away!

A CONTRIVANCE IN DRAMATIC DIALOGUE.

Crown, in his 'City Politiques,' 1688, a comedy written to satirise the Whigs of those days, was accused of having copied his character too closely after life, and his enemies turned his comedy into a libel. He has defended himself in his preface from this imputation. It was particularly laid to his charge that in the characters of Bartoline, an old corrupt lawyer and his wife, Lucinda, a wanton country girl, he intended to ridicule a certain serjeant M—— and his young wife. It was even said that the comedian mimicked the odd speech of the aforesaid serjeant, who having lost all his teeth, uttered his words in a very peculiar manner. On this, Crown tells us in his defence, that the comedian must not be blamed for this peculiarity, as it was an invention of the author himself, who had taught it to the player. He seems to have considered it as no ordinary invention, and was so pleased with it, that he has most painfully printed the speeches of the lawyer in this singular gibberish; and his reasons, as well as his discovery, appear very remarkable.

He says, that 'Not any one old man more than another is mimicked, by Mr Lee's way of speaking, which all comedians can witness, was my own invention, and Mr Lee was taught it by me. To prove this farther, I have printed Bartoline's part in that manner of spelling, by which I taught it Mr Lee. They who have no teeth cannot pronounce many letters plain, but perpetually lisp, and break their words; and some words they cannot bring out all. As for instance, th is pronounced by thrusting the tongue hard to the teeth, therefore that sound they cannot make, but something like it. For that reason you will often find in Bartoline's part, instead of th, ay, as yat for that; yiah, for this; yosh, for those; sometimes a t is left out, as houssand, for thousand; hirty, for thirty. S they pronounce like sh, sher, for sir; muast for must; t they speak like ch; therefore you will find chrus, for true; chraeson, for treason; cho, for to; choos, for two; chen, for ten; chake, for take. And this ch is not to be pronounced like k, as 'tis in christian, but as in child, church, chest. I desire the reader to observe these things, because otherwise he will hardly understand much of the lawyer's part, which in the opinion of all is the most divertising in the comedy; but when this ridiculous way of speaking is familiar with him, it will render the part more pleasant.'

One hardly expects so curious a piece of orthoepy in the preface to a comedy. It may have required great observation and ingenuity to have discovered the cause of old, toothless, men mumbling their words. But as a piece of comic humour, on which the author appears to have prided himself, the effect is far from fortunate; humour arising from a personal defect, is but a miserable substitute for that of a more genuine kind. I shall give a specimen of this strange gibberish, as it is so laboriously printed. It may amuse the reader to see his mother's language transformed into so odd a shape that it is with difficulty he can recognize it.

Old Bartoline thus speaks:—'I wroong'd my shelf, cho entcher incho bondah of marriage, and could not perform covenanenth, I might well hinke you would chake the forfeiture of the bond; and I never found equichy in a bedg in my life; but i'll trounce you bok; I have paved jayfish wi' the boneah of honeste people yen you are, yat never did me nor any man any wrong, but had law o' yeur shydah and right o' yeur shydah, but because yey had not me o' yeur shydah, I ha' thrown 'em in jayfish, and got yeur eshchahsh for my clyentah, yat had no more chylls to 'em yen dogah.'

THE COMEDY OF A MADMAN.

Desmarets, the friend of Richelieu, mentioned in the article Richelieu, page 38, was a very extraordinary character, and produced many effusions of genius in early life, till he became a mystical fanatic. It was said of him, that 'he was the greatest madman among poets, and the best poet among madmen.' His comedy of 'The Visionaries' is one of the most extraordinary of dramatic projects, and in respect to its genius and lunacy, may be considered as a literary curiosity.

In this singular comedy all Bedlam seems to be let loose on the stage, and every character has a high claim to an apartment in it. It is indeed suspected that the cardinal had a hand in this anomalous drama, and in spite of its extravagance it was favourably received by the public, who certainly had never seen any thing like it.

Every character in this piece acts under some hallucination of the mind, or a fit of madness. Artabaze, is a cowardly hero, who believes he has conquered the world. Amidor, is a wild poet, who imagines he ranks above Homer. Filidan, is a lover, who becomes inflammable as gunpowder, for every mistress he reads of in romances. Phsante, is a beggarly bankrupt, who thinks himself as rich as Croesus. Melisse, in reading the 'History of Alexander,' has become madly in love with this hero, and will have no other husband than 'him of Macedon.' Hesperie imagines her fatal charms occasion a hundred disappointments in the world, but prides herself on her perfect insensibility. Sestiane, who knows no other happiness than comedies, and whatever she sees or hears, immediately plans a scene for dramatic effect, renounces any other occupation; and finally, Alcidon, the father of these three mad girls, as imbecile as his daughters are wild. So much for the amiable characters!

The plot is in perfect harmony with the genius of the author, and the characters he has invented—perfectly unconnected, and fancifully wild. Alcidon resolves to marry his three daughters, who, however, have no such project of their own. He offers them to the first who comes. He accepts for his son-in-law the first who offers, and is clearly convinced that he is within a very short period of accomplishing his wishes. As the four ridiculous personages whom we have noticed frequently haunt his house, he becomes embarrassed in finding one lover too many, having only three daughters. The catastrophe relieves the old gentleman from his embarrassments. Melisse, faithful to her Macedonian hero, declares her resolution of dying, before she marries any meaner personage. Hesperie refuses to marry out of pity for mankind: for to make one man happy, she thinks she must plunge a hundred into despair. Sestiane, only passionate for comedy, cannot consent to any marriage, and tells her father, in very lively verses,

Je ne veux point mon pere, epouser un censeur ;
Puisque vous me souffrez recevoir la douceur
Des plaisirs innocens que le theatre apporte
Frendra-je le hazard de vivre d'autre sorte ?
Fuis on a des enfans, qui vous sont sur les bras,
Les mener au theatre, O Dieux ! quel embarras !
Tantot couche ou grossesse, ou quelque maladie
Four jamais vous font dire, adieu la comedie !

IMITATED.

No, no, my father, I will have no critic,
(Miscalled a husband) since you still permit
The innocent sweet pleasures of the Stage;
And shall I venture to exchange my lot?
Then we have children folded in our arms
To bring them to the play-house, heavens! what troubles!
Then we lie in, are big, or sick, or vex'd:
These make us bid farewell to Comedy!

At length these imagined sons-in-law appear; Filidan declares that in these three girls he cannot find the mistress he adores. Amidor confesses he only asked for one of his daughters out of pure gallantry, and that he is only a lover—in verse! When Phalante is questioned after the great fortunes he hinted at, the father discovers that he has not a stiver, and out of credit to borrow; while Artabaze declares that he only allowed Alcidon, out of mere benevolence, to flatter himself for a moment, with the hope of an honour that even Jupiter would not dare to pretend to. Thus it is, that the four lovers disperse, and leave the old gentleman more embarrassed than ever, and his daughters perfectly enchanted to enjoy their whimsical reveries, and die old maids.

SOLITUDE.

We possess, among our own native treasures, two treatises on this subject, composed with no ordinary talent, and not their least value consists in one being an apology for solitude, while the other combats that prevailing passion of the studios. Zimmerman's popular work is overloaded with common-places; the garrulity of eloquence, which has been found very agreeable to the great mass of readers. The two treatises now noticed may be compared to the highly-finished gems, whose figure may be more finely designed, and whose strokes may be more delicate in the smaller space they occupy, than the ponderous block of marble hewed out by the German chiseler.

Sir George Mackenzie, a polite writer and a most eloquent pleader, published in 1685 a moral essay preferring solitude to public employment. The eloquence of his style was well suited to the dignity of his subject; the advocates for solitude have always prevailed over those for active life, because there is something sublime in those feelings which would retire from the circle of indolent triflers, or depraved geniuses; who, like a certain species of insects, are born, and can only live, in corruption. The tract of Mackenzie was ingeniously answered by the elegant taste of John Evelyn, in 1667; of this last tract, the editor of 'Censura Literaria,' in his first volume, has given an analysis; but that ingenious and fervent compiler has not noticed the superior composition of the Scotch writer. Mackenzie, though he wrote in favour of solitude, passed a very active life, first as a pleader, and afterwards as a judge: that he was an eloquent writer, and an excellent critic, and a wit, we have the authority of Dryden, who says, that till he was acquainted with that noble wit of Scotland, Sir George Mackenzie, he had not known the beautiful turn of words and thoughts in poetry, which Sir George had explained and exemplified to him in conversation. As a judge, and king's advocate, will not the barbarous customs of the age defend his name? he is most hideously painted forth by the dark pencil of a poetical Spagnoletti—Mr Grahame, in his poem on 'The Birds of Scotland.' Sir George lived in the age of rebellion—and used torture: we must entirely put aside his political, to attend to his literary character. Blair has quoted his pleadings as a model of eloquence, and Mr Grahame is unjust to the fame of Mackenzie, when he alludes to his 'half-forgotten name.' In 1689, he retired to Oxford, to indulge the luxuries of study in the Bodleian Library, and to practice that solitude which so delighted him in theory; but three years afterwards he fixed himself in London. Evelyn, who wrote in favour of public employment being preferable to solitude, passed his days in the tranquillity of his studies, and wrote against the habits which he himself most loved. By this it may appear, that, that of which we have the least experience ourselves, will ever be what appears most delightful! Alas! every thing in life seems to have in it the nature of a bubble of air, and, when touched, we find nothing but emptiness in our hand. It is certain that the most eloquent writers in favour of solitude have left behind them too many memorials of their unhappy feelings, when they indulged this passion to excess; and some ancient has justly said, that none but a God, or a savage, can suffer this exile from human nature.

The following extracts from Sir George Mackenzie's tract on Solitude are eloquent and impressive, and merit to be rescued from that oblivion which surrounds many writers, whose genius has not been effaced, but concealed, by the transient crowd of their posterity.

'I have admired to see persons of virtue and humour long much to be in the city, where, when they come, they found no sought for no other diversion than to visit one another; and there to do nothing else than to make legs, view others habit, talk of the weather, or some such pitiful subject, and it may be, if they made a farther inroad upon any other affair, they did so pick one another, that it afforded them matter of eternal quarrel, for what was at first but an indifferent subject, is by interest adopted into the number of our quarrels.—What pleasure can be received by talking of new fashions, buying and selling of lands, advancement or ruin of favourites, viceries or defeats of strange princes, which is the ordinary subject of ordinary conversation?—Most desire to frequent their superiors, and these men must either suffer their raillery, or must not be suffered to continue in their society; if we converse with them who speak with more address than ourselves, then we repine equally at our own dullness, and envy the acuteness that accomplishes the speaker; or, if we converse with dull animals than ourselves, then we are weary to draw the yoke alone, and fret at our being in ill company; but if chance blows us in amongst our equals, then we are so at guard to catch all advantages, and so interested in point d'honneur, that it rather cruciates than recreates us. How many make themselves cheap by these occasions, whom we had valued highly if they had frequented us less! And how many frequent persons who laugh at that simplicity which the addresser affords in himself as wit, and yet both recreate themselves with double laughter!

In solitude (he addresses his friend) 'My dear Celador cast into your own breast, and there survey the several operations of your own soul, the progress of your passions, the struggling of your appetite, the wanderings of your fancy, and ye will find, I assure you, more variety in that one piece, than there is to be learned in all the courts of Christendom. Represent to yourself the last age, all the actions and interests in it, how much this person was infatrate with zeal, that person with lust; how much one pursued honour, and another riches; and in the next thought draw that scene, and represent them all turned to dust and ashes.'

I cannot close this subject without the addition of some anecdotes, which may be useful. A man of letters and solitude necessary, and for him solitude has its pleasure and its conveniences; but we shall find that it also has hundred things to be dreaded.

Solitude is indispensable for literary pursuits. No considerable work has yet been composed, but its author, like an ancient magician, retired first to the grove or the closet, to invoke his spirits. Every production of genius must be the production of enthusiasm. When the youth sighs at languages, and feels himself among crowds in an irksome solitude,—that is the moment to fly into seclusion and meditation. Where can he indulge but in solitude the fine musings of his soul? where but in solitude can he occupy himself in useful dreams by night, and, when the morning rises, fly without interruption to his unfinished labours? Retirement to the frivolous is a vast desert, to the man of genius it is the enchanted garden of Armida.

Cicero was uneasy amidst applauding Rome, and he designated his numerous works by the titles of his various villas, where they were composed. Voltaire had these, and a taste for society, yet he not only withdrew intervals, but at one period of his life passed five years in the most secret seclusion and fervent studies. Montesquieu quitted the brilliant circles of Paris for his books, his meditations, and for his immortal work, and was ridiculed by the gay triflers he relinquished. Harrington, to compare his Oceana, severed himself from the society of his kind, and was so wrapt in abstraction, that he was pitted as a lunatic. Descartes, inflamed by genius, abruptly broke all his friendly connexions, hired an obscure house in an unfrequented corner at Paris, and applies himself to study during two years unknown to his acquaintance. Adam Smith, after the publication of his first work, throws himself into a retirement that lasted ten years; even Hume rallied him for separating himself from the world; but the great political inquirer satisfied the world, and his friends, by his great work on the Wealth of Nations.

But this solitude, at first a necessity, and then a pleasure, at length is not borne without repining. I will call it a witness a great genius, and he shall speak himself. Milton says, 'I feel, and shall continue to feel, that domestic solitude, however it may be alleviated by the world, by study and even by friendship, is a comfortless state, which will grow more painful as I descend in the vale of years.' Memoirs, Vol. I, p 216. And afterwards he writes to a friend, 'Your visit has only served to remind me that man, however amused and occupied in his closet, was not made to live alone.'

I must therefore now sketch a different picture of literary solitude than some sanguine and youthful minds conceive.

Even the sublimest of men, Milton, who is not apt to vent complaints, appears to have felt this irksome period of life. In the preface to Smectymnus, he says, 'It is but justice, not to deffraud of due esteem the wearisome hours and studious watchings, wherein I have spent and find out almost a whole youth.'

Solitude in a later period of life, or rather the neglect which awaits the solitary man, is felt with acuter sensibility. Cowley, that enthusiast for rural seclusion, in his wisest calls himself 'The melancholy Cowley.' Marston has truly transferred the same epithet to Gray. Read his letters the history of solitude. We lament the loss of Cowley's correspondence through the mistaken notion of Spru; he assuredly had painted the sorrows of his mart. But Shenstone has filled his pages with the cries of an amiable being whose soul bleeds in the dead oblivion of solitude. Listen to his melancholy expressions. 'Now can come from a visit, every little uneasiness is sufficient to introduce my whole train of melancholy considerations, and to make me utterly dissatisfied with the life I now lead, and the life I foresee I shall lead. I am angry, and envious, and dejected and frantic, and disregard all present things, as becomes a madman to do. I am infinitely pleased though it is a gloomy joy with the application of Dr Swift's complaint, that he is forced to die in a rage, like a plumed rat in a hole.' Let the lover of solitude muse on a picture throughout the year, in the following stanza by the same poet:

Tedious again to curse the drizzling day,
Again to trace the wintry tracks of snow!
Or, soaked by vernal airs, again survey
The self-same hawthorns bud! and cowslips blow!

Swift's letters paint in terrifying colours a picture of solitude, and at length his despair closed with idiotism. The amiable Gresset could not sport with the brilliant life of his butterfly-muse, without dropping some querulous expression on the solitude of genius. In his 'Epistle to his Muse,' he exquisitely paints the situation of men of genius.

'—— Je les vois, victimes du genre,
Au folle prix d'un éclat passager,
Vivre isolés, sans jour de la vie !'

And afterwards he adds,

'Vingt ans d'ennui, pour quelques jours de gloire !'

I conclude with one more anecdote on solitude, which may amuse. When Menage, attacked by some, and abandoned by others, was seized by a fit of the spleen, he retreated into the country, and gave up his famous Mercuriales: those Wednesdays when the literati assembled at his house, to praise up or cry down one another, as is usual with the literary populace. Menage expected to find that tranquillity in the country which he had frequently described in his verses: but as he was only a poetical plagiarist, it is not strange our pastoral writer was greatly disappointed. Some country rogues having killed his pigeons, they gave him more vexation than his critics. He hastened his return to Paris. 'It is better,' he observed 'since we are born to suffer, to feel only reasonable sorrows.'

LITERARY FRIENDSHIPS.

The memorable friendship of Beaumont and Fletcher so closely united their labours, that we cannot discover the productions of either; and biographers cannot, without difficulty, compose the memoirs of the one, without running into the life of the other. They portrayed the same characters, while they mingled sentiment with sentiment, and their days were as closely interwoven as their verses. Metastasio and Farinelli were born about the same time, and early acquainted. They called one another Gemelle, or twin! Both the delight of Europe, both lived to an advanced age, and died nearly at the same time. Their fortune bore, too, a resemblance; for they were both pensioned, but lived and died separated in the distant courts of Vienna and Madrid. Montaigne and Charron were rivals, but always friends; such was Montaigne's affection for Charron, that he permitted him by his will to bear the full arms of his family; and Charron evinced his gratitude to the manes of his departed friend, by leaving his fortune to the sister of Montaigne, who had married. Forty years of friendship, uninterrupted by rivalry or envy, crowned the lives of Poggius and Leonard Aretin, two of the illustrious revivers of letters. A singular custom formerly prevailed among our own writers, which was an affectionate tribute to our literary veterans by young writers.—The former adopted the latter by the title of sons. Ben Jonson had twelve of these poetical sons. Walton, the angler, adopted Cotton, the translator of Montaigne.

Among the most fascinating effusions of genius are those little pieces which it consecrates to the cause of friendship. In that poem of Cowley, composed on the death of his friend Harvey, the following stanza presents a pleasing picture of the employments of two young students:—

'Say, for you saw us, ye immortal lights,
How oft unwearied have we spent the nights!
Till the Ledaean stars, so famed for love,
Wond'red at us from above.

We spent them not in toys, in lust, or wine;
But search of deep philosophy,
 Wit, eloquence, and poetry,
 Arts which I loved, for they, my friend, were thine.'

Milton has not only given the exquisite Lycidas to the memory of a young friend, but in his Epitaphium Damonis, to that of Deodatus, has poured forth some interesting sentiments. It has been versified by Langhorne. Now, says the poet,

'To whom shall I my hopes and fears impart,
Or trust the cares and follies of my heart?'

'The elegy of Tickell, maliciously called by Steele 'prose in rhyme,' is alike inspired by affection and fancy; it has a melodious languor, and a melancholy grace. The sonnet of Gray to the memory of West is a beautiful effusion, and a model for English sonnets. Helvetius was the protector of men of genius, whom he assisted not only with his criticism, but his fortune. At his death, Saurin read in the French academy an epistle to the manes of his friend. Saurin, wrestling with obscurity and poverty, had been drawn into literary existence by the supporting hand of Helvetius. Our poet thus addresses him in the warm tones of gratitude:

'C'est toi qui me cherchant au sein de l'infortune
Relevas mon sort abattu.
Et scus me rendre chose, un vie importune.

*
Qu'importent ces pleurs—
O douleur impuissante ! O regrets superflus !
Je vis, hélas ! Je vis, et mon ain n'est plus !

IMITATED.

In Misery's haunts thy friend thy boundless seize,
And give an urgent life some days of ease ;
Ah ! ye vain griefs, superfluous tears I chide !
I live, alas ! I live—and thou hast died !

The literary friendship of a father with his son is one of the rarest alliances in the republic of letters. It was gratifying to the feelings of young Gibbon, in the fervour of literary ambition, to dedicate his first fruits to his father. The too lively son of Crevillon, though his was a very different genius to the grandeur of his father's, yet dedicated his works, to him, and for a moment put aside his wit and railery for the pathetic expressions of filial veneration. We have had a remarkable instance in the two Richardsons ; and the father in his original manner, has, in the most glowing language, expressed his affectionate sentiments. He says, 'My time of learning was employed in business ; but, after all, I have the Greek and Latin tongues, because a part of me possesses them, to whom I can recur at pleasure, just as I have a hand when I would write or paint, feet to walk, and eyes to see. My son is my learning, as I am that to him which he has not.—We make one man, and such a compound man may probably produce what no single man can.' And further, 'I always think it my peculiar happiness to be as it were enlarged, expanded, made another man by the acquisition of my son ; and he thinks in the same manner concerning my union with him.' This is as curious as it is uncommon ; however the cynic may call it egotism !

Some for their friend have died penetrated with insupportable grief ; some have sacrificed their character to preserve his own ; some have shared their limited fortune ; and some have remained attached to their friend in the cold season of adversity.

Jurieu denounced Bayle as an impious writer, and drew his conclusions from the 'Avis aux Réfugiés.' This work is written against the Calvinists, and therefore becomes impious in Holland. Bayle might have exculpated himself with facility, by declaring the work was composed by La Roque ; but he preferred to be persecuted, rather than to ruin his friend ; he therefore was silent, and was condemned. When the minister Fouquet was abandoned by all, it was the men of letters he had patronized who never forsook his prison ; and many have dedicated their works to great men in their adversity, whom they scorned to notice at the time when they were noticed by all. The learned Goguet bequeathed his MSS and library to his friend Fugère, with whom he had united his affections and his studies. His work on the 'Origin of the Arts and Sciences' had been much indebted to his aid. Fugère, who knew his friend to be past recovery, preserved a mute despair, during the slow and painful disease, and on the death of Goguet, the victim of sensibility, perished amidst the manuscripts which his friend had, in vain, bequeathed to prepare for publication. The Abbé de Saint Pierre gave an interesting proof of literary friendship. When he was at college, he formed a union with Varignon, the geometrician. They were of congenial dispositions. When he went to Paris, he invited Varignon to accompany him ; but Varignon had nothing, and the Abbé was far from rich. A certain income was necessary for the tranquil pursuits of geometry. Our Abbé had an income of 1800 livres ; from this he deducted 300, which he gave to the geometrician, accompanied by a delicacy which few but a man of genius could conceive. 'I do not give it to you,' he said, 'as a salary, but an annuity, that you may be independent, and quit me when you dislike me.' Something nearly similar embellishes our own literary history. When Akenside was in great danger of experiencing famine as well as fame, Mr Dyson allowed him three hundred pounds a year. Of this gentleman, perhaps, nothing is known ; yet whatever his life may be, it merits the tribute of the biographer. To close with these honourable testimonies of literary friendship, we must not omit that of Churchill and Lloyd. It is known that when Lloyd heard of the death of our poet, he acted the part which Fugère did to Goguet. The page is crowded, but my facts are by no means exhausted.

The most illustrious of the ancients prefixed the name of some friend to the head of their works.—We too often place that of some patron. They honourably inserted it in their works. When a man of genius, however, shows that he is not less mindful of his social affection than of his fame, he is the more loved by his reader. Plato commended a ray of his glory to his brothers, for in his repubb he ascribes some parts to Adimantus and Glaucon ; an Antiphon the youngest is made to deliver his sentiments in the Parmenides. To perpetuate the fondness of friendship several authors have entitled their works by the name of some cherished associate. Cicero to his Treatise of Orators gives the title of Brutus ; to that of Friends Lelius, and to that of Old Age, Cato. They have been imitated by the moderns. The poetical Tass, to his dialogue on Friendship gave the name of Manson, who was afterwards his affectionate biographer. Sepúlveda entitled his treatise on Glory by the name of his friend Gaspar. Lociel to his Dialogues on the Lawyers of Paris prefixed the name of the learned Pasquier. Thus Plutarch distinguished his Dialogues by the names of certain persons ; the one on Lying is entitled Hippicus ; and on Rhetoric Gorgias ; and on Beauty, Phædrus.

Luther has perhaps carried this feeling to an extravagant point. He was so delighted by his favourite 'Commentary on the Epistle to the Galatians,' that he designated it by a title of doing fondness ; he named it after his wife, and called it 'His Catharine.'

ANECDOTES OF ABSTRACTION OF MIND.

Some have exercised this power of abstraction to a degree that appears marvellous to volatile spirits, and puzzle thinkers.

To this patient habit, Newton is indebted for many of his great discoveries ; an apple falls upon him in his orchard,—and the system of attraction succeeds in his mind ! he observes boys blowing soap bubbles, and the properties of light display themselves ! Of Socrates, it is said, that he would frequently remain an entire day at night in the same attitude, absorbed in meditation ; as why shall we doubt this, when we know that La Fontaine and Thomson, Descartes and Newton, experienced the same abstraction ? Mercator, the celebrated geographer found such delight in the ceaseless progression of his studies that he would never willingly quit his maps to take the necessary refreshments of life. In Cicero's Treatise on Old Age, Cato applauds Gallus, who, when he sat down to write in the morning, was surprised by the evening ; as when he took up his pen in the evening, was surprised by the appearance of the morning. Buffon once describes these delicious moments with his accustomed eloquence. 'Invention depends on patience ; contemplate your subject long ; it will gradually unfold, till a sort of electric spas convulses for a moment the brain, and spreads down to the very heart a glow of irritation. Then come the luxuries of genius ! the true hours for production and composition hours so delightful that I have spent twelve and fourteen successively at my writing-desk, and still been in a state of pleasure.' It is probable that the anecdote related of Marini, the Italian poet, is true ; that he was once so absorbed in revising his Adonis, that he suffered his leg to be burnt for some time, without any sensibility.

Abstraction of this sublime kind is the first step to the noble enthusiasm which accompanies Genius : it produces those raptures and that intense delight, which some curious facts will explain to us.

Poggiori relates of Dante, that he indulged his meditations more strongly than any man he knew ; whenever he read, he was only alive to what was passing in his mind to all human concerns, he was, as if they had not been. Dante went one day to a great public procession ; he entered the shop of a bookseller to be a spectator of it passing show. He found a book which greatly interested him ; he devoured it in silence, and plunged into any abyss of thought.—On his return he declared that he had not seen, nor heard, the slightest occurrence of the public exhibition which passed before him. This enthusiasm renders every thing surrounding us as distant as if it were in a remote interval separated us from the scene. A mode astronomer, one summer night, withdrew to his chamber the brightness of the heaven showed a phenomenon. It passed the whole night in observing it, and when the dawn came to him early in the morning, and found him in the same attitude, he said, like one who had been recollecting his thoughts for a few moments, 'It must be thus ; but I go to bed before 'tis late? He had gazed the entire night in meditation, and did not know it.

This intense abstraction operates visibly: this perturbation of the faculties, as might be supposed, affects persons of genius physically. What a forcible description the late Madam Roland, who certainly was a woman of the first genius, gives of herself on her first reading of Telemachus and Tasso. 'My respiration rose: I felt a rapid fire colouring my face, and my voice changing, had betrayed my agitation; I was Eucharis for Telemachus, and Erminia for Tancréd: however during this perfect transformation, I did not yet think that I myself was anything, for any one. The whole had no connexion with myself, I sought for nothing around me; I was them, I saw only the objects which existed for them; it was a dream, without being awakened.'—Metastasio describes a similar situation. 'When I apply with a little attention, the nerves of my sensorium are put into a violent tumult. I grow as red in the face as a drunkard, and am obliged to quit my work.' When Malebranche first took up Descartes on Man, the germ and origin of his philosophy, he was obliged frequently to interrupt his reading by a violent palpitation of the heart. When the first idea of the Essay on the Arts and Sciences rushed on the mind of Rousseau, it occasioned such a feverish agitation that it approached to a delirium.

This delicious inebriation of the imagination occasioned the ancients, who sometimes perceived the effects, to believe it was not short of divine inspiration. Fielding says, 'I do not doubt but that the most pathetic and affecting pieces have been writ with tears. He perhaps would have been pleased to have confirmed his observation by the following circumstances. The tremors of Dryden, after having written an Ode, a circumstance tradition has accidentally handed down, were not unusual with him; in the preface to his Tales he tells us, that, in translating Homer he found greater pleasure than in Virgil; but it was not a pleasure without pain; the continual agitation of the spirits must needs be a weakener to any constitution, especially in age, and many pauses are required for refreshment between the heats.' In writing the ninth scene of the second act of the Olympiad, Metastasio found himself in tears; the effect which afterwards, says Dr Burney, proved very dangerous. It was on this occasion that that tender poet commemorated the circumstance in the following interesting sonnet:

SONNET FROM METASTASIO.

Vivendo l'Autore in Vienna l'anno 1733 la Sua Olimpiade si senti commossa fino alle lagrime nell' esprimere la divisione di due teneri amici; e meravigliandosi che un falso, ed a lui inventato disastro, potesse cagionarli una sì vera passione, si fece a riflettere quanto poco ragioni e solido fondamento possano aver le altre che agizion frequentemente agitarci, nel corso di nostra vita.

Sogni, e favole io fingo, e pure in carte
Mentre favole, e sogni, orno e disegno,
In lor, [folle ch'io Son] prendo tal parte
Che del mal che inventai piango, e mi adiego
Ma forse allor che non m'inganna l'arte,
Più saggio io sono e l'agitato ingegno
Forse allo più tranquillo? O forse parto
Da più salda cagion l'amor, lo adiego?
Ah che non sol quelle, ch'io canto, o scrivo
Favole Son; ma quanto tampo, o spero,
Tant'è menzogna, e delirando io vivo!
Sogno della mia vita è il corso intero.
Deh tu, Signor, quando a destarmi arrivo
Fa, ch'io trovi riposo in Sen del VERO.

1733, the Author composing his Olympiad, felt himself suddenly moved, even to tears, in expressing the separation of two tender lovers. Surprised that a fiction-grief, invented too by himself, could raise so true a passion, he reflected how little reasonable and solid a foundation the others had, which so frequently agitated us in this state of our existence.

SONNET.—IMITATED.

Fables and dreams I feign; yet though but verse
The dreams and fables that adorn this scroll,
Fond fool, I rave, and grieve as I rehearse;
While genuine tears, for fancied sorrows roll.
Perhaps the dear delusion of my art
In wisdom; and the agitated mind,
As still responding to each plaintive part,
With love and rage, a tranquil heart can find.
Ah! not alone the tender rhymes I give
Are fictions; but my fears and hopes I deem

Are fables all; deliciously I live,
And life's whole course is one protracted dream.
Eternal power! when shall I wake to rest
This wearied brain on Truth's immortal breast?

RICHARDSON.

The censure which the Shakspeare of novelists has incurred for the tedious procrastination and the minute details of his fable; his slow unfolding characters, and the slightest gestures of his personages, is extremely unjust; for is it not evident that we could not have his peculiar excellences without these attendant defects? When characters are very fully delineated, the narrative must be suspended. Whenever the narrative is rapid, which so much delights superficial readers, the characters cannot be very minutely featured; and the writer who aims to instruct (as Richardson avowedly did) by the glow and eloquence of his feelings, must often sacrifice to this his local descriptions. Richardson himself has given us the principle that guided him in composing. He tells us, 'If I give speeches and conversations, I ought to give them justly; for the humours and characters of persons cannot be known unless I repeat what they say, and their manner of saying.'

Foreign critics have been more just to Richardson than many of his own countrymen. I shall notice the opinions of three celebrated writers, D'Alembert, Rousseau, and Diderot.

D'Alembert was a great mathematician. His literary taste was extremely cold; he was not worthy of reading Richardson. The volumes, if he ever read them, must have fallen from his hands. The delicate and subtle turnings, those folds of the human heart, which require so nice a touch, was a problem which the mathematician could never solve. There is no other demonstration in the human heart, but an appeal to its feelings; and what are the calculating feelings of an arithmetician of lines and curves? He therefore declared of Richardson that 'La Nature est bonne à amiter, mais non pas jusqu'au l'ennui.'

But thus it was not with the other two congenial geniuses! The fervent opinion of Rousseau must be familiar to the reader; but Diderot, in his eulogy on Richardson, exceeds even Rousseau in the enthusiasm of his feelings. I extract some of the most interesting passages.

Of Clarissa he says, 'I yet remember with delight the first time it came into my hands. I was in the country. How deliciously was I affected! At every moment I saw my happiness abridged by a page. I then experienced the same sensations those feel who have long lived with one they love, and are on the point of separation. At the close of the work I seemed to remain deserted.'

The impassioned Diderot then breaks forth; 'O Richardson! thou singular genius in my eyes! thou shalt form my reading in all times. If forced by sharp necessity, my friend falls into indigence: if the mediocrity of my fortune is not sufficient to bestow on my children the necessary cares for their education, I will sell my books,—but thou shalt remain, yes thou shalt rest in the same class with Moses, Homer, Euripides, and Sophocles, to be read alternately.

'Oh Richardson, I dare pronounce that the most veritable history is full of fictions, and thy romances are full of truths. History paints some individuals; thou paintest the human species.—History attributes to some individuals what they have neither said, nor done; all that thou attributest to man he has said and done. History embraces but a portion of duration, a point on the surface of the globe; thou hast embraced all places and all times. The human heart, which has ever been and ever shall be the same, is the model thou copiest. If we were severely to criticise the best historian, would he maintain his ground as thou? In this point of view, I venture to say, that frequently history is a miserable romance; and romance, as thou hast composed it, is a good history. Painter of nature, thou never liest!

'I have never yet met with a person who shared my enthusiasm, that I was not tempted to embrace, and to press him in my arms!

'Richardson is no more! His loss touches me, as if my brother was no more. I bore him in my heart without having seen him, and knowing him but by his works. He has not had all the reputation he merited. Richardson! if living, thy merit has been disputed; how great will thou appear to our children's children, when they shall view thee at the distance we now view Homer. Then who will dare to steal a line from thy sublime works! Thou hast had more admirers amongst us than in thine own country, and at this I rejoice!

It is probable that to a Frenchman the style of Richardson is not so objectionable when translated, as to ourselves. I think myself, that it is very idiomatic and energetic; others have thought differently. The misfortune of Richardson was, that he was unskilful in the art of writing, and that he could never lay the pen down while his inkhorn supplied it.

He was delighted by his own works. No author enjoyed so much the bliss of excessive fondness. I heard from the late Charlotte Lennox, the anecdote which so severely reprimanded his innocent vanity, which Boswell has recorded. This lady was a regular visitor at Richardson's house, and she could scarcely recollect one visit which was not taxed by our author reading one of his voluminous letters, or two or three, if his auditor was quiet and friendly.

The extreme delight which he felt on a review of his own works themselves witness. Each is an evidence of what some will deem a violent literary vanity. To Pamela is prefixed a letter from the editor (whom we know to be the author), consisting of one of the most minutely laboured panegyrics of the work itself, that ever the blindest idolator of some ancient classic paid to the object of his phrenetic imagination. In several places there, he contrives to repeat the striking parts of the narrative, which display the fertility of his imagination to great advantage. To the author's own edition of his Clarissa is appended an alphabetical arrangement of the sentiments dispersed throughout the work; and such was the fondness that dictated this voluminous arrangement, that such trivial aphorisms as, 'habits are not easily changed'; 'Men are known by their companions,' &c., seem alike to be the object of their author's admiration. This collection of sentiments, said indeed to have been sent to him anonymously, is curious and useful, and shows the value of the work, by the extensive grasp of that mind which could think so justly on such numerous topics. And in his third and final labour, to each volume of Sir Charles Grandison is not only prefixed a complete index, with as much exactness, as if it were a History of England, but there is also appended a list of the similies and allusions in the volume; some of which do not exceed three or four in nearly as many hundred pages.

Literary history does not record a more singular example of that self-delight which an author has felt on a revision of his works. It was this intense pleasure which produced his voluminous labours. It must be confessed there are readers deficient in that sort of genius which makes the mind of Richardson so fertile and prodigal.

THEOLOGICAL STYLE.

In the present volume some notice has been taken of the attempts to recompose the Bible, in a finical affected style; but the broad vulgar colloquial diction, which has been used by our theological writers, is less tolerable than the quaintness of Castalian and the floridity of Pere Berruyer. I omitted to preserve a specimen in its proper place.

The style now noticed was familiar to, and long disgraced the writings of, our divines; and we see it sometimes still employed by some of a certain stamp. Matthew Henry, whose Commentaries are well known, writes in this manner on Judges ix.—'We are here told by what acts Abimelech got into the saddle.—None would have dreamed of making such a fellow as he king.—See how he has wheeled them into the choice. He hired into his service the scum and scoundrels of the country. Jotham was really a fine gentleman.—The Sechemites that set Abimelech up, were the first to kick him off. The Sechemites said all the ill they could of him in their table-talk; they drank healths to his confusion.—Well, Gaal's interest in Sechem is soon at an end. Exit Gaal!'

Lancelot Addison, by the vulgar coarseness of his style, forms an admirable contrast with the amenity and grace of his son's Spectators. He tells us, in his voyage to Barbary, that 'A rabbin once told him, among other heinous stuff, that he did not expect the felicity of the next world on the account of any merits but his own; whoever kept the law would arrive at the bliss, by coming upon his own legs.'

It must be confessed that the rabbin, considering he could not conscientiously have the same creed as Addison, did not deliver any very 'heinous stuff,' in believing that other people's merits have nothing to do with our own; and that 'we should stand on our own legs!' But this is not 'proper words in proper places.'

INFLUENCE OF NAMES.

What's in a Name? That which we call a rose,
By any other name would smell as sweet.

NAMES, by an involuntary suggestion, produce an extraordinary illusion. Favour or disappointment has been often conceded as the name of the claimant has affected us; and the accidental affinity or coincidence of a name connected with ridicule or hatred, with pleasure or disgust, has operated like magic. But the facts connected with this subject will show how this prejudice has been ed out.

Sterne has touched on this unreasonable propensity, judging by names, in his humorous account of the old Mr Shandy's system of christian names. And Wills has expressed, in Boswell's Life of Johnson, all the influence of Baptismal names, even in matters of poetry! He said, 'The last city poet was Elkanah Settle. There something in names, which one cannot help feeling. No Elkanah Settle sounds so queer, who can expect men from that name? We should have no hesitation to give for John Dryden in preference to Elkanah Settle, from a name only, without knowing their different merits.'

A lively critic noticing some American poets says 'There is or was a Mr Dwight who wrote a poem in the shape of an epic; and his baptismal name was Timothy and involuntarily we infer the sort of epic that a Timothy must write. Sterne humorously exhorts all god-fathers not 'to Nicodemus a man into nothing!'

There is more truth in this observation than some may be inclined to allow; and that it affects mankind strongly all ages and all climates may be called on to testify. Even in the barbarous age of Louis XI, they felt a delicacy respecting names, which produced an ordinance from his majesty. The king's barber was named Olivier le Diable. At first the king allowed him to get rid of the offensive part by changing it to le Malin, but the improvement was not happy, and for a third time he was called Le Mauvais. Even this did not answer his purpose; and as he was a great racer he finally had his majesty's ordinance to be called Le Dain, under penalty of law if any one should call him Le Diable, le Malin, or le Mauvais. According to Platina, Sergius the Second was the first pope who changed his name in ascending the papal throne; because his proper name was Hog's mouth, very unsuitable with the pomp of the tiara. The ancients felt the same fastidiousness; and among the Romans, those who were called to the equestrian order, having low and vulgar names were new-named on the occasion, lest the former should disgrace the dignity.

When Barbier, a French wit, was chosen for the preceptor of Colbert's son, he felt his name was so ungenial to his new profession, that he assumed the more splendid one of D'Aucour, by which he is now known. Madame Gomez had married a person named Bonhomme but she would never exchange her nobler Spanish name if prefix her married one to her romances, which indicates too much of meek humility. Guez (a beggar) is a French writer of great pomp of style, but he felt such extreme delicacy at so low a name, that to give some authority to his splendour of his diction, he assumed the name of his estate; and is well known as Balzac. A French poet of the name of Theophile Viaud, finding that his surname pronounced like veau (calf) exposed him to the infinite jests of the minor wits, silently dropped it, by retaining the more poetical appellation of Theophile. The learned Baillet has collected various literary artifices employed by some who still preserving a natural attachment to the names of their fathers, yet blushing at the same time for their meanness, have in their Latin works attempted to obviate the ridicule which they provoked. One Gaucher (left-handed) borrowed the name of Scévola, because Scévola, having burst his right arm, became consequently left-handed. This also one De la Borgne (one-eyed) called himself Strabo; De Charpentier took that of Fabritius; De Valet translated his Servilius; and an unlucky gentleman, who bore the name of De bout d'homme, boldly assumed that of Vivian. Dorat, a French poet, had for his real name Dienmenand, which, in the dialect of the Limousins, signifies one who dines in the morning; that is, who has no other dinner than his breakfast. This degrading name he changed to lost, or gilded, a nickname which one of his ancestors got borne for his fair tresses. But by changing his name, his feelings were not entirely quieted, for unfortunately his laughter cherished an invincible passion for a learned man, the unluckily was named Goutte: that is, a shark, or glutinous as a shark. Miss Dianemardi fell naturally a strong attraction for a goutte; and in spite of her father's monstrosities, she once more renewed his sorrows in this place!

There are unfortunate names, which are very injurious to the cause in which they are engaged; for instance, the long parliament in Cromwell's time, called by derision the Rump, was headed by one Barebones, a leatherseller. It was afterwards called by his unlucky name, which served to brighten the ridicule cast over it by the nation.

Formerly a custom prevailed with learned men to change their names. They showed at once their contempt for vulgar denominations and their ingenious erudition. They christened themselves with Latin and Greek. This disguising of names came, at length, to be considered to have a political tendency, and so much alarmed Pope the Second, that he imprisoned several persons for their using certain affected names, and some, indeed, which they could not give a reason why they assumed. Johannes Erasmus was a name formed out of his family name Gerard, which in Dutch signifies amiable; or GAM at least nature. He first changed it to a Latin word of the same signification. Denderius, which afterwards is related into the Greek Erasmus, by which names he was known. The celebrated Reuchlin, which in German signifies smoke, considered it more dignified to smoke in Greek, by the name of Capsno. An Italian physician of the name of Senza Makisia prided himself as much on his translating it into the Greek Alakia, as on the works which he published under that name. One of the most sensible of the reformers was originally named Hertz Belmours (black earth,) which he elegantly turned into the Greek name of Melancthon. The vulgar name of a great Italian poet was Trappasso, but when the learned Quirina resolved to devote the youth to the muses, he gave him a mellifluous name, which they have long known and cherished—Metastasio.

Harsh names will have, in spite of all our philosophy, a painful and ludicrous effect on our ears and our associations; it is vexatious that the softness of delicious vowels, or the ruggedness of inexorable consonants, should at all be connected with a man's happiness, or even have an influence on his fortune.

The actor Macklin was softened down by taking in the first and last syllables of the name of Macklaughlin, as Mallock was polished to Mallet, and even our sublime Milton, in a moment of humour and hatred to the Scots, undertakes to insinuate that their barbarous names are symbolical of their natures,—and from a man of the name of Mac Collettick, he expects no mercy. Virgil, when young, formed a design of a national poem, but was soon discouraged from proceeding, merely by the roughness and asperity of the old Roman names, such as Decius and Lucanus; Vobiscus Caudex. The same thing has happened to a friend who began an Epic on the subject of Walter's discoveries: the name of the hero often will produce a ludicrous effect, but one of the most unlucky of his chief heroes must be Thomas Doughty! One of Blackstone's chief heroes in his Alfred is named Gunter; a printer's erratum might have been fatal to all his heroes; as it is, he makes a sorry appearance. Metastasio named himself in the same situation. In one of his letters to his wife, 'The title of my new opera is Il Re Pastor. The chief incident is the restitution of the kingdom of Sicily to the lawful heir: a prince with such a hypocritical name, that he would have disgraced the title page of any piece: who would have been able to bear an opera called L'Abdicatione? I have contrived to name him as pleasant as possible.' So true is it, as the caustic Boileau expresses of an epic poet of his days, who had shown some facility in cacophony, when he choose his hero—

This epic poet perceiving the town joined in the severe railery of the poet, published a long defence of his hero's name; but the town was inexorable, and the epic poet afterwards changed Childebrand's name to Charles Martel, which probably was discovered to have something more humane. Corneille's Partharite was an unsuccessful tragedy, and Voltaire deduces its ill fortune partly from its barbarous names, such as Garibald and Edvige. Voltaire, in giving the names of the founders of Helvetic freedom, says the difficulty of pronouncing these respectable names is injurious to their celebrity; they are Melchitad, Stauffer and Valtherfva.

We almost hesitate to credit what we know to be true, that the length or the shortness of a name can seriously influence the mind. But history records many facts of this nature. Some nations have long cherished a feeling that there is a certain elevation or abasement in proper names. Montaigne on this subject says, 'A gentleman, one of my neighbours, in overvaluing the excellencies of old times, never omitted noticing the pride and magnificence of the names of the nobility of those days! Don Grumelian, Quadrage, Argesilan, when fully sounded, were evidently men of another stamp than Peter, Giles, and Michel. What could be hoped for from the names of Ebenezer, Malachi, and Methusalem? The Spaniards have long been known for cherishing a passion for dignified names, and are marvellously affected by long and voluminous ones; to enlarge them they often add the places of their residence. We ourselves seem affected by triple names, and the authors of certain periodical publications always assume for their son de guerre a triple name, which doubtless raises them much higher in their readers' esteem than a mere christian and surname. Many Spaniards have given themselves names from some remarkable incident in their lives. One took the name of the Royal Transport for having conducted the Infanta in Italy. Orendayes added de la Paz, for having signed the peace in 1726. Navarro, after a naval battle off Toulon, added la Vittoria, though he had remained in safety at Cadiz while the French Admiral Le Court had fought the battle, which was entirely in favour of the English. A favourite of the King of Spain, a great genius, and the friend of Farinelli, who had sprung from a very obscure origin, to express his contempt of these empty and haughty names, assumed, when called to the administration, that of the Marquis of La Ennemada (nothing in himself.)

But the influence of long names is of very ancient standing. Lucian notices one Simon, who coming to a great fortune aggrandised his name to Simonides. Dioclesian had once been plain Diocles before he was Emperor. When Bruna became Queen of France, it was thought proper to convey some of the regal pomp in her name by calling her Bruneauville.

The Spaniards then must feel a most singular contempt for a very short name, and on this subject Fuller has recorded a pleasant fact. An opulent citizen of the name of John Cuts (what name can be more unluckily short?) was ordered by Elizabeth to receive the Spanish Ambassador; but the latter complained grievously, and thought he was disparaged by the shortness of his name. He imagined that a man bearing a monosyllabic name could never, in the great alphabet of civil life, have performed any thing great or honourable; but when he found that honest John Cuts displayed a hospitality which had nothing monosyllabic in it, he groaned only at the utterance of the name of his host.

There are names indeed, which in the social circle will in spite of all due gravity awaken a harmless smile, and Shenstone solemnly thanked God that his name was not liable to a pun. There are some names which excite horror, such as Mr Stab-back; others contempt, as Mr Two-penny; and others of vulgar or absurd signification, subject too often to the insolence of domestic wifings, which occasions irritation even in the minds of worthy, but suffering, men.

There is an association of pleasing ideas with certain names; and in the literary world they produce a fine effect. Bloomfield is a name apt and fortunate for that rustic bard; as Florida seems to describe his sweet and flowery style. Dr Parr derived his first acquaintance with the late Mr Homer from the aptness of his name, associating with his pursuits. Our writers of Romances and Novels are initiated into all the arcana of names, which costs them many painful inventions. It is recorded of one of the old Spanish writers of romance, that he was for many days at a loss to coin a fit name for one of his giants; he wished to hammer out one equal in magnitude to the person he conceived in imagination; and in the haughty and lofty name of Troquetantus, he thought he had succeeded. Richardson, the great father of our novelists, appears to have considered the name of Sir Charles Grandison, as perfect as his character, for his Heroine writes, 'You know his noble name, my Lucy.' He felt the same for his Clementina, for Miss Byron writes, 'Ah, Lucy, what a pretty name is Clementina?' We experience a certain tenderness for names, and persons of refined imaginations are fond to give affectionate or lively epithets to things and persons they love. Petrarch would call one friend Lelius, and another Socrates, as descriptive of their character. In more ancient times, in our own country, the ladies appear to have been equally sensible to poetical or elegant names, such as Altria, Celestia, Diana, Helena, &c., a curious point amply proved by Mr Chalmers, in his Apology for the Believers in the Shakspeare Papers, p. 178. Spenser, the poet, gave to his two sons two names of this kind; he called one Silvanus, from the woody Kilmolan, his estate; and the other Peregrine, from his having been born in a strange place, and his mother then travelling. The fair Eloisa gave the whimsical name of Astrolabus to her boy; it bore some reference to the stars, as her own to the sun.

Whether this name of Astrolabus had any scientific influence over the son, I know not; but I have no doubt that whimsical names may have a great influence over our characters. The practice of romantic names among persons even of the lowest orders of society, has become a very general evil, and doubtless many unfortunate beauties, of the names of Clarissa and Eloisa, might have escaped under the less dangerous appellatives of Elizabeth or Deborah. I know a person who has not passed his life without some inconvenience from his name, mean talents and violent passions not according with Antonius: and a certain writer of verses, seldom sober, might have been no versifier, and less a lover of the true Falerian, had it not been for his namesake of Horace. The Americans by assuming Roman names, produce some ludicrous associations. Romulus Riggs, is the name of a performer, and Junius Brutus Booth of a stroller! There was, however, more sense when the Foundling Hospital was first instituted, in baptising the most robust boys, designed for the sea-service by the names of Drake, Norris, or Blake, after our famous Admirals.

It is no trifling misfortune in life to bear an illustrious name; and in an author it is peculiarly severe. A History now by a Mr Hume, or a poem by a Mr Pope, would be examined by different eyes than had they borne any other name. The relative of a great author should endeavour not to be an author. Thomas Corneille had the unfortunate honour of being brother to a great poet, and his own merits have been considerably injured by the involuntary comparison. The son of Racine has written with an amenity not unworthy of his celebrated father; amiable and candid, he had his portrait painted, with the works of his father in his hand, and his eye fixed on this verse from Phœdre:

'Et moi, fils inconnu ! d'un si glorieux Père !'

But even his modesty only served to whet the dart of Epigram. It was once bitterly said of the son of an eminent literary character :

'He tries to write because his father writ,
And shows himself a bastard by his wit.'

Amongst some of the disagreeable consequences attending some names, is, when they are unfortunately adapted to an uncommon rhyme; but, indeed, how can any man defend himself from this malicious ingenuity of wit? Ferret, one of those unfortunate victims to Boileau's verse, is said not to have been deficient in the decorum of his manners, and he complained that he was represented as a drunkard, merely because his name rhymed to Calaret. Murphy, no doubt, studied hard, and solaced himself in his literary quarrel with Dr Franklin, the poet and critical reviewer, by adopting the singular rhyme of 'Envy ranking' to his rival's and critic's name.

Superstition has interfered even in the choice of names, and this solemn folly has received the name of a science, called Onomantia; of which the superstitious ancients discovered a hundred foolish mysteries. They cast up the numeral letters of names, and Achilles was therefore fated to vanquish Hector, from the numeral letters in his name amounting to a higher number than his rival's. This made many whimsical divisions and subdivisions of names to prove them lucky or unlucky. But these follies are those that I am now treating on. Some names have been considered as more auspicious than others. Cicero informs us that when the Romans raised troops, they were anxious that the name of the first soldier who enlisted should be one of good augury. When the censors numbered the citizens, they always begun by a fortunate name, such as Salvius Valerius. A person of the name of Augustinus was chosen emperor, merely from the royal son of his name, and Jovian was elected because his name approached nearest to the beloved one of the philosopher Julian. This fanciful superstition was even carried so far that some were considered as auspicious, and others as unfortunate. The superstitious belief in auspicious names was so strong, that Cæsar, in his African expedition, gave a command to an obscure and distant relative of the Scipios, to please the popular prejudice that the Scipios were invincible in Africa. Suetonius observes that all those of the family of Cæsar who bore the surname of Cains perished by the sword. The Emperor Severus consulted himself for the licentious life of his Empress Juia, from the fatality attending those of her name. This strange prejudice of lucky and unlucky names prevailed in modern Europe; the successor of Adrian VI, (as Guicciardini tells us) wished to preserve his own name on the papal throne; but he gave up the wish when the conclaves cardinals used the powerful argument that all the popes who had preserved their own names had died in the first year of their pontificates. Cardinal Marcel Cervin, who preserved his name when elected pope, died on the twentieth day of his pontificate, and thus confirmed this superstitious opinion. La Motte le Vayer gravely asserts that all the Queens of Naples of the name of Jean, and the Kings of Scotland of the name of James, have been an unfortunate, and we have formal treatises of the fatality of christian names.

It is a vulgar notion that every female of the name of Agnes is fated to become mad. Every nation has some names labouring with this popular prejudice. Herren the Spanish historian, records an anecdote in which the choice of a queen entirely arose from her name. When two French ambassadors negotiated a marriage between one of the Spanish princesses and Louis VIII, the name of the royal females Urraca and Blanche. The former was the elder and the more beautiful, and intended by the Spanish court for the French monarch; but they respectively preferred Blanche, observing that the name of Urraca would never do! and for the sake of a more melodious sound, they carried off, exulting in their own discerning ears, the happier named, but less beautiful princess.

There are names indeed which are painful to the feelings, from the associations of our passions. I have seen the christian name of a gentleman, the victim to the caprice of his godfather, who is called Blast us Godly,—which were he designed for a bishop, must irritate religious feelings. I am not surprised that one of the Spanish monarchs refused to employ a sound Catholic for his secretary, because his name (Martin Lustro) had an affinity to the name of the reformer. Mr Rose has recently informed us that an architect called Malacarne, who I believe, had nothing against him but his name, was lately deprived of his place as principal architect by the Austrian government. Let us hope not for his unlucky name! though that government, according to Mr Rose, acts on capricious principles! The fondness which some have felt to perpetuate their names, when their race has fallen extinct, is well known; and a fortune has then been bestowed for a change of name; but the affection for names has gone even further. A similitude of names, Camden observes, 'doth kindle sparks of love and liking among mere strangers.' I have observed the great pleasure of persons with uncommon names, meeting with another of the same name; an instant relationship appears to take place, and frequently fortunes have been bequeathed for namesake. An ornamental manufacturer who bears a name which he supposes to be very uncommon, having executed an order of a gentleman of the same name, refused to send his bill, never having met with the like, preferring the honour of serving him for namesake.

Among the Greeks and the Romans, beautiful and significant names were studied. The sublime Plato himself has noticed the present topic,—his visionary ear was sensible to the delicacy of a name, and his exalted fancy was degated with beautiful names, as well as every other species of beauty. In his Cratylus he is solicitous, that persons should have happy, harmonious, and attractive names. According to Aulus Gellus, the Athenians enacted by a public decree, that no slave should ever bear the unscrupulous names of their two youthful patriots, Harmolus and Aristogiton; names which had been devoted to the liberties of their country, they considered would be contaminated by servitude. The ancient Romans, decreed that the surname of infamous patricians should not be borne by any other patrician of that family, that their very names might be degraded and expire with them. Eutrochius gives a pleasing proof of national friendships being cemented by a name; by a treaty of peace between the Romans and the Sabines they agree to melt the two nations into one mass, that they should bear their names conjointly; the Roman should add his to the Sabine, and the Sabine take a Roman name.

The ancients named both persons and things from some seat, or other circumstance, connected with the object they were to name. Chance, fancy, superstition, fondness, and piety have invented names. It was a common and whimsical custom among the ancients (observes Lartius) to give us nicknames, the letters of the alphabet.—Thus a lame girl was called Lambda, on account of the resemblance which her lameness made her bear to the letter λ , or lambda! Æsop was called Theta by his master, from his superior acuteness. Another was called Beta, from his love of beet. It was thus Scarron, with infinite good temper, alluded to his zig-zag body, by comparing himself to the letters s or z.

The learned Calmet also notices among the Hebrew, nick-names, and names of railery taken from defects of body, or mind, &c. One is called Nabal or fool; another Enanor the Ass; Hagab the Grasshopper, &c. Women had frequently the names of animals; as Deborah the Bee; Rachel the Sheep. Others from their nature or other qualifications; as Tamar the Palm-tree; Hadassa the Myrtle; Sarah the Princess; Hannah the Gracious.—The Indians of North America employ sublime and picturesque names; such are the Great Eagle—the Partridge—Dawn of the Day!—Great swift arrow—Path-opener!—Sun-bright!

THE JEWS OF YORK.

Among the most interesting passages of history are those in which we contemplate an oppressed, yet sublime spirit, agitated by the conflict of two terrific passions: imbecile hatred attempting a resolute vengeance, while but vengeance, though impotent, with dignified and silent horror, sinks into the last expression of despair. In a degenerate nation, we may, on such rare occasions, discover among them a spirit superior to its companions and its fortune.

In the ancient and modern history of the Jews, we may find two kindred examples. I refer the reader for the first ancient narrative, to the second book of the Maccabees, chap. xiv. v. 37. No feeble and unaffecting painting is presented in the simplicity of the original: I proceed to state the narrative of the Jews of York.

When Richard I. ascended the throne, the Jews, to continue the royal protection, brought their tributes. Many of them, from remote parts of England, and appearing in Westminster, the court and the mob imagined that they had leagued to bewitch his majesty. An edict was issued, forbidding their presence at the coronation; but several, whose curiosity was greater than their prudence, conceived that they might pass unobserved among the crowd, and venture to insinuate themselves into the abbey. Probably their voice and their visage alike betrayed them for they were soon discovered; they flew diversely in great confusion, while many were dragged out with little remains of life.

A rumour spread rapidly through the city, that in honour of the festival, the Jews were to be massacred. The populace, at once eager of royalty and riot, pillaged and burnt houses, and murdered the devoted Jews. Benedict, Jew of York, to save his life, received baptism; and, fleeing to that city, to his friend Jocenus, the most just of the Jews, died of his wounds. Jocenus and servants narrated the late tragic circumstances to their adherents, but where they hoped to move sympathy, they kindled rage. The people at York soon gathered to imitate the people at London; and their first assault was on the house of the late Benedict, which having some strength and magnitude, contained his family and friends, who found their graves in its ruins. The alarmed Jews hastened to Jocenus, who conducted them to the governor of York Castle, and prevailed on him to afford them an asylum for their persons and effects. In the meanwhile their habitations were levelled, and the owners murdered; except a few unresisting beings, who unmanly in sustaining honour, were adapted to receive baptism.

The castle had sufficient strength for their defence; but a suspicion arising that the governor, who often went out, intended to betray them, they one day refused him entrance. He complained to the sheriff of the county, and the chiefs of the violent party, who stood deeply indebted to the Jews, uniting with him, orders were issued to attack the castle. The cruel multitude united with the soldiery felt such a desire of slaughtering those they intended to despoil, that the sheriff, repenting of the order, revoked it, but in vain; fanaticism and robbery once set loose will satiate their appetency for blood and plunder. They solicited the aid of the superior citizens, who perhaps not owing quite so much money to the Jews, humanely refused it; but having addressed the clergy (the barbarous clergy of those days) were by them animated, conducted, and blessed.

The leader of this rabble was a canon regular, whose zeal was so fervent, that he stood by them in his surplice, which he considered as a coat of mail, and reiteratedly exclaimed, 'Destroy the enemies of Jesus.' This spiritual laconism invigorated the arm of men, who perhaps wanted no other stimulative than the hope of obtaining the immense property of the besieged. is related of this canon, that every morning before he went to assist in battering the walls, he swallowed a consecrated wafer. One day having approached too near, defended as he conceived by his surplice, this church militant was crushed by a heavy fragment of the wall, rolled from the battlement.

But the avidity of certain plunder prevailed over any reflection, which, on another occasion, the loss of so pious a leader might have raised. Their attacks continued; till at length the Jews perceived they could hold out no longer, and a council was called, to consider what remained to be done in the extremity of danger.

Among the Jews, their elder Rabbim was most respected. It has been customary with this people to invite for this place some foreigner, renowned among them for the depth of his learning, and the sanctity of his manners. At this time the Haham, or elder Rabbim, was a foreigner who had been sent over to instruct them in their laws, and was a person, as we shall observe of no ordinary qualifications. When the Jewish council was assembled, the Haham rose, and addressed them in this manner—'Men of Israel! the God of our ancestors is omniscient, and there is no one who can say why doest thou this? This day he commands us to die for his law; for that law which we have cherished from the first hour it was given, which we have preserved throughout our captivity in all nations, and which for the many consolations it has given us, and the eternal hope it communicates, can we do less than die? Posterity shall behold this book of truth, sealed with our blood; and our death, while it displays our sincerity, shall impart confidence to the wanderer of Israel. Death is before our eyes; and we have only to choose an honourable and easy one. If we fall into the hands of our enemies, which you know we cannot escape, our death will be ignominious and cruel; for these Christians, who picture the spirit of God in a dove, and confide in the meek Jesus, are thirst for our blood, and prowl around the castle like wolves. It is, therefore, my advice that we elude their tortures; that we ourselves should be our own executioners and that we voluntarily surrender our lives to our Creator. We trace the invisible Jehovah in his acts; God seems to call for us, but let us not be unworthy of that call. Suicide, on occasions like the present, is both rational and lawful; many examples are not wanting among our forefathers; as I advise men of Israel! they have acted on similar occasions.' Having said this, the old man sat down and wept.

The assembly was divided in their opinions. Men of fortitude applauded its wisdom, but the pusillanimous murmured that it was a dreadful council.

Again the Rabbim rose, and spoke these few words in a firm and decisive tone. 'My children; since we are not unanimous in our opinions, let those who do not approve of my advice depart from this assembly?'—Some departed, but the greater number attached themselves to their remanrable priest. They now employed themselves in consuming their valuables by fire; and every man, fearful of trusting to the timid and irresolute hand of the women, first destroyed his wife and children, and then himself. Jocenus and the Rabbis alone remained. Their life was protracted to the last, that they might see every thing performed, according to their orders. Jocenus, being the chief Jew, was distinguished by the last mark of human respect, in receiving his death from the consecrated hand of the aged Rabbi, who immediately after performed the melancholy duty on himself.

All this was transacted in the depth of the night. In the morning the walls of the castle were seen wrapt in flames, and only a few miserable and pusillanimous beings, unworthy of the sword, were viewed on the battlements, pointing to their extinct brethren. When they opened the gates of the castle, these men verified the prediction of their late Rabbi; for the multitude, bursting through the solitary courts, found themselves defrauded of their hopes, and in a moment avenged themselves on the feeble wretches, who knew not to die with honour.

Such is the narrative of the Jews of York, of whom the historian can only cursorily observe, that five hundred destroyed themselves; but it is the philosopher who inquires into the causes, and the manner of these glorious suicides. These are histories which meet only the eye of few, yet they are of infinitely more advantage than those which are read by every one. We instruct ourselves in meditating on these scenes of heroic exertion; and if by such histories we make but a slow progress in chronology, our heart is however expanded with sentiment.

I admire not the stoicism of Cato more than the fortitude of the Rabbi; or rather we should applaud that of the Rabbi much more; for Cato was familiar with the animating visions of Plato, and was the associate of Cicero and of Cæsar. The Rabbi had probably read only the Pentateuch, and mingled with companions of mean occupations, and meaner minds. Cato was accustomed to the grandeur of the mistress of the universe, and the Rabbi to the littleness of a provincial town. Men, like pictures, may be placed in an obscure and unfavourable light; but the finest picture, in the unilluminated corner, still retains the design and colouring of the master. My Rabbi is a companion for Cato. His history is a tale,

'Which Cato's self had not disdain'd to hear.'

THE SOVEREIGNTY OF THE SEAS.

The sovereignty of the seas, which foreigners dispute with us, is as much a conquest as any one obtained on land; it is gained and preserved by our cannon, and the French, who, for ages past, exclaim against what they call our tyranny, are only hindered from becoming themselves universal tyrants over land and sea, by that sovereignty of the seas without which Great Britain would cease to exist.

In the late memoir of the French Institute, I read a bitter philippic against this sovereignty, and a notice adapted to the writer's purpose of two great works: the one by Selden, and the other by Grotius, on this subject. The following is the historical anecdote useful to revive.

In 1634 a dispute arose between the English and Dutch concerning the herring-fishery upon the British coast.—The French and Dutch had always persevered in declaring that the seas were perfectly free; and grounded their reasons on a work of Hugo Grotius.

So early as in 1609 the great Grotius had published his treatise of Mare Liberum, in favour of the freedom of the seas. And it is a curious fact, that in 1618, Selden had composed another treatise in defence of the king's dominion over the seas; but which from accidents which are known, was not published till this dispute revived the controversy. Selden, in 1633, gave the world his Mare Clausum, in answer to the treatise of Grotius.

Both these great men felt a mutual respect for each other. They only knew the rivalry of genius.

As a matter of curious discussion, and legal investigation, the philosopher must incline to the arguments of Selden, who has proved by records the first occupancy of the English; and the English dominion over the four seas, to the utter exclusion of the French and Dutch from fishing, without our license. He proves that our kings have always levied great sums, without even the concurrence of their parliaments, for the express purpose of defending this sovereignty at sea. A copy of Selden's work was placed in the council-chest of the Exchequer, and in the court admiral's, as one of our most precious records.

The historical anecdote is finally closed by the Dutch themselves, who now agreed to acknowledge the English sovereignty in the seas, and pay a tribute of thirty thousand pounds to the King of England, for liberty to fish in the seas, and consented to annual tributes.

That the Dutch yielded to Selden's arguments in triumph we cannot venture to boast. The admiral's regalia prevailed; and when we had destroyed their whole fishing fleet, the affair appeared much clearer than in the ingenious volumes of Grotius or Selden. Another Dutchman presented the States-General with a ponderous reply to Selden's Mare Clausum, but the wise States-General advised the states to suppress the idle discussion; observing that this affair must be decided by the sword, and not by the pen.

It may be curious to add, that as no prevailing or fashionable subject can be agitated, but some idler must interfere to make it extravagant and very new, so this grave subject did not want for something of this nature. A learned Italian, I believe, agreed with our author Selden in general, that the sea, as well as the earth, is subject to some states; but he maintained, that the dominion of the sea belonged to the Genoese!

OF THE CUSTOM OF KISSING HANDS.

Mr Morin, a French academicien, has amused himself with collecting several historical notices of this custom.—I give a summary, for the benefit of those who have had the honour of kissing his majesty's hand. It is not those who kiss the royal hand who could write best on the custom.

This custom is not only very ancient, and nearly universal, but has been alike participated by religion and society.

To begin with religion. From the remotest times men saluted the sun, moon, and stars, by kissing the hand.—Job assures us that he was never given to this superstition xxii, 28. The same honour was rendered to Baal, Kings i, 18. Other instances might be adduced.

We now pass to Greece. There all foreign superstitions were received. Lucian, after having mentioned various sorts of sacrifices which the rich offered the gods, adds that the poor adorned them by the simpler compliment of kissing their hands. That author gives an anecdote of Demosthenes, which shows this custom. When a prisoner to the soldiers of Antipater, he asked to enter a temple.—When he entered, he touched his mouth with his hands, which the guards took for an act of religion. He did it, however, more securely to swallow the poison he had prepared for such an occasion. He mentions other instances.

From the Greeks it passed to the Romans. Pagan places it amongst those ancient customs of which they were ignorant of the origin or the reason. Persons were treated as atheists, who would not kiss their hands when they entered a temple. When Apuleius mentions Psyche he says, she was so beautiful that they adored her as Venus in kissing the right hand.

This ceremonial action rendered respectable the earliest institutions of Christianity. It was a custom with the primitive bishops to give their hands to be kissed by the ministers who served at the altar.

This custom however, as a religious rite, declined with Paganism.

In society our ingenious academicien considers the custom of kissing hands as essential to its welfare. It is a mute form, which expresses reconciliation, which entreats favours, or which thanks for those received. It is a universal language, intelligible without an interpreter: which doubtless preceded writing, and perhaps speech itself.

Solomon says of the flatterers and supplicants of his time that they ceased not to kiss the hands of their patrons, if they had obtained the favours which they solicited. If Homer we see Priam kissing the hands and embracing the knees of Achilles, while he supplicates for the body of Hector.

This custom prevailed in ancient Rome, but it varied in the first ages of the republic, it seems to have been only practised by inferiors to their superiors:—equals gave their hands and embraced. In the progress of time even the soldiers refused to show this mark of respect to the generals; and their kissing the hand of Cato when he was obliged to quit them was regarded as an extraordinary circumstance at a period of such refinement. The great respect paid to the tribunes, consuls, and dictators, obliged devils to live with them in a more distant and respectful manner; and instead of embracing them as they formerly, they considered themselves as fortunate if loved to kiss their hands. Under the emperors, kissing was become an essential duty, even for the great themselves; inferior courtiers were obliged to be content to have the purple, by kneeling, touching the robe of the emperor by the right hand, and carrying it to the mouth. Even this was thought too free; and at length they saluted an emperor at a distance, by kissing their hands, in the same manner as when they adored their gods.

It is superfluous to trace this custom in every country. It exists. It is practised in every known country, respect to sovereigns and superiors, even amongst the negroes, and the inhabitants of the New World. Cortez had established at Mexico, where more than a thousand lords saluted him, in touching the earth with their hands, which they afterwards carried to their mouths.

Thus, whether the custom of salutation is practised by kissing the hands of others from respect, or in bringing one's hand to the mouth, it is of all other customs the most unattractive. Mr Morin concludes, that this practice is now become too gross a familiarity, and it is considered as a weakness to kiss the hand of those with whom we are in a state of intercourse; and he prettily observes that this custom would be entirely lost, if lovers were not solicitous to preserve it in all its full power.

POPES.

Voltaire observes that the Popes scrupulously followed, from the early ages of the church, the custom of placing their names after that of the person whom they addressed in their letters. This mark of their humility he proves by letters written by various Popes. Thus when the great projects of politics were yet unknown to them, did they adopt to Christian meekness. There came at length the time when one of the Popes, whose name does not occur to us, said that 'it was safer to quarrel with a prince than with a friar. Henry VI being at the feet of Pope Celestine, his holiness thought proper to kick the crown off his head; which ludicrous and disgraceful action, Baronius has highly praised. Jortin observes on this great cardinal, 'an advocate of the Roman see, that he breathes nothing but fire and brimstone; and accounts kings and emperors to be mere catch-poles and constables, bound to execute the implicit faith all the commands of insolent ecclesiastics. Bellarmine was made a cardinal for his efforts and devotion to the papal cause, and maintaining this monstrous paradox,—that if the pope forbid the exercise of virtue, and command that of vice, the Roman church, under the name of sin, was obliged to abandon virtue for vice, if it did not sin against conscience!'

It was Nicholas I, a bold and enterprising Pope, who, in forgetting the pious modesty of his predecessors, took advantage of the divisions in the royal families of France, and did not hesitate to place his name before that of the king and emperors of the house of France, to whom he owed. Since that time he has been imitated by all his successors, and this encroachment on the honours of monarchy has passed into a custom from having been tolerated at its commencement.

Concerning the acknowledged infallibility of the Popes it appears that Gregory VII, in council decreed that the Pope of Rome neither had erred and never should err. It was this prerogative of his holiness became received, when John XXII abrogated decrees made by his predecessors, and declared that what was decreed by one pope or council might be corrected by another; and Gregory XI, 1370, in his will deprecates, si in catholicis fide errasset. The university of Vienna stood against it, calling it a contempt of God, and an injury, if any one in matters of faith should appeal from the Pope: that is, from God who presides in the mind of man. But the infallibility was at length established by Leo X, especially after Luther's opposition, when they despaired of defending their indulgences, &c. by any other method.

It is not possible to form a scene more terrific than when the Pope was in the height of power, and to serve their purposes hurried the thunders of their excommunications over a kingdom. It was a national distress not inferior to a plague or famine.

Augustus, desirous of divorcing Ingelburg, to unite himself to Agnes de Meranie, the Pope put his kingdom under an interdict. The churches were shut during the space of eight months; they said neither mass nor vespers; they did not marry; and even the offspring of the married, born at this unhappy period, were considered as illicit; and because the king would not sleep with his wife, it was not permitted to any of his subjects to sleep with theirs! In that year France was threatened with an extinction of the ordinary generation. A man under this curse of public penance was divested of all his functions, civil, military and matrimonial; he was not allowed to dress his hair, to shave, to bathe, nor even change his linen, so that, says Saint Foix, upon the whole this made a filthy penitent. The good king Robert incurred the censures of the church for having married his cousin. He was immediately abandoned. Two faithful domestics alone remained with him, and these always passed through the fire whatever he touched. In a word, the horror which an excommunication occasioned was such that a woman of pleasure, with whom Peletier had passed some moments, having learnt soon afterwards that he had been above six months an excommunicated person, fell into a panic, and with great difficulty recovered from her convulsions.

LITERARY COMPOSITION.

To literary composition we may apply the saying of an ancient philosopher: 'a little thing gives perfection, although perfection is not a little thing.'

The great legislator of the Hebrews orders us to pull off the fruit of the first three years, and not to taste them. Levit. xix, ver. 23. He was not ignorant how it weakens a young tree to bring to maturity its first fruits. Thus, on literary compositions, our green essays ought to be picked away. The word Zamar, by a beautiful metaphor from pruning trees, means in Hebrew to compose verses. Blotting and correcting was so much Churchill's abhorrence, that I have heard from his publisher, he once energetically expressed himself, that it was like cutting away one's own flesh. This strong figure sufficiently shows his repugnance to an author's duty. Churchill now lies neglected, for posterity will respect those, who

'File off the mortal part
Of glowing thought with attic art.'

Young.

I have heard that this careless bard, after a successful work, usually precipitated the publication of another, relying on its crudeness being passed over on the public curiosity excited by its better brother. He called this getting double pay; for thus he secured the sale of a hurried work. But Churchill was a spendthrift of fame, and enjoyed all his revenue while he lived; posterity owes him little, and pays him nothing!

Bayle, an experienced observer in literary matters, tells us, that correction is by no means practicable by some authors; as in the case of Ovid. In exile, his compositions were nothing more than spiritless repetitions of what he had formerly written. He confesses both negligence and idleness in the corrections of his works. The vivacity which animated his first productions, failing when he revised his poems, he found correction too laborious, and he abandoned it. This, however, was only an excuse. 'It is certain, that some authors cannot correct. They compose with pleasure, and with ardour; but they exhaust all their force: they fly but with one wing when they review their works; the first fire does not return, there is in their imagination a certain calm which hinders their pen from making any progress. Their mind is like a boat, which only advances by the strength of oars.'

Dr More, the Platonist, had such an exuberance of fancy, that correction was a much greater labour than composition. He used to say, that in writing his works, he was forced to cut his way through a crowd of thoughts as through a wood, and that he threw off in his compositions as much as would make an ordinary philosopher. More was a great enthusiast, and, of course, an egotist, so that criticism ruffled his temper, notwithstanding all his Platonism. When accused of obsequies and extravagances, he said that like the ostrich, he laid his eggs in the sands, which would prove vital and prolific in time; however, these ostrich eggs have proved to be added.

A habit of correctness in the lesser parts of composition will assist the higher. It is worth recording that the great Milton was anxious for correct punctuation, and that Addison was solicitous after the minutiae of the press. Savage, Armstrong, and others, felt tortures on similar objects. E is said of Julius Scaliger, that he had this peculiarity in his manner of composition; he wrote with such accuracy that his ms and the printed copy corresponded page for page, and line for line.

Malherbe, the father of French poetry, tormented himself by a prodigious slowness; and was employed rather in perfecting, than in forming works. His muse is compared to a fine woman in the pangs of delivery. He exulted in this tardiness, and, after finishing a poem of one hundred verses, or a discourse of ten pages, he used to say he ought to repose for ten years. Balzac, the first writer in French prose who gave majesty and harmony to a period, it is said, did not grudge to bestow a week on a page, and was never satisfied with his first thoughts. Our 'captive' Gray entertained the same notion: and it is hard to say if it arose from the sterility of their genius, or their sensibility of taste.

It is curious to observe, that the ms of Tasso, which are still preserved, are illegible from the vast number of their corrections. I have given a fac-simile, as correct as it is possible to conceive, of one page of Pope's ms Homer, as a specimen of his continual corrections and criticalasures. The celebrated Madame Dacier never could satisfy herself in translating Homer: continually retouching the version, even in its happiest passages. There were several parts which she translated in six or seven manners; and she frequently noted in the margin—'have not yet done it.'

When Pascal became warm in his celebrated controversy, he applied himself with incredible labour to the composition of his 'Provincial Letters.' He was frequently twenty days occupied on a single letter. He recommenced some above seven and eight times, and by this means obtained that perfection which has made his work, as Voltaire says, 'one of the best books ever published in France.'

The Quintus Curtius Vaugelas occupied him 30 years; generally every period was translated in the margin five or six several ways. Chapelain and Conrart, who took the pains to review this work critically, were many times perplexed in their choice of passages; they generally liked best that which had been first composed. Hume was never done with corrections; every edition varies with the preceding ones. But there are more fortunate and fluent minds than these. Voltaire tells us of Fenelon's Télémaque, that the amiable author composed it in his retirement in the short period of three months. Fenelon had, before this, formed his style, and his mind overflowed with all the spirit of the ancients. He opened a copious fountain, and there were not ten erasures in the original ms. The same facility accompanied Gibbon after the experience of his first volume; and the same copious readiness attended Adam Smith, who dictated to his amanuensis, while he walked about his study.

The ancients were as pertinacious in their corrections. Isocrates, it is said, was employed for ten years on one of his works, and to appear natural studied with the most refined art. After a labour of eleven years, Virgil pronounced his Æneid imperfect. Dio Cassius devoted twelve years to the composition of his history, and Diodorus Siculus, thirty.

There is a middle between velocity and torpidity; the Italians say, it is not necessary to be a stag, but we ought not to be a tortoise.

Many ingenious expedients are not to be contemned in literary labours. The critical advice

'To choose an author, as we would a friend,' is very useful to young writers. The finest geniuses have always affectionately attached themselves to some particular author of congenial disposition. Pope, in his version of Homer, kept a constant eye on his master Dryden; Corneille's favourite authors were the brilliant Tacitus, the heroic Livy, and the lofty Lucan: the influence of their characters may be traced in his best tragedies. The great Clarendon, when employed in writing his history, read over very carefully Tacitus and Livy, & give dignity to his style, as he writes in a letter. Tacitus did not surpass him in his portraits, though Clarendon never equalled Livy in his narrative.

The mode of literary composition adopted by that admirable student Sir William Jones is well deserving our attention. After having fixed on his subjects, he always added the model of the composition; and thus boldly wrestled with the great authors of antiquity. On board the frigate which was carrying him to India, he projected following works, and noted them in this manner:

1. Elements of the Laws of England.

Model—The Essay on Bailments. Aristotle.

2. The History of the American War.

Model—Thucydides and Polybius.

3. Britain Discovered, an Epic Poem. Machines Hindoo Gods. Model—Homer.

4. Speeches, Political and Forensic.

Model—Demosthenes.

5. Dialogues, Philosophical and Historical.

Model—Plato.

And of favourite authors there are also favourite works which we love to be familiarized with. Bartholinus's dissertation on reading books, in which he points out superior performances of different writers. Of St Augustine, his city of God; of Hippocrates, Cocca Præsentia of Cicero, de Officiis; of Aristotle, De Animalibus Catullus, Coma Berenices; of Virgil, the sixth book of Æneid, &c. Such judgments are indeed not to be guides; but such a mode of reading is useful to constrain our studies within due limits.

Evenly, who has written treatises on several subjects was occupied for years on them. His manner of arranging his materials and his mode of composition appear excellent. Having chosen a subject, he analyzed it into various parts, under certain heads, or titles, to be filled at leisure. Under these heads he set down his thoughts as they occurred, occasionally inserting what was useful from his reading. When his collections were thus formed, he digested his own thoughts regularly, strengthened them by authorities from ancient and modern authors, or alleged his reasons for dissenting from them. His collections in time became voluminous, but he then exercised that judgment which the formers of such collections usually are deficient in. With Hesiod he knew that 'the whole is better than the whole, and it was his aim to express quittance of his reading; but not to give it in a catalogue to the world; and when his treatises were sent to press they were not half the size of his collections.

Thus also Winkelman, in his 'History of art,' an extensive work, was long lost in settling on a plan; like artists who make random sketches of their first conceptions, throw on paper ideas, hints and observations which occurred in his readings—many of them, indeed, were connected with his history, but were afterwards inserted some of his other works.

Even Gibbon tells us of his Roman History, 'at the time when I set all was dark and doubtful; even the title of the work, the true era of the decline and fall of the empire, the limits of the introduction, the division of the chapters, and the order of the narration; and I was often tempted to throw away the labour of seven years.' Akenside has exquisitely described the progress and the pains of genius in his delightful reveries, Pleasures of Imagination, B. iii., v. The pleasures of composition in an ardent genius were never so finely described as by Buffon. Speaking of the hours of composition he said, 'These are the most precious and delightful moments of life: moments which often enticed me to pass fourteen hours at my desk, in a state of transport; this gratification more than glory is reward.'

The publication of Gibbon's Memoirs conveyed to the world a faithful picture of the most fervid industry; in youth, the foundations of such a sublime edifice of history must be laid. The world can now trace how the Colossus of erudition, day by day, and year by year, pared himself for some vast work.

Gibbon has furnished a new idea in the art of reading. We ought, says he, not to attend to the order of our thoughts, so much as of our thoughts. 'The perusal of a particular work gives birth perhaps to ideas unconnected with the subject it treats; I pursue these ideas and quit the proposed plan of reading.' Thus in the midst of his reading Longinus; a chapter of Longinus, led to an epistle of Pliny; and having finished Longinus, he followed the train of his ideas of the sublime and beautiful in the maxims of Burke, and concluded with comparing the ancient, the modern Longinus. Of all our popular writers the experienced reader was Gibbon, and he offers an important advice to an author engaged on a particular subject: 'I suspended my perusal of any new book on the subject till I had reviewed all that I knew, or believed, or thought on it, that I might be qualified to discern much the authors added to my original stock.'

These are valuable hints to students, and such have been practised by others. Ancillon was a very ingenious student; he seldom read a book throughout without reading in his progress many others; his library table was always covered with a number of books for the most part on; this variety of authors bred no confusion; they all fitted to throw light on the same topic; he was not disturbed by frequently seeing the same thing in different places; their opinions were so many new strokes, which impelled the ideas which he had conceived. The celebrated Father Paul studied in the same manner. He never passed over an interesting subject till he had confronted a fifty of authors. In historical researches he never held advance, till he had fixed, once for all, the places, men, and opinions—a mode of study which appears very happy, but in the end will make a great saving of time, and hour of mind; those who have not pursued this method in all their lives at a loss to settle their opinions and their life, from the want of having once brought them to such rest.

I shall now offer a plan of Historical Study, and a calculation of the necessary time it will occupy without specifying the authors; as I only propose to animate a young student, who feels he has not to number the days of a monarch, that he should not be alarmed at the vast laudible historical researches present to his eye. If we look in public libraries, more than thirty thousand volumes of history may be found.

Lamptey de Fresnoy, one of the greatest readers, calculated that he could not read, with satisfaction, more than an hours a day, and ten pages in folio an hour; which makes 100 pages every day. Supposing each volume to contain 500 pages, every month would amount to one volume and a half, which makes 18 volumes in folio in the year. In fifty years, a student could only read 900 volumes of folio. All this, too, supposing uninterrupted health, and an intelligence as rapid as the eyes of the laborious researcher. A man can hardly study to advantage till past twenty, and at fifty his eyes will be dimmed, and his head filled with much reading that should never be read. His 50 years for the 900 volumes are reduced to thirty years, or 300 volumes! And, after all, the universal historian must resolutely face 30,000 volumes!

But to cheer the historiographer, he shows, that a public library is only necessary to be consulted; it is in our private closet where should be found those few writers, the direct use to their rivals, without jealousy, and mark, in the vast career of time, those who are worthy to instruct posterity. His calculation proceeds on this plan,—that 7 hours a day, and the term of ten years, are sufficient to his end, with utility, the immense field of history.

He calculates this alarming extent of historical ground.

his knowledge of Sacred History he gives	3 months.
ancient Egypt, Babylon, and Assyria, modern Assyria or Persia,	1 do.
Hebrew History,	6 do.
Hebrew History by the moderns,	7 do.
Hebrew History by the original writers,	6 do.
ecclesiastical History, general and particular,	30 do.
modern History,	24 do.
to this may be added for recurrences and re-perusals,	48 do.

The total will amount to 10 to 12 years.

Thus, in ten years and a half, a student in history has gained a universal knowledge, and this on a plan which brings as much leisure as every student would choose to give.

(As a specimen of Du Fresnoy's calculations take that of Sacred History.)

In reading Pere Calmet's learned dissertations in the order he points out,	12 days.
In Pere Calmet's History, in 2 vols. 4to now in 4,	12
In Frideaux's History,	10
In Josephus,	12
In Sennar's History of the Jews,	20

In all 66 days.

He allows, however, 90 days, for obtaining a sufficient knowledge of Sacred History.

In reading this sketch, we are scarcely surprised at the notion of a Gibbon; but having admired that erudition, we perceive the necessity of such a plan, if we would not be what we have afterwards to unlearn.

A plan like the present, even in a mind which should feel itself incapable of the exertion, will not be regarded without that reverence we feel for genius animating much industry. This scheme of study, though it may never be rigidly pursued, will be found excellent. Ten years labour of happy diligence may render a student capable of consigning to posterity a history as universal in its topics, as that of the historian who led to this investigation.

PORTAL IMITATIONS AND SIMILARITIES.

'Tantum amor forum, et generandi gloria mellis.'

Georg. Lib. iv, v. 204.

'Such rage of honey in our bosom beats,
And such a zeal we have for flowery sweets!'

Dryden.

This article was commenced by me many years ago in the early volumes of the Monthly Magazine, and continued by various correspondents, with various success. I have collected only those of my own contribution, because I do not feel authorised to make use of those of other persons, however some may be desirable. One of the most elegant of literary recreations is that of tracing poetical or prose imitations and similarities; for assuredly, similarity is not always imitation. Bishop Hurd's pleasing essay on 'The Marks of Imitation' will assist the critic in deciding on what may only be an accidental similarity, rather than a studied imitation. Those critics have indulged an intemperate abuse in these entertaining researches, who from a single word derive the imitation of an entire passage. Wakefield, in his edition of Gray, is very liable to this censure.

This kind of literary amusement is not despicable; there are few men of letters who have not been in the habit of marking parallel passages, or tracing imitation, in the thousand shapes it assumes; it forms, it cultivates, it delights taste to observe by what dexterity and variation genius conceals, or modifies, an original thought or image, and to view the same sentiment, or expression, borrowed with art, or heightened by embellishment. The ingenious writer of 'A Criticism on Gray's Elegy, in continuation of Dr Johnson's,' has given some observations on this subject, which will please. 'It is often entertaining to trace imitation. To detect the adopted image; the copied design; the transferred sentiment; the appropriated phrase; and even the acquired manner and frame, under all the disguises that imitation, combination, and accommodation may have thrown around them, must require both parts and diligence; but it will bring with it no ordinary gratification. A book professing on the 'History and Progress of Imitation and Poetry,' written by a man of perspicuity, and an adept in the art of discerning likenesses, even when minute, with examples properly selected, and gradations duly marked, would make an impartial accession to the store of human literature, and furnish rational curiosity with a high regale.' Let me premise that these notices (the wrecks of a large collection of passages I had once formed merely as exercises to form my taste) are not given with the petty malignant delight of detecting the unacknowledged imitations of our best writers, but merely to habituate the young student to an instructive amusement, and to exhibit that beautiful variety which the same image is capable of exhibiting when re-touched with all the art of genius.

Gray in his 'Ode to Spring' has

'The attic warbler pours her throat'

Wakefield in his 'Commentary' has a copious passage on this poetical diction. He conceives it to be 'an admirable improvement of the Greek and Roman classics'; —scut arbor: Hes. Scut. Her. 204.

Funde.' Suaves egr ore loquelas

Lucret. 1, 48.

This learned editor was little conversant with modern literature, notwithstanding his memorable editions of Gray and Pope. The expression is evidently borrowed not from Hesiod, nor from Lucretius, but from a brother at home.

'Is it for thee, the Linnet pours her throat?'

Essay on Man, Ep. III, v. 28.

Gray in the 'Ode to Adversity' addresses the power thus,

'Thou Tamer of the human breast,
Whose iron scourge and torturing hour
The bad affright, afflict the best.'

Wakefield censures the expression 'torturing hour,' by discovering an impropriety and incongruity. He says,

'consistency of figure rather required some material image, like iron scourge and adamant chain.' It is curious to observe a verbal critic lecture such a poet as Gray! The poet probably would never have replied, or, in a moment of excessive urbanity, he might have condescended to point out to this minutest of critics the following passage in Milton,

'When the scourge
Inexorably, and the torturing hour
Calls us to Penance.'

Par. Lost, B. II, v. 90.

Gray in his 'Ode to Adversity' has,

'Light they disperse, and with them go,
The summer friend.'

Fond of this image, he has it again in his 'Bard,'

'The swarm, that in thy noontide beam are born, Gone!'

Perhaps the germ of this beautiful image may be found in Shakespeare, — 'for men, like butterflies,

Show not their mealy wings but to the summer.'

Troilus and Cressida, A. III, c. 7.

and two similar passages in Timon of Athens.

'The swallow follows not summer more willingly than we your lordship.

Timon. Nor more willingly leaves winter; such summer birds are men.' Act III.

Again in the same,

— 'one cloud of winter showers
These flies are couch'd.' Act II.

Gray in his 'Progress of Poetry' has,

'In climates beyond the solar road.'

Wakefield has traced this imitation to Dryden; Gray himself refers to Virgil and Petrarch. Wakefield gives the line from Dryden, thus,

'Beyond the year, and out of heaven's high-way;'

which he calls extremely bold and poetical. I confess a critic might be allowed to be somewhat fastidious on this unpoetical diction on the high-way, which I believe Dryden never used. I think his line was thus,

'Beyond the year out of the solar walk.'

Pope has expressed the image more elegantly, though copied from Dryden,

'Far as the solar walk, or milky way.'

Gray has in his 'Bard'

'Dear as the light that visits these sad eyes,
Dear as the ruddy drops that warm my heart.'

Gray himself points out the imitation in Shakespeare, of the latter image; but it is curious to observe that Otway, in his 'Venice Preserved,' makes Friuli most pathetically exclaim to his daughter, that she is

'Dear as the vital warmth that feeds my life,
Dear as these eyes that weep in fondness o'er thee.'

Gray tells us that the image of his 'Bard'

Loose his beard and hoary hair,
Streamed like a meteor to the troubled air,'

was taken from a picture of the Supreme Being by Raphael. It is, however, remarkable, and somewhat ludicrous, that the beard of Hudibras is also compared to a meteor: and the accompanying observation in Butler almost induces one to think that Gray derived from it the whole plan of that sublime Ode—since his Bard precisely performs what the beard of Hudibras denounced. These are the verses:

'This halcy meteor did denounce
The fall of sceptres and of crowns.'

Hud. C. I.

I have been asked if I am serious in my conjecture that 'the meteor beard' of Hudibras might have given birth to 'the Bard' of Gray. I reply that the burlesque and the sublime are extremes, and extremes meet. How often does it merely depend on our state of mind, and on our own taste, to consider the sublime as burlesque. A very vulgar, but acute genius, Thomas Paine, whom we may suppose destitute of all delicacy and refinement, has conveyed to us a notion of the sublime, as it is probably experienced by ordinary and uncultivated minds, and even by acute and judicious ones, who are destitute of imagination. He tells us that 'the sublime and the ridiculous are often so nearly related, that it is difficult to class them separately. One step above the sublime makes the ridiculous, and one step above the ridiculous makes the sublime again.' May I venture to illustrate this opinion? Would it not appear the ridiculous or burlesque, to describe the sublime revolution of the Earth on her axis, round the Sun, by comparing it with the action of a top flopped by a boy? And yet some of the most exquisite lines in Milton do this; the poet only alluding in his mind, to the top. The earth he describes, whether — 'She from west her silent course advances

With inoffensive pace that spinning sleeps
On her soft axis, while she paces even!'

Be this as it may! it has never I believe been remarked (to return to Gray) that when he conceived the idea of the beard of his Bard, he had in his mind the language of Milton, who describes Azazel, sublimely unfurling

The imperial ensign, which full high advanced,
Shone like a meteor streaming to the wind.'

Par. Lost, B. I, v. 585.

very similar to Gray's

'Streamed like a meteor to the troubled air!'

Gray has been severely censured by Johnson, for the expression,

'Give ample room and verge enough
The characters of hell to trace.'

The Bard.

On the authority of the most unpoetical of critics we must still hear that the poet has no line so bad—'ample room' is feeble, but would have passed unobserved in any other poem but in the poetry of Gray, who has taught us to admit nothing but what is exquisite. 'Verge enough' is poetical, since it conveys a material image to the imagination. No one appears to have detected the source from whence, probably, the whole line was derived. I am inclined to think it was from the following passage in Dryden,

'Let fortune empty her whole quiver on me,
I have a soul that, like an ample shield,
Can take in all, and verge enough for more!'

Dryden's Don Sebastian.

Gray in his Elegy has

'Even in our ashes live their wonted fires.'

This line is so obscure that it is difficult to apply it to what precedes it. Mason in his edition in vain attempts to derive it from a thought of Petrarch, and still more vainly attempts to amend it; Wakefield expends an octavo page, to paraphrase this single verse! From the following lines of Chaucer, one would imagine Gray caught the recollected idea. The old Reve, in his prologue, says of himself, and of old men,

'For when we may not don, than wol we spoken;
Yet in our ashen cold is fire freken.'

Tyrwhit's Chaucer, vol I, p. 153, v. 2579.

Gray has a very expressive word, highly poetical, but I think not common;

'For who to dumb forgetfulness a prey!'

and Daniel has, as quoted in Cooper's Muses Library preface,

'And in himself with sorrow does complain
The misery of dark forgetfulness.'

A line of Pope's in his Dunciad, 'High-born Howard echoed in the ear of Gray, when he gave with all the artifice of illiteration,

'High-born Hoel's Harp.

Johnson bitterly censures Gray for giving to adjectives termination of participles, such as the cultured plain; 'the daisied bank; but he solemnly adds, I was sorry to see the line of a scholar like Gray, 'the homed spring.' I confess I was not sorry; had Johnson received but the faintest tincture of the rich Italian school of English poetry, he would never have formed so tasteless a criticism. Homed is employed by Milton in more places than one, but one sufficient for my purpose.

'Hide me from day's garish eye
While the bee with honied thigh—'

Penshurst, v. 162.

The celebrated stanza in Gray's Elegy seems partly to be borrowed.

'Full many a gem of pure ray serene
The dark unfathom'd caves of ocean bear;
Full many a flower is born to blush unseen,
And waste its sweetness in the desert air.'

Pope had said:

'There kept my charms conceal'd from mortal eye,
Like roses that in deserts bloom and die.

Rape of the Lock.

Young says of nature;

'In distant wilds by human eye unseen
She rears her flowers and spreads her velvet green;
Pure gurgling rills the lonely desert trace,
And waxes their music on the savage race.

And Shenstone has—

'And like the desert's lily bloom to fade.'

Elegy IV.

Gray was so fond of this pleasing imagery, that he repeats it in his Ode on the Installation; and Mason echoes it, in his Ode to Memory.

Milton thus paints the evening sun:

'If chance the evening sun with farewell sweet Extend his evening beam, the fields revive,
The birds their notes renew, &c.

Par. Lost, B. II, v. 492.

Can there be a doubt that he borrowed this beautiful farwell from an obscure poet, quoted by Poole, in his 'English Parnassus,' 1657? The date of Milton's great work, I had since, admits the conjecture; the first edition being that of 1665. The homely lines in Poole are these,

'To Theis' wacky bowers the sun doth his,
Bidding farwell unto the gloomy ay.'

Young, in his 'Love of Fame,' very adroitly improves on a witty conceit of Butler. It is curious to observe, that while Butler had made a remote allusion of a window to a pillory, a conceit is grafted on this conceit, with even more exquisite wit.

'Each window, like the pillory appears,
With heads thrust through; nailed by the ears.'
Hudibras, part II, C. 3, v. 201.

'An opera, like a pillory, may be said
To nail our ears down, and expose our head.'

Young's Satires.

In the Doenna we find this thought differently illustrated; by no means imitative, though the satire is congenial. Don Jerome, alluding to the serenades, says, 'These stomach orgies that steal the senses in the hearing; as they say Egyptian embalmers serve mummies, extracting the brain through the ears.' The wit is original, but the subject is the same in the three passages; the whole turning on the allusion to the head and ears.

When Pope composed the following lines on Fame,

How vain that second life in other's breath,
The estate which wits inherit after death;
Ease, health, and life, for this they must resign
[Unsure the tenure, but how vast the fine!]

Temple of Fame.

He seems to have had present in his mind a single idea of Butler, by which he has very richly amplified the entire imagery. Butler says,

'Honour's a lease for lives to come,
And cannot be exempt from
The legal tenant.

Hud. part I, C. 3, v. 1042.

The same thought may be found in Sir George Mackenzie's 'Essay on preferring Solitude to Public Employment,' first published in 1665. Hudibras preceded it by two years. The thought is strongly expressed by the eloquent Mackenzie. He writes, 'Fame is a revenue payable only to our ghosts; and to deny ourselves all present satisfaction, or to expose ourselves to so much hazard for what were as great madness as to starve ourselves, or fight desperately for food, to be laid on our tombs after our death.

Dryden, in his 'Absalom and Achitophel,' says of the bad of Shaftesbury,

'David for him his tuneful harp had strung,
And Heaven had wanted one immortal song.

This verse was ringing in the ear of Pope, when with equal energy and felicity he adopted it, in addressing his friend in Arden shoot,

'Friend of my life! which did not you prolong,
The world had wanted many an idle song!

Howell has prefixed to his Letters a tedious poem, written in the taste of the times, and he there says of letters, and they are

'The heralds and sweet harbingers that move
From East to West, on embassies of love;
They can the tropic eue, and cross the line.

It is probable that Pope had noticed this thought, for the following lines seem a beautiful heightening of the idea:

'Heaven first taught letters, for some wretch's aid,
Some banish'd lover, or some captive maid.'

Then he adds, they

'Speed the soft intercourse from soul to soul,
And wait a sigh from Indus to the Pole.'

Eloisa.

There is another passage in 'Howell's Letters,' which has a great affinity with a thought of Pope, who, in 'the Rape of the Lock,' says,

'Fair tresses man's imperial race ensnare,
And beauty draws us with a single hair.'

Howell writes, p. 290, 'Tis a powerful sex: they were too strong for the first, the strongest and wisest man that was; they must needs be strong, when one hair of a woman can draw more than an hundred pair of oxen.'

Pope's description of the death of the lamb, in his 'Essay on Man,' is finished with the nicest touches, and is one of the finest pictures our poetry exhibits. Even familiar as it is to our ear, we never examine it but with undiminished admiration.

'The lamb, thy riot dooms to bleed to-day,
Had he thy reason, would he skip and play?
Pleased to the last he crops the flowery food,
And licks the hand just rais'd to shed his blood.'

After pausing on the last two fine verses, will not the reader smile that I should conjecture the image might originally have been discovered in the following humble verses in a poem once considered not as contemptible:

'A gentle lamb has rhetoric to plead,
And when she sees the butcher's knife decreed,
Her voice intreats him not to make her bleed.

Dr King's Mully of Mountown.

This natural and affecting image might certainly have been observed by Pope, without his having perceived it through the less polished lens of the telescope of Dr King. It is, however, a similarity, though it may not be an imitation; and is given as an example of that art in composition, which can ornament the humblest conception, like the graceful vest thrown over naked and sordid beggary.

I consider the following lines as strictly copied by Thomas Warton:

'The daring artist
Explored the pangs that rend the royal breast,
Those wounds that lurk beneath the dressed vest.

T. Warton, on Shakespeare

Sir Philip Sidney, in his 'Defence of Poesie,' has the same image. He writes, 'Tragedy openeth the greatest wounds, and sheweth forth the ulcers that are covered with tissue.'

The same appropriation of thought will attach the following lines of Tickell:

'While the charm'd reader with thy thought compiles
And views thy Rosamond with Henry's eyes.'

Tickell to Addison.

Evidently from the French Horace:

'En vain contre le cid, un ministre se ligue,
Tout Paris, pour Chimene, a les yeux de Rodrigue.'

Boileau.

Oldham, the satirist, says in his satires upon the Jesuits that had Cain been of this black fraternity, he had not been content with a quarter of mankind.

'Had he been Jeruk, had he but put on Their savage cruelty, the rest had gone!'

Satyr II.

Doubtless at that moment echoed in his poetical ear the energetic and caustic epigram of Andrew Marvell, against Blood stealing the crown dressed in a parson's cassock, and sparing the life of the keeper:

'With the Priest's vestment had he but put on The Prelate's cruelty,—the Crown had gone!'

The following passages seem echoes to each other, and it seems a justice due to Oldham, the satirist, to acknowledge him as the parent of this antithesis:—

'On Butler who can think without just rage,
The glory and the scandal of the age?'

Satire against Poetry.

It seems evidently borrowed by Pope, when he applies the thought to Erasmus:—

'At length Erasmus, that great injured name,
The glory of the priesthood and the shame!'

Young remembered the antithesis when he said,

'Of some for glory such the boundless rage,
That they're the blackest scandal of the age.'

Voltaire, a great reader of Pope, seems to have borrowed part of the expression:—

'Scandale d'Eglise, et des rois le modèle.'

De Caux, an old French poet, in one of his moral poems on an hour-glass, inserted in modern collections, has many ingenious thoughts. That this poem was read and admired by Goldsmith, the following beautiful image seems to indicate. De Caux, comparing the world to his hour-glass, says beautifully.

'C'est un verre qui luit
Qu'un souffle peut détruire, et qu'un souffle a produit.'

Goldsmith applies the thought very happily:—

'Princes and lords may flourish or may fade;
A breath can make them, as a breath has made.'

I do not know whether we might not read, for modern copies are sometimes incorrect,

'A breath unmake them, as a breath has made.'

Thomson, in his pastoral story of Palemon and Lavinia, appears to have copied a passage from Otway. Palemon thus addresses Lavinia:—

'Oh, let me now into a richer soil
Transplant these safe, where vernal suns and showers
Diffuse their warmest, largest influence;
And of my garden be the guide and joy!'

Chamont employs the same image when speaking of Minimia: he says,—

'You took her up a little tender flower, —and with a careful loving hand
Transplanted her into your own fair garden,
Where the sun always shines.'

The origin of the following imagery is undoubtedly Grecian; but it is still embellished and modified by our best poets:

'While universal Pan
Kiss with the graces and the hours in dance
Led on th' eternal spring.'

Paradise Lost.

Thompson probably caught this strain of imagery:

'Sudden to heaven
Thence weary vision turns, where leading soft
The silent hours of love, with purest ray
Sweet Venus shines.'

Summer, v. 1692.

Gray, in repeating this imagery, has borrowed a remarkable epithet from Milton:

'Lo, where the rosy-boom'd hours
Fair Venus' train appear!

Ode to Spring.

'Along the crisped shades and bowers
Reveals the spruce and jocund spring;
The graces and the rosy boom'd hours
Thither all their bounties bring.

Comus, v. 264.

Collins, in his Ode to Fear, whom he associates with Danger, there grandly personified, was I think considerably indebted to the following stanza of Spenser:

'Next him was fear, all armed from top to toe,
Yet thought himself not safe enough thereby;
But feared each sudden moving to and fro;
And his own arms when glittering he did spy,
Or clashing heard, he fast away did fly,
As ashes pale of hue and winy heel'd;
And evermore on Danger fixed his eye,
'Gains whom he always bent a brazen shield,
Which his right hand unarmed fearfully did wield.'

Fairy Queen, B. III, c. 12, s. 12.

Warm from its perusal, he seems to have seized it as a hint to the Ode to Fear, and in his 'Passions' to have very finely copied an idea here:

'First Fear, his hand, his skill to try,
Amid the chords bewildered laid,
And back recoiled, he knew not why,
E'en at the sound himself had made.'

Ode to the Passions.

The stanza in Beattie's 'Minstrel,' first book, in which his 'visionary boy,' after 'the storm of summer rain,' views 'the rainbow brighten to the setting sun,' and runs to reach it:

'Fond fool, that deem'st the streaming glory nigh,
How vain the chase thine ardour has begun!
'Thou fled afar, ere half thy purposed race be run;
'Thus it fares with age,' &c

The same train of thought and imagery applied to the same subject, though the image itself be somewhat different, may be found in the poems of the platonic John Newris; a writer who has great originality of thought, and a highly poetical spirit. His stanza runs thus,

'So to the unthinking boy the distant sky
Seems on some mountain's surface to relieve;
He with ambitious haste climbs the ascent,
Curious to touch the firmament;
But when with an unwearied pace,
He is arrived at the long-wished for place,
With sighs the sad defeat he does deplore;
His heaven is still as distant as before!'

The Infidel, by John Norris.

In the modern tragedy of 'The Castle Spectre' is this fine description of the ghost of Evelina:—Suddenly a female form glided along the vault. 'I flew towards her. My arms were already unclenched to clasp her,—when suddenly her figure changed! Her face grew pale, a stream of blood gushed from her bosom. While speaking, her form withered away; the flesh fell from her bones; a skeleton loathsome and meagre clasped me in her mouldering arms. Her infected breath was mingled with mine; her rotting fingers pressed my hand, and my face was covered with her kisses. Oh! then how I trembled with disgust?'

There is undoubtedly singular merit in this description. I shall contrast it with one which the French Virgil has written in an age, whose faith was stronger in ghosts than ours, yet which perhaps had less skill in describing them. There are some circumstances which seem to indicate that the author of the 'Castle Spectre' lighted his torch at the altar of the French muse. Athalia thus narrates her dream, in which the spectre of Jezebel her mother appears:

C'étoit pendant l'horreur d'une profonde nuit,
Ma mère Jezabel devant moi s'est montrée,
Comme au jour de sa mort pompeusement parée.—
—En achevant les mots épouvantables,
Son ombre vers moi lit a paru se balancer,
Et moi, je lui tendois, les mains pour l'embrasser
Mais je n'ai plus trouvé qu'un horrible mélange
D'os et de chair meurtris, et traînés dans la fange,
Des lambeaux pleins de sang et des membres affreux.'

Racine's Athalia, Act II, s. 5.

Goldsmith, when in his pedestrian tour, he sat amid the Alps, as he paints himself in his 'Traveller,' and felt himself the solitary neglected genius he was, desolate amidst the surrounding scenery; probably at that moment the following beautiful image of Thompson he applied to himself:

'As in the hollow breast of Apennine
Beneath the centre of encircling hills,
A myrtle rises, far from human eyes,
And breathes its balmy fragrance o'er the wild.'

Autumn, v. 200.

Goldsmith very pathetically applies a similar image:

'E'en now where Alpine solitudes ascend,
I sit me down a pensive hour to spend,
Like yon neglected shrub at random cast,
That shades the steep, and sighs at every blast.'

Traveller.

Akenside illustrates the native impulse of genius by a simile of Memnon's marble statue, sounding its lyre at the touch of the sun:

'For as old Memnon's image, long renowned
By fabled Nilus, to the quivering touch
Of Than's ray, with each repulsive string
Consenting, sounded through the warbling air
Unbidden strains; even so did nature's hand, &c.

It is remarkable that the same image, which does not appear obvious enough to have been the common inheritance of poets, is precisely used by old Ragnier, the first French satirist, in the dedication of his satires to the French king. Louis XIV supplies the place of nature to the courtly satirist. These are his words:—'On lit qu'en Ethiopie il y avoit une statue qui rendoit un son harmonieux, toutes les fois que le soleil levant la regardoit. Ce même miracle, Sire, avez vous fait en moy qui touché de l'astre de Votre Majesté ay reçu la voix et la parole.'

In that sublime passage in 'Pope's Essay on Man, Epist. I, v. 237, beginning,

'Vast chain of Being! which from God began,' and proceeds to

'From nature's chain whatever link you strike,
Tenth, or ten thousand, breaks the chain alike.'

Pope seems to have caught the idea and image from Waller, whose last verse is as fine as any in the 'Essay on Man.'

'The chain that's fixed to the throne of Jove,
On which the fabric of our world depends,
One link dissolved, the whole creation ends.'
Of the Danger his Majesty escaped, &c, v. 108.

It has been observed by Thyer, that Milton borrowed the expression Imbrown'd, and Brown, which he applies to the evening shade, from the Italian. See Thyer's elegant note in B. IV, v. 246:

—'And where the unpierced shade
Imbrown'd the noon-tide bowers.'

And B. IX, v. 1086,

—'Where highest woods impenetrable
To sun or star-light, spread their umbrage broad
And brown as evening.'

Fu fimbriato is an expression used by the Italians to denote the approach of the evening. Boiardo, Ariosto, and Tasso, have made a very picturesque use of this term, noticed by Thyer. I doubt if it be applicable to our colder climate; but Thompson appears to have been struck by the fine effect it produces in poetical landscape; for he has

—'With quickened step
Brown night retires.'

Summer, v. 51.

If the epithet be true, it cannot be more appropriately applied than in the season he describes, which most resembles the genial clime with the deep serenity of an Italian heaven. Milton in Italy had experienced the brown evening, but it may be suspected that Thompson only recollected the language of the poet.

The same observation may be made on two other poetical epithets. I shall notice the epithet 'laughing,' applied to inanimate objects; and 'purple' to beautiful objects.

The natives of Italy and the softer climates receive emotions from the view of their waters in the spring not equally experienced in the British roughness of our skies. The luxury and softness of the water are thus described by Lucretius:

—'Tibi suavels Dadala tellus
Submisit flores; tibi ridens aequora ponti.'
Inelegantly rendered by Creech,
'The roughest sea puts on smooth looks, and smiles.'
Dryden more happily,
'The ocean smiles, and smooths her wavy breast.'
But Metastasio has copied Lucretius:

'A to fioriscono
Gli erbori prati:
E i fluit ridono
Nel mar placati.'

It merits observation, that the Northern Poets could not exalt their imagination higher than that the water smiled, while the modern Italian, having before his eyes a different spring, found no difficulty in agreeing with the ancients, that the waves laughed. Of late modern poetry has made a very free use of the animating epithet laughing. Gray has the laughing flowers; and Langhorne in two beautiful lines exquisitely personifies Flora:—

'Where Tweed's soft banks in liberal beauty lie,
And Flora laughs beneath an azure sky.'

Sir William Jones, with all the spirit of Oriental poetry, has 'the laughing air.' It is but justice, however, to Dryden, to acknowledge that he has employed this epithet very boldly in the following delightful lines, which are almost entirely borrowed from his original, Chaucer:

'The morning lark, the messenger of day,
Saluted in her song the morning gray;
And soon the sun arose, with beams so bright,
That all the horizon laughed to see the joyous sight.'

Palamon and Arke, B. II

It is extremely difficult to conceive what the ancients precisely meant by the word purpureus. They seem to have designed by it any thing bright and beautiful. A classical friend has furnished me with numerous significations of this word which are very contradictory. Albino-vivus, in his elegy on Livia, mentions Nivem purpuream.

Catullus, Quercus ramos purpureos. Horace purpureas bibit nectar, and somewhere mentions Oloros purpureos. Virgil has purpureum comit ille animum; and Homer calls the sea purple, and gives it in some other book the same epithet, when in a storm.

The general idea, however, has been fondly adopted by the finest writers in Europe. The PURPLE of the ancients is not known to us. What idea, therefore, have the moderns affixed to it? Addison in his vision of the Temple of Fame describes the country as 'being covered with a kind of PURPLE LIGHT.' Gray's beautiful line is well known as 'The bloom of young desire and purple light of love.'

And Tasso, in describing his hero Godfrey, says, Heaven
'Gli emple d'onor la faccia, e vi riduce
Di Giovinezza, il bel purpureo lume.'

Both Gray and Tasso copied Virgil, where Venus gives to her son Aeneas—

—'Lumenque Juvenae
Purpureum.'

Dryden has omitted the purple light in his version, nor is it given by Pitt; but Dryden expresses the general idea by

—'With hands divine,
Had formed his curling locks and made his temples shine,
And given his rolling eyes a sparkling grace.'

It is probable that Milton has given us his idea of what was meant by this purple light, when applied to the human countenance, in the felicitous expression of

'Celestial rosy-red.'

Gray appears to me to be indebted to Milton for a hint for the opening of his elegy: as in the first line he has Dante and Milton in his mind, he perhaps might also in the following passage have recollected a congenial one in Comus, which he altered. Milton, describing the evening, marks it out by —'What time the labour'd ox

In his loose traces from the furrow came,
And the swink'd hedger at his supper sat.'

Gray has,

'The lowing herd wind slowly o'er the lea,
The plowman homeward plods his weary way.'

Warton has made an observation on this passage in Comus; and observes further that it is a classical circumstance, but not a natural one, in an English landscape, for our ploughmen quit their work at noon. I think therefore the imitation is still more evident; and as Warton observes, both Gray and Milton copied here from books, and not from life.

There are three great poets who have given us a similar incident.

Dryden introduces the highly finished picture of the hare in his Annus Mirabilis:

Stanza 131.

'So have I seen some fearful hare maintain
A course, till tired before the dog she lay;
Who stretched behind her, pants upon the plain,
Fast power to kill, as she to get away.

132.

With his loll'd tongue he faintly licks his prey,
His warm breath blows her flix up as she lies;
She trembling creeps upon the ground away,
And looks back to him with beseeching eyes.'

Thompson paints the stag in a similar situation:

—'Fainting breathless toil
Sick seizes on his heart—he stands at bay:
The big round tears run down his dappled face,
He groans in anguish.'

Autumn, v. 451

Shakespeare exhibits the same object:

'The wretched animal heaved forth such groans,
That their discharge did stretch his leathern coat
Almost to bursting; and the big round tears
Cours'd one another down his innocent nose
In piteous chase.'

Of these three pictures the beseeching eyes of Dryden perhaps is more pathetic than the big round tears, certainly borrowed by Thompson from Shakespeare, because the former expression has more passion, and is therefore more poetical. The sixth line in Dryden is perhaps exquisite for its imitative harmony, and with peculiar felicity paints the action itself. Thompson adroitly drops the innocent nose, of which one word seems to have lost its original signification, and the other offends now by its familiarity.

the different styles, in their servile imitations clashed together; and parties were formed, who fought desperately for the style they chose to adopt. The public were long harassed by a fantastic race, who called themselves Ciceroan, of whom are recorded many ridiculous practices, to strain out the words of Cicero into their hollow verbosity. They were routed by the facetious Erasmus. Then followed the brilliant era of epigrammatic points; and good sense, and good taste were nothing without the spurious ornaments of false wit. Another age was deluged by a million of sonnets; and volumes were for a long time read, without their readers being aware that their patience was exhausted. There was an age of epics, which probably can never return again; for after two or three, the rest can be but repetitions with a few variations.

In Italy, from 1580 to 1590, a vast multitude of books were written on love; the fashion of writing on that subject (for certainly it was not always a passion with the indefatigable writer,) was an epidemic distemper. They were like pedants, and pagans; those who could not write their love in verses, diffused themselves in prose. When the Poliphilus of Colonna appeared, which is given in form of a dream, this dream made a great many dreamers, as it happens in company (says the sarcastic Zeno) when one yawner makes many yawn. When Bishop Hall first published his satires, he called them 'Toothless Satires,' but his latter ones he distinguished as 'Biting Satires;' many good-natured men, who could only write good-natured verse, crowded in his footsteps, and the abundance of their labours only showed that even the "toothless" satires of Hall could bite more sharply than those of servile imitators. After Spenser's Fairy Queen was published, the press overflowed with many mistaken imitations, in which satire were the chief actors,—this circumstance is humorously animadverted on by Marston, in his satires, as quoted by Warton: Every scribe now falls asleep, and in his —dreams, straight tenné pound to one

Outspies some fairy—

Awakes, straight rubs his eyes, and prints his tale.

The great personage who gave a fashion to this class of literature was the courtly and romantic Elizabeth herself; her obsequious wits and courtiers would not fail to feed and flatter her taste. Whether they all felt the beauties, or languished over the tediousness of 'the Fæerie Queen,' and the 'Arcadia' of Sidney, at least her majesty gave a page to such sentimental and refined romance. The classical Elizabeth introduced another literary fashion; having translated the Hercules (Etacus, she made it fashionable to translate Greek tragedies. There was a time, in the age of fanaticism, and the long parliament, that books were considered the more valuable for their length. The seventeenth century was the age of folios. One Caryl wrote a 'Commentary on Job' in two volumes folio, of above ten thousand two hundred sheets; as it was intended to indicate the virtue of patience, these volumes gave at once to the theory and the practice. One is astonished at the multitude of the divines of this age; whose works now lie buried under the brick and mortar tombs of four or five folios, which on a moderate calculation, might now be 'wire drawn' into thirty or forty modern octavos.

In Charles I's time, love and honour were heightened by the wits into florid romance; but Lord Goring turned all into ridicule; and he was followed by the Duke of Buckingham, whose happy vein of ridicule was favoured by Charles II, who gave it the vogue it obtained.

So William Temple justly observes, that changes in taste of wit are like those of habits, or other modes. On the return of Charles II, none were more out of fashion among the new courtiers than the old Earl of Norwich, who was esteemed the greatest wit, in his father's time, among the old.

Modern times have abounded with what may be called fashionable literature. Tragedies were some years ago in fashionable as comedies are at this day; Thomson, Metast, Francis, Hill, applied their genius to a department in which they lost it all. Declamation and rant, and overstrained language, were preferred to the fable, the manners, and to Nature, and these now sleep on our shelves! Then we had a family of paupers in the parish of poetry, in 'imitations of Spenser.' Not many years ago, Churchill was the occasion of deluging the town with political poems & quarto.—These again were succeeded by narrative poems, in the ballad measure, from all sizes of poets.—The Castle of Otranto was the father of that marvellous, which overstocks the circulating library.—Lord Byron has been the father of hundreds of graceless wons!—Travels and voyages have long been a class of literature so fashionable, that we begin to dread the arrival of certain persons from the Continent!

Different times, then, are regulated by different tastes. What makes a strong impression on the public at one time, ceases to interest it at another; an author who sacrifices to the prevailing humours of his day has but little chance of being esteemed by posterity; and every age of modern literature might, perhaps, admit of a new classification, by dividing it into its periods of fashionable literature.

THE PANTOMIMICAL CHARACTERS.

Il est des gens de qui l'esprit gûné
Sous un front ja malade déridé
Ne souffre, n'approuve, et n'estime,
Que le pompeux, et le sublime;
Pour moi j'ose poser en fait
Qu'en de certains momens l'esprit le plus parfait
Peut aimer sans rougir jusqu'aux Marionettes;
Et qu'il est des tems et des lieux,
Où le grave, et le sérieux
Ne valent pas d'agréables sottises.

FEUX D'ANS

People there are who never smile,
Their foreheads still unsmooth'd, the while
Some lambent flame of mirth will play,
That wins the easy heart away;
Such only choose in prose or rhyme
A bristling pomp,—they call sublime!
I blush not to like Harlequin
Would he but talk,—and all his kin!
Yes, there are times, and there are places,
When flame and old wives' tales are worth the Graces.

CERVANTES, in the person of his hero, has confessed the delight he received from amusements which disturb the gravity of some, who are apt, however, to be more entertained by them than they choose to acknowledge. Don Quixote thus dismisses a troop of merry strollers, 'Andad con dios buena gente, y hazad vuestra fiesta, porque desde muchacho fui aficionado a la Carátula, y en mi mocedad se me iban los ojos tras la Farándula.' In a literal version the passage may run thus:—'Go, good people, God be with you, and keep your merry-making! for from childhood I was in love with the Carátula, and in my youth my eyes would lose themselves amidst the Farándula.' According to Pineda La Carátula is an actor masked, and La Farándula is a kind of farce.*

Even the studious Bayle, wrapping himself in his cloak, and hurrying to the market-place to Puchinello, would laugh when the fellow had humour in him, as was usually the case; and I believe the pleasure some still find in pantomimes, to the annoyance of their gravity, is a very natural one, and only wants a little more understanding in the actors and the spectators.

The truth is, that here our Harlequin and all his lifeless family are condemned to perpetual silence. They came to us from the genial hilarity of the Italian theatre, and were all the grotesque children of wit, and whim, and satire. Why is this burlesque race here privileged to cost so much, to do so little, and to repeat that little so often? Our own pantomime may, indeed, boast of two inventions of its own growth: we have turned Harlequin into a magician, and this produces the surprise of sudden changes of scenery, whose splendour and curious correctness have rarely been equalled; while in the metamorphosis of the scene, a certain sort of wit to the eye, 'mechanic wit,' as it has been termed, has originated, as when a surgeon's shop is turned into a laundry, with the inscription 'Mangling done here' or counsellors at the bar changed into fish-women.

Every one of this grotesque family were the creatures of national genius, chosen by the people for themselves. Italy, both ancient and modern, exhibits a gesticulating people of comedians, and the same comic genius charac-

* Motteux, whose translation Lord Woodhouselee distinguishes as the most curious, turns the passage thus: 'I wish you well, good people, drive on to act your play, for in my very childhood I loved shows, and have been a great admirer of dramatic representations.' Part II, c. xl. The other translators have nearly the same words. But in employing the generic term they lose the species, that is, the thing itself; but what is less tolerable, in the fitness of the style, they lose that delightfulness with which Cervantes conveys to us the recollected pleasures then busying the warm brain of his hero. An English reader, who often grows weary over the Quixote, appears not always sensible that one of the secret charms of Cervantes, like all great national authors, lies concealed in his idiom and style.

terised the nation through all its revolutions, as well as the individual through all his fortunes. The lower classes still betray their aptitude in that vivid humour, where the action is suited to the word—silent gestures sometimes expressing whole sentences. They can tell a story, and even raise the passions, without opening their lips. No nation in modern Europe possesses so keen a relish for the burlesque, inasmuch as to show a class of unrivalled poems, which are distinguished by the very title: and perhaps there never was an Italian in a foreign country, however deep in trouble, but would drop all remembrance of his sorrows, should one of his countrymen present himself with the paraphernalia of Punch at the corner of a street. I was acquainted with an Italian, a philosopher and a man of fortune, residing in this country, who found so lively a pleasure in performing Punchinello's little comedy, that, for this purpose, with considerable expense and curiosity, he had his wooden company, in all their costume, sent over from his native place. The shrill squeak of the tin whistle had the same comic effect on him as the notes of the Rans des Vaches have in awakening the tenderness of domestic emotions in the wandering Swiss—the national genius is dramatic. Lady Wortley Montagu, when she resided at a villa near Brescia, was applied to by the villagers for leave to erect a theatre in her saloon: they had been accustomed to turn the stables into a playhouse every carnival. She complied, and as she tells us, was 'surprised at the beauty of their scenes, though painted by a country painter. The performance was yet more surprising, the actors being all peasants; but the Italians have so natural a genius for comedy, they acted as well as if they had been brought up to nothing else, particularly the Arliegino, who far surpassed any of our English, though only the tailor of our village, and I am assured never saw a play in any other place. Italy is the mother, and the nurse, of the whole Harlequin race.

Hence it is that no scholars in Europe, but the most learned Italians, omit by the national genius, could have devoted their vigils to narrate the revolutions of pantomime, to compile the annals of Harlequin, to unroll the genealogy of Punch, and to discover even the most secret anecdotes of the obscure branches of that grotesque family amidst their changeful fortunes during a period of two thousand years! Nor is this all; princes have ranked them among the Roscuses; and Harlequins and Scaramouches have been ennobled. Even Harlequins themselves have written elaborate treatises on the almost insurmountable difficulties of their art. I despair to convey the sympathy they have inspired me with to my reader; but every Transmontane genius must be informed, that of what he has never seen, he must rest content to be told.

Of the ancient Italian troop we have retained three or four of the characters, while their origin has nearly escaped our recollection; but of the burlesque comedy, the extempore dialogue, the humorous fable, and its peculiar species of comic acting, all has vanished.

Many of the popular pastimes of the Romans unquestionably survived their dominion, for the people will amuse themselves, though their masters may be conquered; and tradition has never proved more faithful than in preserving popular sports. Many of the games of our children were played by Roman boys; the mountebanks, with the dancers and tumblers on their moveable stages, still in our fairs, are Roman; the disorders of the Bacchanalia Italy appears to imitate in her carnivals. Among these Roman diversions certain comic characters have been transmitted to us, along with some of their characteristics, and their dresses. The speaking pantomimes and extempore comedies, which have delighted the Italians for many centuries, are from this source.

Of the Mimi and the Pantomimi of the Romans, the following notices enter into our present researches:

The Mimi were an impudent race of buffoons, who excelled in mimicry, and, like our domestic fools, admitted into convivial parties to entertain the guests; from them we derive the term mimetic art. Their powers enabled them to perform a more extraordinary office, for they appear to have been introduced into funerals, to mimic the person, and even the language of the deceased. Suetonius describes an Archimimus, accompanying the funeral of Vespasian. This Archimime performed his part admirably, not only representing the person, but imitating, according to custom, ut est vocis, manners and language of the living emperor. He contrived a happy stroke at the prevailing foible of Vespasian, when he inquired the cost of all this funeral pomp? 'Ten millions of aesterces!' On this he observed, that if they would give him but a hundred thousand, they might throw his body into the Tiber.

The Pantomimi were quite of a different class. They were tragic actors, usually mute; they combined with the arts of gesture, music and dances of the most impressive character. Their silent language often drew tears by the pathetic emotions which they excited: 'Their very nod speaks, their hands talk, and their fingers have a voice,' says one of their admirers. Seneca, the father, grave as was his profession, confessed his taste for pantomimes had become a passion;* and by the decree of the senate, that 'the Roman knights should not attend the pantomimic players in the streets,' it is evident that the performers were greatly honored. Lucian has composed a curious treatise on pantomimes. We may have some notion of their deep conception of character, and their invention, by an anecdote recorded by Macrobius, of two rival pantomimes. When Hylas, dancing a hymn, which closed with the words, 'The great Agamemnon,' to express that idea took it in its literal meaning, and stood erect, as if measuring his size—Pylades, his rival, exclaimed, 'You make him tall, but not great!' The audience obliged Pylades to dance the same hymn; when he came to the words, he collected himself in a posture of deep meditation. This silent pantomimic language we ourselves have witnessed carried to singular perfection, when the actor Palmer, after building a theatre, was prohibited the use of his voice by the magistrates. It was then he powerfully affected the audience by the eloquence of his action in the tragic pantomime of Don Juan!

These pantomimi seem to have been held in great honour; many were children of the Graces and the Virtues! The tragic and the comic masks were among the ornaments of the sepulchral monuments of an Arch-mime and a Pantomime. Montfaucon conjectures that they formed a select fraternity.† They had such an influence over the Roman people, that when two of them quarrelled, Augustus interfered to renew their friendship. Pylades was one of them, and he observed to the emperor, that nothing could be more useful to him than that the people should be perpetually occupied with the squabbles, between him and Bathyllus! The advice was accepted and the emperor was silenced.

The party-coloured hero, with every part of his dress has been drawn out of the great wardrobe of antiquity; he was a Roman Mime. Harlequin is described with his shaven head, rasis capitiibus; his sooty face, fuliginis faciem obducti; his flat, unshod feet, planipedes; and his patched coat of many colours, Mimi centunculo.‡ Eve

‡ Louis Riccoboni, in his curious little treatise 'Du Theat. Italien,' illustrated by seventeen prints of the Italian pantomimic characters, has duly collected the authorities. I give them in the order quoted above, for the satisfaction of more grave inquirers. Vossius Instit. Poet. Lib. II, cap. 32, § 4. The Mimi blackened their faces. Diomedes de Orat. Lib. II Apuleius in Apolog. And further, the patched dress was used by the ancient peasants of Italy, as appears by a passage in Celsus de Re Rust. Lib. I, c. 8; and Juvenal employs the term centunculus as a diminutive of cento, for a coat made up of patches. This was afterwards applied metaphorically to those well-known poems called centos, composed of stanzas and patches of poetry, collected from all quarters. Golden considered Harlequin as a poor devil and dolt, whose cut is made up of rags patched together; his hat shows mendicancy; and the hare's tail is still the dress of the peasantry (Benigno). Quadrio, in his learned Storia d'ogni Poesia, has diffused his erudition on the ancient Mimi and their sacred songs. Dr Clarke has discovered the light lathe sword of Harlequin, amidst the dark mysteries of the ancient mythology! We read with equal astonishment and novelty, that the prototypes of the modern Pantomime are in the Pagan mysteries; that Harlequin is Mercury, with his short sword called herp or his rod the caduceus, to render himself invisible, and to transport himself from one end of the earth to the other; in the covering on his head was his petasus, or winged cap; in Columbine is Psyche, or the Soul; the Old Man in our Pantomimes is Charon; the Clown is Momus, the buffoon of heaven, whose large gaping mouth is an imitation of the ancient masks. The subject of an ancient vase engraven in this volume represents Harlequin, Columbine, and the Clown; we see them on the English stage. The dreams of the learned are amusing when we are not put to sleep. Dr Clarke's Travels, vol. IV, p. 460. The Italian antiquaries never examined any doubt of the remote origin. See the fourth ed. of this volume, Appendix. A letter from the Marquis de Spon

Pulcinella, whom we familiarly call Punch, may receive his other personages of not greater importance, all his ignity from antiquity; one of his Roman ancestors having appeared to an antiquary's visionary eye in a bronze statue: more than one erudite dissertation authenticates its family likeness; the nose long, prominent, and hooked; its staring goggle eyes; the hump at his back and at his feet; in a word, all the character which so strongly marks the Punch-race, as distinctly as whole dynasties are featured by the Austrian lip and the Bourbon nose.*

The genealogy of the whole family is confirmed by the moral term, which includes them all; for our Zany, in Latin Zanni, comes direct from Sannio, a buffoon; and passage in Cicero, de Oratore, paints Harlequin and its brother gesticulators after the life; the perpetual trembling motion of their limbs, their ludicrous and flexible postures, and all the mimicry of their faces. 'Quid enim nisi tem ridiculum, quam SANNIO esse? Qui ore, vultu, membris motibus, voce, denique corpore ridetur ipso.' Lib. I, Sect. 61. For what has more of the ludicrous than SANNIO? who, with his mouth, his face, imitating every action, with his voice, and indeed, with all his body, provokes laughter.†

These are the two ancient heroes of Pantomime. The other characters are the laughing children of mere modern humour. Each of these chimerical personages, like so many Comy-Members, come from different provinces in the gesticulating land of Pantomime; in little principalities the rival inhabitants present a contrast in manners and characters which opens a wider field for ridicule and satire, than in a kingdom where a uniformity of government will produce a uniformity of manners. An inventor appeared in Buzzante, an author and actor who flourished about 1530. Till his time they had servilely copied the duped pliers, the wild sons, and the tricking valets, of Plautus and Terence; but, and perhaps, not being writers of sufficient skill, but of some invention, were satisfied to sketch the plots of dramas, but boldly trusted to extempore acting and dialogue. Buzzante peopled the Italian stage with a fresh enlivening crowd of pantomimic characters; he snatched dotards of the ancient comedy were transformed into the Venetian Pantaloon and the Bolognese Doctor: while the hair-brained fellow, the arch-knave, and the booby, were furnished from Milan, Bergamo, and Calabria. He gave his newly-created beings new language and a new dress. From Plautus he appears to have taken

* This statue, which is imagined to have thrown so much light on the genealogy of Punch, was discovered in 1727, and is preserved in Ficorini's amusing work on Le Maschere antiche e le figure comiche d'antichi Romani, p. 48. It is that of a Mime called Maccus by the Romans; the name indicates its completion. But the origin of the more modern name has occasioned a little difference, whether it be derived from the name of its speaker. The learned Quadrio would draw the name from Pulcinella (I suppose this to be the turkey-cock), because Pulcinella's hooked nose resembles its beak. But Baretti, in that stage book the Tolondron, gives a derivation admirably descriptive of the peculiar squeaking nasal sound. He says, Punchinello, or Punch, as you well know, speaks with a squeaking voice that seems to come out at his nose, because the fellow who in a puppet-show manages the puppet called Punchinello, or Punch, as the English folks abbreviate it, speaks with a tin whistle in his mouth, which makes him emit that comical kind of voice. But the English word Punchinello is Latin Pulcinella, which means a hen-chicken. Chickens voices are squeaking and nasal; and they are timid, and nervous, and for this reason my whimsical countrymen have given the name of Pulcinella, or hen-chicken, to that comic character, to convey the idea of a man that speaks with a squeaking voice through his nose, to express a timid and weak fellow, who is always threatened by the other actors, and always boasts of victory after they are gone.† Tolondron, p. 48.

† How the Latin Sannio became the Italian Zanni, was a subject in the round-about of etymology which put Riccoboni by all at his ease; for he, having discovered this classical root of his favourite character, was alarmed at Menage giving it up with obsequious tameness to a Cruscan correspondent. The learned Quadrio, however, gives his vote for the Greek source, from whence the Latins borrowed their Sannio. Riccoboni's derivation, therefore, now stands secure from all verbal disorders of human quiet.

* Seneca in Latin, as Ainsworth elaborately explains 'a laughing by grimaces, mows, a frow, a frump, a gibe, a scoff, a sneer; and Sannio is 'a fool in a play.' The Italians laugh the S into Z, for they say Zmyrna and Zambuco, for myrna and ambuco; and thus they turned Sannio into Zanni, and then into Zanni, and we caught the echo in our Zany.

the hint of introducing all the Italian dialects into one comedy, by making each character use his own; and even the modern Greek, which, it seems, afforded many an unexpected play on words for the Italian.* This new kind of pleasure, like the language of Babel charmed the national ear; every province would have its dialect introduced on the scene, which often served the purpose both of recreation and a little innocent malice. Their masks and dresses were furnished by the grotesque masqueraders of the carnival, which doubtless, often contributed many scenes and humours to the quick and fanciful genius of Buzzante. I possess a little book of Scaramouches, &c., by Callot. Their masks and their costume must have been copied from these carnival scenes. We see their strongly-featured masks; their attitudes, pliant as those of a posture-master; the drollery of their figures; while the grotesque creatures seem to leap, and dance, and gesticulate, and move about so fantastically under his sharp graver, that they form as individualized a race as our fairies and witches; mortals, yet like nothing mortal!

The first Italian actors wore masks—objections have been raised against their use. Signorelli shows the inferiority of the modern in deviating from the moveable or rather double masks of antiquity, by which the actor could vary the artificial face at pleasure. The mask has had its advocates, for some advantages it possesses over the naked face; a mask aggravates the features, and gives a more determined expression to the comic character; an important effect among this fantastical group.†

The Harlequin in the Italian theatre has passed through all the vicissitudes of fortune. At first he was a true representative of the ancient Mime, but afterwards degenerated into a booby and a gourmand, the perpetual butt for a sharp-witted fellow, his companion, called Brighella; the knife and the whetstone. Harlequin, under the reforming hand of Goldoni, became a child of nature, the delight of his country; and he has commemorated the historical character of the great Harlequin Sacchi. It may serve the reader to correct his notions of one, from the absurd pretender with us who has usurped the title. 'Sacchi possessed a lively and brilliant imagination. While other Harlequins merely repeated themselves, Sacchi, who always adhered to the essence of the play, contrived to give an air of freshness to the piece by his new sallies and unexpected repartees. His comic traits and his jests were neither taken from the language of the lower orders, nor that of the comedians. He levied contributions on comic authors, on poets, orators, and philosophers; and in his impromptus they often discovered the thoughts of Seneca, Cicero, or Montaigne. He possessed the art of appropriating the remains of these great men to himself, and allying them to the simplicity of the blockhead; so that the same proposition which was admired in a serious author, became highly ridiculous in the mouth of this excellent actor.‡ In France Harlequin was improved into a wit, and even converted into a moralist; he is the graceful hero of Florian's charming compositions, which please, even in the closet. 'This imaginary being, invented by the Italians, and adopted by the French,' says the ingenious Goldoni, 'has the exclusive right of uniting naïveté with adresse, and no one ever surpassed Florian in the delineation of this amphibious character. He has even contrived to impart sentiment, passion, and morality, to his pieces.§ Harlequin must be modelled as a national character, the creature of manners; and thus the history of such a Harlequin might be that of the age and of the people, whose genius he ought to represent.

The history of a people is often detected in their popular amusements; one of these Italian pantomimic characters shows this. They had a Capitan, who probably originated in the Miles gloriosus of Plautus; a brother, at least, of our ancient Pistol and Bobadil. The ludicrous names of this military poltroon were, Spavento (Horrid fright), Spavento (Shiver-spear), and a tremendous recreant was Capitan Spavento de Val inferno. When Charles V entered Italy, a Spanish Captain was introduced; a dreadful man he was too, if we are to be frightened by names: Sangre e fuego! and Matamoros! His business was to deal in Spanish rhodomontades, to kick out the native Italian Capitan, in compliment to the Span-sards, and then to take a quiet caning from Harlequin, in compliment to themselves. When the Spaniards lost their influence in Italy, the Spanish Captain was turned into Scaramouch, who still wore the Spanish dress, and was perpetually in a panic. The Italians could only avenge themselves on the Spaniards in Pantomime! On the same principle the gown of Pantaloon over his red waistcoat and breeches, commemorates a circumstance in Venetian history, expressive of the popular feeling; the dress is that of a Venetian citizen, and his speech the dialect; but when the Venetians lost Negropont, they changed their upper dress to black, which before had been red, as a national demonstration of their grief.

The characters of the Italian Pantomime became so numerous, that every dramatic subject was easily furnished with the necessary personages of comedy. That loquacious pedant the Dottore was taken from the Lawyers and the Physicians, babbling false Latin in the dialect of learned Bologna. Scapin was a livery servant who spoke the dialect of Bergamo, a province proverbially abounding with rank intriguing knaves, who, like the slaves in Plautus and Terence, were always on the watch to further any wickedness; while Calabria furnished the booby Giangurgello with his grotesque nose. Moliere, it has been ascertained, discovered in the Italian theatre at Paris his 'Médecin malgré lui,' his 'Etourdi,' his 'L'Avare,' and his 'Scapin.' Milan offered a pimp in the Brighella; Florence an ape of fashion in Gelsomino. These and other pantomimic characters, and some ludicrous ones, as the Tartaglia, a spectacled dotard, and a stammerer, and usually in a passion, had been gradually introduced by the inventive powers of an actor of genius, to call forth his own peculiar talents.

The Pantomimes, or, as they have been described, the continual Masquerades, of Ruzzante, with all these diversified personages, talking and acting, formed, in truth, a burlesque comedy. Some of the finest geniuses of Italy became the votaries of Harlequin; and the Italian Pantomime may be said to form a school of its own. The invention of Ruzzante was one capable of perpetual novelty. Many of these actors have been chronicled either for the invention of some comic character, or for their true imitation of nature in performing some favourite one. One, already immortalized by having lost his real name in that of Captain Matamoros, by whose inimitable humours he became the most popular man in Italy, invented the Neapolitan Pulcinello; while another, by deeper study, added new graces to another burlesque rival.* One Constantini invented the character of Mezezin, as the Narcissus of Pantomime. He acted without a mask, to charm by the beautiful play of his countenance, and display the graces of his figure; the floating drapery of his fanciful dress could be arranged by the changeable humour of the wearer. Crowds followed him in the streets, and a King of Poland ennobled him. The Wit and Harlequin Dominic sometimes dined at the table of Louis XIV. Tiberio Fiorilli, who invented the character of Scaramouch, had been the amusing companion of the boyhood of Louis XIV; and from him Moliere learnt much, as appears by the verses under his portrait:

Cet illustre Comedien
De son art traca la carrière:
Il fut le maître de Molière,
Et la Nature fut le sien.

The last lines of an epitaph on one of these pantomimic actors may be applied to many of them during their flourishing period:

'Toute sa vie il a fait rire;
Il a fait pleurer sa mort.'

Several of these admirable actors were literary men, who have written on their art, and shown that it was one. The Harlequin Cechini composed the most ancient treatise on this subject, and was ennobled by the Emperor Matthias; and Nicholas Barbieri, for his excellent acting called the Beltrame, a Milanese simpleton, in his treatise on Comedy, tells us that he was honoured by the conversation of Louis XIII, and rewarded with fortune.

* I am here but the translator of a grave historian. The Italian writes with all the feeling of one aware of the important narrative, and with a most curious accuracy in this genealogy of character: Silvio Fiorillo, che appellar si faceva il Capitano Matamoros, inventò il Pulcinella Napoletano, e collo studio e grazia molto agguisò Andrea Calcese detto Ciuccio por soprannome. Gimma Italia Letterata, p. 196

What was the nature of that perfection to which Italian pantomime reached; and that prodigality of gesture which excited such enthusiasm, not only among the people, but the studious, and the noble, and the men of genius?

The Italian Pantomime had two peculiar features, species of buffoonery technically termed Lazzi, and of a more extraordinary nature, the extempore dialogue in comedy.

These Lazzi were certain pleasantries of gesticulation quite national, yet so closely allied to our notions of buffoonery, that a Northern critic will not readily detect separating shade; yet Riccoboni asserts that they form a critical and not a trivial art. That these arts of gesticulation had something in them peculiar to Italian humours we infer from Gherardi, who could not explain the art but by describing it as 'Un Tair: JEU ITALIEN?' was so peculiar to them, that he could only call it by its own name. It is difficult to describe that of which whole magic consists in being seen: and what is evanescent than the humour which consists in gesture.

Lazzi (says Riccoboni) is a term corrupted from old Tuscan Lacci, which signifies a knot, or something which connects. These pleasantries called Lazzi are a series of actions by which the performer breaks into the scene to paint to the eye his emotions of panic or jocularity, but as such gestures are foreign to the business going on, the nicety of the art consists in not interrupting the scene and connecting the Lazzi with it; thus to tie the whole together. Lazzi, then, seems a kind of mimicry or gesture, corresponding with the passing scene; and may translate the term by one in our green-room dialect, side-play. Riccoboni has ventured to describe two Lazzi. When Harlequin and Scapin represent two misadvised servants of a poor young mistress, among the many by which they express their state of starvation, Harlequin having murmured, Scapin exhorts him to groan, a groan which brings out their young mistress. Scapin explains Harlequin's impatience, and begins a proposal to which might extricate them all from their misery. When Scapin is talking, Harlequin performs his Lazzi—imagining he holds a handful of cherries, he seems eating them and gaily flinging the stones at Scapin; or with a rod countenance he is trying to catch a fly, and with his hands in comical despair, would chop off the wings before it swallows the chameleon game. These, with similar Lazzi harmonize with the remonstrance of Scapin, and re-assure him; and thus these 'Lazzi, although they seem to interrupt the progress of the action, yet in cutting it off slide back into it, and connect or tie the whole.' The Lazzi are in great danger of degenerating into poor mimicry or gross buffoonery, unless fancifully conceived and vividly gesticulated. But the Italians seem to possess the art of gesture before that of speech: and this national characteristic is also Roman. Such, indeed, was the powerful expression of their mimetic art, that when the select troop under Riccoboni, on their first introduction into France, only spoke in Italian, the audience who did not understand the words, were made complete masters of the action by their pure and energetic imitation of nature. The Italian theatre, has, indeed, recorded some miracles of this sort. A celebrated Scaramouch, without uttering a syllable, kept the audience for a considerable time in a state of suspense by a scene of successive terrors; and exhibited a living picture of a panic-stricken man. Gherardi, in his 'Theatre Italien,' conveys some idea of the scene. Scaramouch, a character usually represented in a fright, is waiting for his master Harlequin in his apartment; having put every thing in order, according to his confused notions, he takes the guitar, seats himself in an arm-chair and plays. Pasquariel comes gradually behind him and taps him on the shoulders—this throws Scaramouch into a panic. 'It was then that incomparable model of our most eminent actors,' says Gherardi, 'displayed the miracles of his art: that art which paints the passions in the face, throws them into every gesture and through a whole scene of frights upon frights, conveys the most powerful expression of ludicrous terror. This man moved all hearts by the simplicity of nature, more than skilled orators can with all the charms of persuasive rhetoric.' On this memorable scene a great price was offered that 'Scaramuccia non parla, e dica gran cose.' He speaks not, but he says many great things.

In gesticulation and humour our Rich appears to have been a complete Mimi: his genius was entirely confined himself; and he had the glory of introducing Harpocrates on the English stage, which he played under the pseudonym of Lun. He could describe to the audience by his signs and gestures as intelligibly as others could express by words. There is a large caricature print of the triumph which Rich had obtained over the severe laws of Tragedy and Comedy, which lasted too long not to excite jealousy and opposition from the corps dramatique. Garrick, who once introduced a speaking Harlequin, is celebrated the silent but powerful language of Rich:

'When Lun appear'd, with matchless art and whim
He gave the power of speech to every limb,
The mask'd and mute, convey'd his quick intent,
And told in frolic gestures what he meant:
But now the motley coat and sword of wood
Require a tongue to make them understood!'

The Italian Extempore Comedy is a literary curiosity which claims our attention.

EXTEMPORÉ COMEDIES.

It is a curiosity in the history of national genius to discover a people with such a native fund of comic humour, combined with such passionate gesticulation, that they had deeply interest in acting a Comedy, carried on by blague, intrigue, and character, all'improvviso, or improvisato: the actors undergoing no rehearsal, and, in fact, composing while they were acting. The plot, called scenario, consisting merely of the scenes enumerated, with the characters indicated, was first written out; it was then suspended at the back of the stage, and from thence, upon inspection, the actors came forward to perform, in dialogue entirely depending on their own genius.*

'These pieces must have been detestable, and the actors mere buffoons,' exclaim the Northern critics, whose imaginations have a coldness in them, like a frost in spring. At the time when the art of Extempore Comedy flourished among the children of fancy, the universal pleasure these representations afforded to a whole vivacious people, and the novel celebrity of their great actors, open a new field for the speculation of genius. It may seem more extraordinary that some of its votaries have maintained that it possessed some peculiar advantages over written compositions. Don Goldoni reformed the Italian theatre by regular comedies, he found an invincible opposition from the enthusiasts of their old Comedy; for two centuries it had been the amusement of Italy, and was a species of comic entertainment which it had created. Inventive minds were fond of sketching out these outlines of pieces, and other men of genius of representing them.

The inspiration of national genius alone could produce this phenomenon; and these Extempore Comedies were, indeed, indigenous to the soil. Italy, a land of improvisation, kept up from the time of their old masters, the Romans, the same fervid fancy. The ancient Atellan Fables, or Atellan Farces, originated at Atella, a town in the neighbourhood of ancient Naples; and these, too, were mere interludes, or, as Livy terms them, Exodia. So and in that historian a little interesting narrative of the theatrical history of the Romans: when the dramatic performances at Rome were becoming too sentimental and inflammatory, banishing the playfulness and the mirth of Comedy, the Roman youth left these graver performances to the professed actors, and revived, perhaps in imitation of the licentious Satyræ of the Greeks, the ancient custom of playing pleasantries, and throwing out jests and railery upon themselves, for their own diversion.† These Atellan Farces were probably not so low in humour as they have been represented; for at least the Roman youth, on their revival, exercised a chaster taste, for they are noticed by Cicero in a letter to his literary friend Papyrus Patus, which may be read in Melmoth's version. 'But to turn from the serious to the jocose part of your letter—the strain of pleasantry you break into, immediately after having distinctly quoted the tragedy of Æneïdeus, puts me in mind of the modern method of introducing at the end of these graver dramatic pieces the buffoon humour of our low mimes, instead of the more delicate burlesque of the old Atellan Farces.* This very curious passage, distinctly marks out the two classes, which so many centuries after Cicero were revived in the Pantomime of Italy, and in its Extempore Comedy.†

The critics on our side of the Alps reproached the Italians for the Extempore Comedies; and Marmontel, in the Encyclopédie, rashly declared that the nation did not possess a single Comedy which could endure a perusal. But he drew his notions from the low Farces of the Italian theatre at Paris, and he censured what he had never read.‡ The Comedies of Bibiena, Del Lasca, Del Secchi, and others, are models of classical Comedy, but not the popular favourites of Italy. Signorelli distinguishes two species of Italian Comedy, those which he calls Commedie Antiche ed Erudite, ancient and learned Comedies, and those of Commedia dell'Arte, or a Seggetto, Comedies suggested.—The first were moulded on classical models, recited in their academies to a select audience, and performed by amateurs; but the Commedia a Seggetto, the Extempore Comedies, were invented by professional actors of genius. More delightful to the fancy of the Italians, and more congenial to their talents, in spite of the graver critics, who even in their amusements cannot cast off the manacles of precedence, the Italians resolved to be pleased for themselves, with their own natural vein, and with one feeling preferred a freedom of original humour and invention incompatible with regular productions, but which inspired admirable actors, and secured full audiences.

Men of great genius had a passion for performing in these Extempore Comedies. Salvator Rosa was famous for his character of a Calabrian Clown, whose original he had probably often studied amidst that mountainous scenery in which his pencil delighted. Of their manner of acting I find an interesting anecdote in Passeri's life of this great painter; he shall tell his own story.

'One summer Salvator Rosa joined a company of young persons who were curiously addicted to the making of Commedie all'improvviso. In the midst of a vineyard they raised a rustic stage, under the direction of one Musi, who enjoyed some literary reputation, particularly for his sermons preached in Lent.

'Their second Comedy was numerously attended, and I went among the rest; I sat on the same bench, by good fortune, with the Cavalier Bernini, Romanelli, and Guido, all well known persons. Salvator Rosa, who had already made himself a favourite with the Roman people under the character of Formica,§ opened with a prologue, in company with other actors. He proposed, for relieving themselves of the extreme heats and enousi, that they should make a Comedy, and all agreed. Formica then spoke these exact words:

'Non voglio io, che facimmo Commedie come certi, che tagliano li panni aduosso a chisto, o a chillo; perche o lo tempo se fa vedere, chiu veloce lo taglio de no ranuolo, che la penna de no poeta; e ne manco boglio, che facimmo venire nella scena porta citazioni, acquavivari, e orapari, e etc schifenze che tengo spropositi da aseno.'

One part of this humour lies in the dialect, which is Venetian but there was a concealed stroke of satire, a sneer in the grass. The sense of the passage is, 'I will

* Melmoth's Letters of Cicero, B. viii, lett. 20—in Grævius's edition, Lib. ix, ep. 16.

† This passage also shows that our own custom of annexing a Farce, or petite piece, or Pantomime, to a tragic Drama, existed among the Romans: the introduction of the practice here seems not to be ascertained; and it is conjectured not to have existed before the Restoration. Shakespeare and his contemporaries probably were spectators of only a single drama at one performance.

‡ Storia Critica de Teatri de Signorelli, tom. iii, 238. Barotti mentions a collection of four thousand dramas, made by Apostolo Zeno, of which the greater part were Comedies. He allows that in tragedies his nation is inferior to the English and the French: but no nation, he adds, can be compared with us for pleasantry and humour in Comedy. Some of the greatest names in Italian Literature were writers of Comedy. Ital. Lib. 119.

§ Altieri explains Formica as a crabbed fellow who acts the butt in a Farce.

Some of the ancient Scenariæ were printed in 1661, by Flaminio Scala, one of their great actors. These, according to the learned, consist of nothing more than the skeletons of Comedies; the Canvases, as the French technically term a plot and scenes. He says, 'they are not so short as those we now see, to sit at the back of the scenes, nor so full as to furnish the dialogue: they only explain what the actor did on the stage, and the action which forms the subject; nothing more.'

The passage in Livy is 'Juventus, histrionibus tabellarum referens, ipsa inter se, more antiquo, ridicula intertextu variabat corpora.' Lib. vii, cap. 2.
As these Atellan Fables were never written, they have been derived to us in any shape. It has, indeed, been contended that Horace, in the fifth Satire of his first Book, v. has preserved a scene of this nature between two practical buffoons in the 'Pugnam Sarmenitum Scurra,' who challenge his brother Cicero: equally ludicrous and scurrilous. Surely these were rather the low humour of the Mimes, than of the Atellan Farces.

not, however, that we should make a Comedy like certain persons who cut clothes, and put them on this man's back, and on that man's back; for at last the time comes which shows how much faster went the cut of the shears than the pen of the poet; nor will we have entering on the scene, couriers, brandy-sellers and goat-herds, and their stare shy and blockish, which I think worthy the senseless invention of an ass.¹

Passeri now proceeds; 'At this time Bernini had made a Comedy in the Carnival, very pungent and biting; and that summer he had one of Castelli's performed in the suburbs, where, to represent the dawn of day, appeared on the stage, water carriers, couriers, and goat-herds, going about—all which is contrary to rule, which allows of no character who is not concerned in the dialogue to mix with the groups. At these words of the Formica, I, who well knew his meaning, instantly glanced my eye at Bernini, to observe his movements; but he, with an artificial carelessness, showed that this "cut of the shears" did not touch him; and he made no apparent show of being hurt. But Castelli, who was also near, tossing his head and smiling in bitterness, showed, clearly that he was hit.'

This Italian story told with all the poignant relish of these vivacious natives, to whom such a stinging incident was an important event, also shows the personal freedoms taken on these occasions by a man of genius, entirely in the spirit of the ancient Roman Atellana, or the Grecian Satyræ.

Riccoboni has discussed the curious subject of Extremopore Comedy with equal modesty and feeling; and Gherardi, with more exultation and egotism. 'This kind of spectacle,' says Riccoboni, is peculiar to Italy; 'one cannot deny that it has graces perfectly its own, and which written Comedy can never exhibit. This improvisu mode of acting furnishes opportunities for a perpetual change in the performances, so that the same scenario repeated still appears a new one; thus one Comedy may become twenty Comedies. An actor of this description, always supposing an actor of genius, is more vividly affected than one who has coldly got his part by rote.' But Riccoboni could not deny that there were inconveniences in this singular art. One difficulty not easily surmounted was the preventing of all the actors speaking together; each one eager to reply before the other had finished. It was a nice point to know when to yield up the scene entirely to a predominant character, when agitated, by violent passion; nor did it require a less exercised tact to feel when to stop; the vanity of an actor often spoiled a fine scene.

It evidently required that some of the actors at least should be blessed with genius, and what is scarcely less difficult to find, with a certain equality of talents; for the performance of the happiest actor of this school greatly depends on the excitement he receives from his companion; an actor beneath mediocrity would ruin a piece. 'But figure, memory, voice, and even sensibility, are not sufficient for the actor all' improvista; he must be in the habit of cultivating the imagination, pouring forth the flow of expression, and prompt in those flashes which instantaneously vibrate in the plaudits of an audience.' And this accomplished extempore actor feelingly laments that those destined to his profession, who require the most careful education, are most likely to have received the most neglected one. Lucian, in his curious treatise on Tragic Pantomime, asserts, that the great actor should also be a man of letters.

The lively Gherardi pushes his arguments with more boldness, and throws out some curious information respecting this singular art: 'Any one may learn a part by rote, and do something bad, or indifferent, on another theatre. With us the affair is quite otherwise; and when an Italian actor dies, it is with infinite difficulty we can supply his place. An Italian actor learns nothing by head; he looks on the subject for a moment before he comes forward on the stage, and entirely depends on his imagination for the rest. The actor who is accustomed merely to recite what he has been taught is so completely occupied by his memory, that he appears to stand as if he were unconnected either with the audience or his companion; he is so impatient to deliver himself of the burden he is carrying, that he trembles like a school-boy, or is as senseless as an Echo, and could never speak if others had not spoken before. Such a tutored actor among us would be like a paralytic arm to a body; an unserviceable member, only fatiguing the healthy action of the sound parts. Our performers, who became illustrious by their art, charmed the spectators by the beauty of their voice, their spontaneous gestures, the flexibility of their passions, while a certain natural air never failed them in their motions and their dialogue.'²

Here, then, is a species of the histrionic art unknown to us, and running counter to that critical canon which a great poet, but not powerful actor, has delivered to all actors themselves, 'to speak no more than is set down for them.' The present art consisted in happily performing the reverse.

Much of the merit of these actors unquestionably may be attributed to the felicity of the national genius. As there were probably some secret aids in this singular mode of Extremopore Comedy, which the pride of the artist concealed. Some traits in the character, and some wit in the dialogue, which had been traditionally; and the most experienced actor on that stage would make use of his memory more than he was willing to confess. Goldoni found an unlucky adventure of his 'Harlequin lost and found' which outline he had sketched for the Italian company; it was well received at Paris, but utterly failed at Fontainebleau, for some of the actors had thought proper to incorporate too many of the jokes of the 'Cocu imaginaire' which displeased the court, and ruined the piece. When a new piece was to be performed, the chief actor summoned the troop in the morning, read the plot, and explained the story, to contrive scenes. It was like playing the whole performance before the actors. These hints and scenes were all the rehearsal. When the actor entered on the scene he did not know what was to come, nor had he any prompter to help him on; much, too, depended on the talents of his companions; yet sometimes a scene might be preconceived. Invention, humour, bold conception of character, and rapid strokes of genius, they habitually exercised—and the pantomimic art of gesture, the passionate or humorous expression of their feelings, would assist an actor when his genius for a moment had deserted him. Such excellence was not long hereditary, and with the decline of this singular art its defects became more apparent. The race had degenerated; the inexperienced actor became loquacious; long monologues were contrived by a barren genius to hide his incapacity for spirited dialogue; and a wearisome repetition of trivial jests, coarse humour, and vulgar buffoonery, damned the Comédie à soggetto, and sunk it to a Bartholomew-fair play. But the miracle which genius produced, it may repeat, wherever the same happy combination of circumstances and persons shall occur together.

I shall give one anecdote to record the possible excellence of the art. Louis Riccoboni known in the annals of this theatre by the adopted name of Lelio, his favorite amorous character, was not only an accomplished actor, but a literary man; and with his wife Flammina, afterwards the celebrated novelist, displayed a rare union of talents and of minds. It was suspected that they did not act all' improvista, from the facility and the elegance of their dialogue; and a clamour was now raised in the literary circles, who had long been jealous of the fascination which attracted the public to the Italian theatre. It was said that the Riccobonis were imposing on the public credulity; and that their pretended Extremopore Comedies were preconcerted scenes. To terminate this civil war between the rival theatres, La Motte offered to sketch a plot in five acts, and the Italians were challenged to perform it. This defiance was instantly accepted. On the morning of the representation Lelio detailed the story to his troop, hung up the Scenario in its usual place, and the whole company was ready at the drawing of the curtain. The plot given in by La Motte was performed to admiration; and all Paris witnessed the triumph. La Motte afterwards composed this very comedy for the French theatre, L'Amant difficile, yet still the extempore one at the Italian theatre remained a more permanent favourite; and the public were delighted by seeing the same piece perpetually offering novelties and changing its character at the fancy of the actors. This fact conveys an idea of dramatic execution which does not enter into our experience. Riccoboni carried the Comédie dell'Arte to a new perfection, by the introduction of an elegant fable and serious characters; and

* See Gherardi's preface to his collection of Le Trucchi Italiani. These six volumes consist of Farces written by French authors, in imitation of the more ancient extempore ones. They are ludicrous, and the writers wantonly sport with absurdity.

he raised the dignity of the Italian stage when he inscribed in its curtain,

CASIGAT RIDENDO MOROS.*

MASSINGER, MILTON, AND THE ITALIAN THEATRE.

The pantomimic characters and the extempore comedy of Italy may have had some influence even on our own dramatic poets; this source has indeed escaped all notice; but I incline to think it explains a difficult point in Massinger, which has baffled even the keen spirit of Mr Gifford.

A passage in Massinger bears a striking resemblance with one in Molière's 'Malade Imaginaire.' It is in 'The Emperor of the East,' vol. III, 317. The Quack or Empiric's humorous notion is so closely that of Molière's that Mr Gifford, agreeing with Mr Gilchrist, 'finds it difficult to believe the coincidence accidental'; but the greater difficulty is, to conceive that 'Massinger ever fell into Molière's hands.' At that period, in the infancy of our literature, our native authors and our own language were as isolated as their country. It is more than probable that Massinger and Molière had drawn from the same source—the Italian comedy. Massinger's 'Empiric,' as well as the acknowledged copy of Molière's 'Medecin,' came from the 'Dottore,' of the Italian comedy. The humour of these old Italian pantomimes was often as traditionally preserved as proverbs. Massinger was a student of Italian authors; and some of the lucky hits of their theatre, which then consisted of nothing else but these burlesque comedies, might have circuitously reached the English stage; and six and thirty years afterwards, the same traditional jests might have been gleaned by the Gallic one from the 'Dottore,' who was still repeating what he knew was sure of pleasing.

Our theatres of the Elizabethan period seem to have had hereto the extempore comedy after the manner of the Italians, for surely possess one of these Scenarios, in the remarkable 'Platts,' which were accidentally discovered at Dulwich College, bearing every feature of an Italian Scenario. Stevens calls them 'a mysterious fragment of ancient stage-direction,' and adds, that 'the paper describes aspects of dramatic entertainment of which no memorial is preserved in any annals of the English stage.' The commentators on Shakespeare appear not to have known the nature of these Scenarios. The 'Platts,' as it is called, is fairly written in a large hand, containing directions supposed to be stuck up near the prompter's station; and it has even an oblong hole in its centre to admit of being suspended on a wooden peg. Particular scenes are barely ordered, and the names, or rather nicknames, of several of the players, appear in the most familiar manner, as they were known to their companions in the rude green-room of that day; such as 'Pigg, White and Black Dick and Sam, Little Will Barnes, Jack Gregory, and the Red-faced Fellow, &c. Some of these 'Platts' are on solemn subjects, like the tragic pantomime; and in some appear 'Pantaloon, and his man Peascock, with spectacles.' Stevens observes, that he met with no earlier example of the appearance of Pantaloon, as a specific character on our stage; and that this direction concerning 'the spectacles,' cannot fail to remind the reader of a celebrated passage in 'As you like it.'

—The lean and slipper'd Pantaloon, With spectacles on nose—

where he adds, Shakespeare alludes to this personage introduced in his own time. Can we doubt that this Pantaloon had come from the Italian theatre, after what we have already said? Does not this confirm the conjecture, that there existed an intercourse between the Italian theatre and our own? Further, Tarleton the comedian, and Flan, celebrated for their 'extemporal wit,' was the actor or inventor of one of these 'Platts.' Stowe records

These researches on the Pantomimic Characters, and the pantomime Comedies, were made many years ago; and excited a single mention of the former in Mr. Pinkerton's Letters to a Friend, where these subjects appeared untouched by our own pen. Archibald has lately thrown in my way 'An Historical and Critical Essay on the Revival of the Drama in Italy,' by J. C. Walker, 1834. The reader will there find some researches on these subjects; we could not fall so easily of drawing from the same fountain; but as my object was more particular, his labours have not anticipated mine.

I refer the reader to Stevens's edition, 1793, vol. II, p. 406, to the sight of these literary curiosities.

of one of our actors that 'he had a quick, delicate, refined, extemporal wit.' And of another that 'he had a wondrous, plentiful, pleasant, extemporal wit. These actors then, who were in the habit of exercising their impromptu, resemble those who performed in the unwritten comedies of the Italians. Gabriel Harvey, the Aristarchus of the day, compliments Tarleton for having brought forward a new species of dramatic exhibition. If this compliment paid to Tarleton merely alludes to his dexterity at extemporaneous wit in the character of the clown, as my friend Mr Douce thinks, this would be sufficient to show that he was attempting to introduce on our stage the extempore comedy of the Italians; which Gabriel Harvey distinguishes as 'a new species.' As for these 'Platts,' which I shall now venture to call 'Scenarios,' they surprise by their bareness, conveying no notion of the piece itself, though quite sufficient for the actors. They consist of mere exits and entrances of the actors, and often the real names of the actors are familiarly mixed with those of the dramatis personæ. Stevens has justly observed however on these skeletons, that although 'the drift of these dramatic pieces cannot be collected from the mere outlines before us, yet we must not charge them with absurdity. Even the scenes of Shakespeare would have worn as unpromising an aspect, had their skeletons only been discovered.' The painted scenarios of the Italian theatre were not more intelligible; exhibiting only the hints for scenes.

Thus, I think, we have sufficient evidence of an intercourse subsisting between the English and Italian theatres, not hitherto suspected; and I find an allusion to these Italian pantomimes, by the great town wit Tom Nash, in his 'Pierce Penniless,' which shows that he was well acquainted with their nature. He indeed exults over them, observing that our plays are 'honourable and full of gallant resolution, not consisting, like theirs, of pantaloon, a zany, and a w—e, (alluding to the women actors of the Italian stage);* but of emperors, kings, and princes.' But my conviction is still confirmed, when I find that Stephen Gosson wrote 'the comedie of captain Mario'; it has not been printed, but 'Captain Mario' is one of the Italian characters.

Even at a later period, the influence of these performances reached the greatest name in the English Pantheon. One of the great actors and authors of these pieces, who published eighteen of these irregular productions, was Andreini, whose name must have the honour of being associated with Milton's, for it was his comedy or opera which threw the first spark of the Paradise Lost into the soul of the epic poet—a circumstance which will hardly be questioned by those who have examined the different schemes and allegorical personages of the first projected drama of Paradise Lost: nor was Andreini, as well as many others of this race of Italian dramatists, inferior poets. The Adorno of Andreini was a personage sufficiently original and poetical to serve as the model of the Adam of Milton. The youthful English poet, at its representation, carried it away in his mind. Wit indeed is a great traveller: and thus also the 'Empiric of Massinger' might have reached us, from the Belongese 'Dottore.'

The late Mr Hole, the ingenious writer on the Arabian Nights, observed to me that Molière it must be presumed never read Fletcher's plays, yet his 'Bourgeois gentilhomme' and the other's 'Noble Gentleman' bear in some instances a great resemblance. They possibly may have drawn from the same Italian source of comedy which I have here indicated.

SONGS OF TRADES, OR SONGS FOR THE PEOPLE.

Men of genius have devoted some of their hours, and even governments have occasionally assisted, to render the people happier by song and dance. The Grecians had songs appropriated to the various trades. Songs of this nature would shorten the manufacturer's tedious task-work, and solace the artisan at his solitary occupation. A beam of gay fancy kindling his mind, a playful change of measures delighting his ear, even a moralising verse to cherish his better feelings—these ingeniously adapted to ease profession, and some to the display of patriotic characters and national events, would contribute something to public happiness. Such themes are worthy of a patriotic bard, of the Southey's for their hearts, and the Moors for their verse.

Fletcher of Saltoun said, 'If a man were permitted to

* Women were first introduced on the Italian stage about 1550—it was therefore an extraordinary novelty in Nash's time make all the ballads, he need not care who should make all the laws of a nation.' The character of a people is long preserved in their national songs. 'God save the king' and 'Rule Britannia' are, and I hope will long be, our English national airs.

'The story of Amphion building Thebes with his lyre was not a fable,' says Dr. Clarke. 'At Thebes, in the harmonious adjustment of those masses which remain belonging to the ancient walls, we saw enough to convince us that this story was no fable; for it was a very ancient custom to carry on immense labour by an accompaniment of music and singing. The custom still exists both in Egypt and Greece. It might, therefore, be said that the Walls of Thebes were built at the sound of the only musical instrument then in use; because, according to the custom of the country, the lyre was necessary for the accomplishment of the work.'

Athenæus has preserved the Greek names of different songs as sung by various trades, but unfortunately none of the songs themselves. There was a song for the corn-grinders; another for the workers in wool; another for the weavers. The reapers had their carol; the herdsmen had a song which an ox-driver of Sicily had composed: the kneaders; and the bathers, and the galley-rowers, were not without their chant. We have ourselves a song of the weavers, which Ritson has preserved in his 'Ancient Songs'; and it may be found in the popular chap-book of 'The Life of Jack of Newbury'; and the songs of anglers, of old Isaac Walton, and Charles Cotton, still retain their freshness.

Mr Heber has beautifully observed, in his Bampton Lectures, that among the Greeks the hymn which placed Harmonius in the green and flowery island of the Blessed was chanted by the potter to his wheel, and enlivened the labours of the Pirean mariner.

Dr Johnson is the only writer I recollect who has noticed something of this nature which he observed in the Highlands. 'The strokes of the sickle were timed by the modulation of the harvest song, in which all their voices were united. They accompany every action which can be done in equal time with an appropriate strain, which has, they say, not much meaning, but its effects are regularity and cheerfulness. There is an oar-song used by the Hebrideans.'

But if these chants 'have not much meaning,' they will not produce the desired effect of touching the heart, as well as giving vigor to the arm of the labourer. The gondoliers of Venice while away their long midnight hours on the water with the stanzas of Tasso. Fragments of Homer are sung by the Greek sailors of the Archipelago; the severe labour of the trackers, in China, is accompanied with a song which encourages their exertions, and renders these simultaneous. Mr Ellis mentions, that the sight of the lofty pagoda of Tong-chow served as a great topic of incitement in the song of the trackers toiling against the stream, to their place of rest. The canoe-men, on the Gold Coast, in a very dangerous passage, 'on the back of a high-curling wave, paddling with all their might, singing or rather shouting their wild song, follow it up,' says M'Leod, who was a lively witness of this happy combination of song, of labour, and of peril, which he acknowledges was 'a very terrific process.' Our sailors at Newcastle, in heaving their anchors, have their 'Heave, and ho! rum-below!' but the Sicilian mariners must be more deeply affected by their beautiful hymn to the Virgin! A society instituted in Holland for general good do not consider among their least useful projects that of having printed at a low price a collection of songs for sailors.

It is extremely pleasing, as it is true, to notice the honest exultation of an excellent ballad-writer, C. Dibdin, who in his professional Life, p. 8, writes—'I have learnt my songs have been considered as an object of national consequence; that they have been the solace of sailors and long voyagers, in storms, in battle; and that they have been quoted in mutinies, to the restoration of order and discipline.' It is recorded of the Portuguese soldiery in Ceylon, at the siege of Colombo, when pressed with misery and pangs of hunger, that they derived, during their marches, not only consolation, but also encouragement, by rehearsing the stanzas of the Lusiad.

We ourselves have been a great ballad nation, and once abounded with songs of the people; not, however, of particular species, but rather of narrative poems. They are described by Puttenham, a critic in the reign of Elizabeth, as 'small and popular songs, sung by those called banqui, upon benches and barrels' heads, where they had no other audience than boys, or country fellows that play by them in the streets; or else by blind harpers, or as like tavern-minstrels, that give a fit of mirth for a groat. Such were these 'Relics of ancient English Poetry' which Selden collected, Pepys preserved, and Percy published. Ritson, our great poetical antiquary in this sort of things, says, that few are older than the reign of James I. The more ancient songs of the people perished, having been printed in single sheets, and their hand-purchasers having no other library to preserve them in, the walls on which they pasted them. Those who consist of a succeeding race of ballads, chiefly revived and written by Richard Johnson, the author of the well-known romance of the Seven Champions, and Delony, the wife of Jack of Newbury's Life, and the 'Gentle Craft,' who lived in the time of James and Charles. One Martin Parker was a most notorious ballad-scribbler in the reigns of Charles I, and the Protector.

These writers, in their old age, collected their songs into little penny books, called 'Garlands,' some of which have been re-published by Ritson; and a recent edit has well described them as 'humble and amusing village strains, founded upon the squabbles of a wake, tales of untruly love, superstitious rumours, or miraculous traditions of the hamlet.' They enter into the picture of a manners, as well as folio chronicles.

These songs abounded in the good old times of Elizabeth and James; for Hall in his Satires notices them as 'Sung to the wheel, and sung unto the payle;

That is, sung by maidens spinning, or milking; and indeed Shakespeare had described them as 'old and plain chanted by

'The spinsters and the knitters in the sun,
And the free maids that weave their thread with bones.'

Twelfth Night

They were the favourites of the Poet of Nature, who takes every opportunity to introduce them into the mouths of his clown, his fool, and his intemperate Autolycus. When the late Dr Burney, who had probably not the slightest conception of their nature, and perhaps as little taste for their rude and wild simplicity, ventured to call the songs of Autolycus, 'two nonsensical songs,' the musician called down on himself one of the bitterest notes from Steevens the ever commentator penned against a profane scoffer.*

Whatever these songs were, it is evident they formed a source of recreation to the solitary task-worker. But as the more masculine trades had their own songs, whose titles only appear to have reached us, such as 'The Carman's Whistle,' 'Watkin's Ale,' 'Chopping Knives,' &c. they were probably appropriated to the respective trades they indicate. The tune of the 'Carman's Whistle' was composed by Bird, and the favourite tune of 'Queen Elizabeth,' may be found in the collection called 'Queen Elizabeth's Virginal Book.' One who has lately heard it played says, that 'it has more gusto than the other extant compositions in her Majesty's book, something resembling a French quadrille.'

The feeling our present researches would excite would naturally be most strongly felt in small communities, where the interest of the governors is to contribute to the individual happiness of the laborious classes. The Helvetic society requested Lavater to compose the Schweizerlieder, or Swiss Songs, which are now sung by the youth of many of the cantons; and various Swiss poets have successfully composed on national subjects, associated with their best feelings. In such paternal governments as was that of Florence under the Medici, we find that songs and dances for the people, engaged the muse of Lorenzo, who condescended to delight them with pleasant songs composed in a popular language; the example of such a character was followed by the men of genius of the age. These

* Dr. Burney subsequently observed, that 'this rogue Autolycus is the true ancient Minstrel in the old Fabliaux; as which Steevens remarks, "Many will push the comparison a little further, and concur with me in thinking that our modern minstrels of the opera, like their predecessor Autolycus, are pickpockets as well as singers of nonsensical ballads." Steevens' Shakespeare, vol. VII, p. 167, 4th edition, 1773.

best songs, often adapted to the different trades, opened in of invention in the new characters, and allusions, humorous equivocations, and sometimes with the licence of the popular fancy. They were collected in 1559, for the title of 'Canti Carnascialeschi,' and there is a 2nd edition, in 1750, in two volumes quarto. Mr Roscoe and Mr Guinguene,† have given a pleasing account of these songs. It is said they sing to this day a popular song by Lorenzo, beginning

'Ben venga Maggio
E'l gonfalon selvaggio,'‡

which has all the florid brilliancy of an Italian spring. The most delightful songs of this nature would naturally find among a people whose climate and whose labours inspire a general hilarity; and the vineyards of France have produced a class of songs, of excessive gaiety and merriment, called Chansons de Vendange. A most interesting account of these songs may be found in Le Grand Amoncy's Histoire de la Vie privée des Français. 'The men and women, each with a basket on their arm, assemble at the foot of the hill; there stopping, they arrange themselves in a circle. The chief of this band tunes up a joyous song, whose burden is chorused: then they assemble, and disperse in the vineyard, they work without interrupting their tasks, while new couplets often resound in the ears of the vine-dressers; sometimes intermixed with sudden jest at a traveller. In the evening, their supper nearly over, their joy recommences, they dance in a circle, and sing some of those songs of free gaiety, which the most excursions, known by the name of vineyard songs.—The gaiety becomes general; masters, guests, friends, servants, all dance together; and in this manner a day of their terminates, which one might mistake for a day of diversion. It is what I have witnessed in Champagne, a land of vines, far different from the country where the labours of the harvest form so painful a contrast.'

The extinction of those songs which formerly kept alive in the gaiety of the domestic circle, whose burdens were always sung in chorus, is lamented by the French antiquary. 'Our fathers had a custom to amuse themselves at the desert of a feast by a joyous song of this nature.—Each in his turn sung,—all chorused.' This ancient gaiety was sometimes gross and noisy; but he prefers it to the tame decency of our times—these smiling, not laughing days of Lord Chesterfield.

'On ne rit plus, on sourit aujourd'hui;
Et nos plaisirs sont voisins de l'ennui.'

Few men of letters have not read the collections which have been made of these charming Chansonnets, to which French poetry owes a great share of its fame among foreigners. These treasures of wit and gaiety, which for such a length of time have been in the mouths of all Frenchmen, now forgotten, are buried in the dust of libraries. These are the old French Vaudevilles, formerly sung at meals by the company. The celebrated Count de Brumout is mentioned by Hamilton as being

Agreeable et vif en propos;
Célèbre diseur de bon mots;
Recueil vivant d'antiques Vaudevilles.

These Vaudevilles were originally invented by a fuller of Vau de Vire, or the valley by the river Vire, and were sung by his men to amuse themselves as they spread their cloths on the banks of the river. They were songs composed on some incident or adventure of the day. At first these gay playful effusions were called the songs of Vau de Vire, till they became known as Vaudevilles. Boileau has well described them:

La liberté Française en ses vers se déploie;
Cet enfant de plaisir veut naître dans la joie.

It is well known how the attempt ended, of James I and his unfortunate son, by the publication of their 'Book of Sports,' to preserve the national character from the gloom of fanatical Puritanism; among its unhappy effects, there was however one not a little ludicrous. The Puritans, offended by the gaudiest forms of mirth, and every day becoming more sullen, were so shocked at the simple merriment of the people, that they contrived to parody these songs into spiritual ones; and Shakespeare speaks of the Puritan of his day, 'singing psalms to horripiles.' As Puritans are the same in all times, the Methodists in our own repeated the foolery, and set their hymns to popular tunes and jigs, which one of them said were 'too good for the devil.' They have sung hymns to the air of 'The beds of sweet roses,' &c. And as there have been Puritans among other people as well as our own, the same occurrence took place both in Italy and France. In Italy, the Carnival songs were turned into pious hymns; the hymn Jesu fammi morire, is sung to the music of Vaga bella e gentile—Crucifisso a capo chino to that of Una donna d'amor fno, one of the most indecent pieces in the Canzoni a ballo; and the hymn, beginning was sung to the gay tune of Lorenzo de Medici,

'Ecco'l Messia
E la Madre Maria,

'Ben venga Maggio,
E'l Gonfalon selvaggio.'

Athenaeus notices what we call slang or flash songs. He tells us, that there were poets who composed songs in the dialect of the mob; and who succeeded in this kind of poetry, adapted to their various characters. The French call such songs Chansons a la Vau and have frequently composed them with a ludicrous effect, when the style of the Poissardes is applied to the gravest matters of state, and conveys the popular feelings in the language of the populace. This sort of satirical song is happily defined in a playful didactic poem on La Vaudeville,

'Il est l'esprit de ceux qui n'en ont pas.'

Athenaeus has also preserved songs, sung by petitioners who went about on holidays to collect alms. A friend of mine, with taste and learning, has discovered in his researches, 'The Crow Song,' and 'The Swallow Song,' and has transfused their spirit in a happy version. I preserve a few striking ideas.

The Collectors for 'The Crow' song:

'My good worthy masters, a pittance bestow,
Some oatmeal, or barley, or wheat for the Crow.
A loaf, or a penny, or e'en what you will—
From the poor man, a grain of his salt may suffice,
For your Crow swallows all, and is not over-nice.
And the man who can now give his grain, and no more,
May another day give from a plentiful store.—
Come my lad to the door, Plutus nods to our wish;
And our sweet little mistress comes out with a dish;
She gives us her figs, and she gives us a smile—
Heaven send her a husband!—
And a boy to be danced on his grandfather's knee,
And a girl like herself all the joy of her mother,
Who may one day present her wish just such another.
Thus we carry our Crow-song to door after door,
Alternately chanting, we ramble along,
And we treat all who give, or give not, with a song.'

Swallow-singing, or Chelidionising, as the Greek term is, was another method of collecting eleemosynary gifts, which took place in the month Boedromion, or August.

'The Swallow, the Swallow is here,
With his back so black, and his belly so white,
He brings on the pride of the year,
With the gay months of love, and the days of delight.
Come bring out your good humming stuff;
Of the nice tit-bits let the Swallow partake;
And a slice of the right Boedromion cake.
So give, and give quickly,—
Or we'll pull down the door from its hinges;
Or we'll steal young madam away!
But see! we're a merry boy's party,
And the Swallow, the Swallow, is here!'

These songs resemble those of our own ancient mummings, who to this day in honour of Bishop Blaize, the Saint of Wool-combers, go about chanting on the eve of their holidays. A custom long existing in this country to elect a Boy-Bishop in almost every parish; the Montons at Eaton still prevails; and there is a closer connexion perhaps between the custom which produced the 'Song of the Crow and the Swallow,' and our Northern mummeries, than may be at first suspected. The Pagan Saturnalia, which the Swallow song by its pleasant menaces resembles, were afterwards disguised in the forms adopted by the early Christians; and such are the remains of the Roman Catholic Religion, in which the people were long indulged in their old taste for mockery and mummery. I must add in connexion with our main inquiry, that our own ancient beggars had their songs, some of which are as old as the Elizabethan period, and many are fancifully characteristic of their habits and their feelings.

INTRODUCERS OF EXOTIC FLOWERS, FRUITS, ETC.

There has been a class of men whose patriotic affection, or whose general benevolence, have been usually defrauded of the gratitude their country owes them: these have been the introducers of new flowers, new plants, and new roots into Europe; the greater part which we now enjoy was drawn from the luxuriant climates of Asia, and the profusion which now covers our land originated in the most anxious nursing, and were the gifts of individuals. Monuments are reared, and medals struck, to commemorate events and names, which are less deserving our regard than those who have transplanted into the colder gardens of the North the rich fruits, the beautiful flowers, and the succulent pulse and roots of more favoured spots; and carrying into their own country, as it were, another Nature, they have, as old Gerard well expresses it, 'laboured with the soil to make it fit for the plants, and with the plants to make them delight in the soil.'

There is no part of the characters of Peiresc and Evelyn, accomplished as they are in so many, which seems more delightful to me, than their enthusiasm for the garden, the orchard, and the forest.

Peiresc, whose literary occupations admitted of no interruption, and whose universal correspondence throughout the habitable globe was more than sufficient to absorb his studious life, yet was he the first man, as Gasendus relates in his interesting manner, whose incessant inquiries procured the great variety of jessamines; those from China whose leaves, always green, bear a clay-coloured flower, and a delicate perfume; the American, with a crimson-coloured, and the Persian, with a violet-coloured flower; and the Arabian, whose tendrils he delighted to train over 'the banqueting-house in his garden'; and of fruits, the orange trees with a red and parti-coloured flower; the medlar; the rough cherry without stone; the rare and luxurious vines of Smyrna and Damascus; and the fig-tree called Adam's, whose fruit by its size was supposed to be that with which the spies returned from the land of Canaan. Gasendus describes his transports when Peiresc beheld the Indian ginger growing green in his garden, and his delight in grafting the myrtle on the musk vine, that the experiment might show us the myrtle wine of the ancients. But transplanters, like other inventors, are sometimes baffled in their delightful enterprise; and we are told of Peiresc's deep regret when he found that the Indian cocoa nut would only bud, and then perish in the cold air of France, while the leaves of the Egyptian papyrus refused to yield him their vegetable paper. But it was his garden which propagated the exotic fruits and flowers, which he transplanted into the French king's, and into cardinal Barbernie's, and the curious in Europe; and these occasioned a work on the manuring of flowers by Ferrarius, a botanical Jesuit, who there described these novelties to Europe.

Had Evelyn only composed the great work of his 'Sylvæ' or a discourse of Forest Trees, &c, his name would have excited the gratitude of posterity. The voice of the patriot exults in the dedication to Charles II, prefixed to one of the latter editions. 'I need not acquaint your majesty, how many millions of timber-trees, besides infinite others, have been propagated and planted throughout your vast dominions, at the instigation and by the sole direction of this work, because your majesty has been pleased to own it publicly for my encouragement.' And surely while Britain retains her awful situation among the nations of Europe, the 'Sylvæ' of Evelyn will endure with her triumphant oaks. It was a retired philosopher who aroused the genius of the nation, and who casting a prophetic eye towards the age in which we live, has contributed to secure our sovereignty of the seas. The present navy of Great Britain has been constructed with the oaks which the genius of Evelyn planted!

Animated by a zeal truly patriotic, de Serres in France 1599, composed a work on the art of raising silk-worms, and dedicated it to the municipal body of Paris, to excite the inhabitants to cultivate mulberry-trees. The work at first produced a strong sensation, and many planted mulberry-trees in the vicinity of Paris; but as they were yet used to raise and manage the silk-worm, they resented nothing but their trouble for their pains. They tore up mulberry-trees they had planted, and, in spite of De Serres, asserted that the northern climate was not adapted to the rearing of that tender insect. The great Sully, from his hatred of all objects of luxury, countenanced the popular clamour, and crushed the rising enterprise of De Serres. The monarch was wiser than the minister. The book had made sufficient noise to reach the ear of Henry IV; who desired the author to draw up a memoir on the subject, from which the king was induced to plant mulberry-trees in all the royal gardens; and having imported the eggs of silk-worms from Spain, this patriotic monarch gave up his orange-trees, which were but his private gratifications, for that leaf which, converted into silk, became part of the national wealth. It is to De Serres, who introduced the plantations of mulberry-trees, that the commerce of France owes one of her staple commodities; and though the patriot encountered the hostility of the prime minister, and the hasty prejudices of the populace in his own day, yet his name at this moment is fresh in the hearts of his fellow-citizens; for I have just received a medal the gift of a literary friend from Paris which bears his portrait, with the reverse, 'Société d'Agriculture du Département de la Seine.' It was struck in 1807. The same honour is the right of Evelyn from the British nation.

There was a period when the spirit of plantation was prevalent in this kingdom; it probably originated from the ravages of the soldiery during the civil wars. A man whose retired modesty has perhaps obscured his claims on our regard, the intimate friend of the great spirits of that age, by birth a Pole, but whose mother had probably been an English woman, Samuel Hartlib, to whom Milton addressed his tract on education, published every manuscript he collected on the subjects of horticulture and agriculture. The public good he effected attracted the notice of Cromwell, who rewarded him with a pension, which after the restoration of Charles II was suffered to lapse, and Hartlib died in utter neglect and poverty. One of his tracts is, 'A design for plenty by an universal planting of fruit-trees.' The project consisted in enclosing the waste lands and commons, and appointing officers, whom he called fruiterers, or wood-wards, to see the plantations were attended to. The writer of this project observes on fruit that it is a sort of provisions so natural to the taste, that the poor man and even the child will prefer it before better food, 'as the story goeth,' which he has preserved in these ancient and simple lines.

'The poor man's child invited was to dine,
With flesh of oxen, sheep, and fatted swine,
(Far better cheer than he at home could find,)
And yet this child to stay had little mind.
You have, quoth he, no apple, fruit, nor pie,
Stewed pears, with bread and milk, and walnuts by.'

The enthusiasm of these transplanters inspired the labours. They have watched the tender infant of the planting, till the leaf and the flowers and the fruit expanded under their hand; often indeed they have even ameliorated the quality, increased the size, and even created a new species. The apricot, drawn from America, was first known in Europe in the sixteenth century: an old French writer has remarked, that it was originally not larger than a damson; our gardeners, he says, have improved it to the perfection of its present size and richness. One of these enthusiasts is noticed by Evelyn, who for forty years had in vain tried by a graft to bequeath his name to a new fruit; but persisting on wrong principles, this votary of Pomona had died without a name. We sympathize with Sir William Temple when he exultingly acquaints us with the size of his orange-trees, and with the flavour of his peaches and grapes, confessed by Frenchmen to have equalled those of Fontainebleau and Gascony, while the Italians agreed that his white figs were as good as any of that sort in Italy, and of his 'having had the honour to naturalize in this country four kinds of grapes, with his liberal distribution of cuttings from them, because 'he ever thought all things of this kind the commoner they are the better.'

The greater number of our exotic flowers and fruits were carefully transported into this country by many of our travelled nobility and gentry; some names have been casually preserved. The learned Linacre first brought, at his return from Italy, the damask-rose; and Thomas Lord Cromwell, in the reign of Henry VIII, enriched our fruit gardens with three different plums. In the reign of El-

Edward Grindal, afterwards archbishop of Canterbury, returning from exile, transported here the mediant of the tamarisk: the first oranges appear to have been brought into England by one of the Carews for a century after, they still flourished at the farm at Heddington, in Surrey. The cherry orchards were first planted about Sittingbourne, by a gardener of Henry VIII: and the currant-bush was transplanted when our commerce with the island of Zante was opened in the same reign. The elder Tradescant entered himself on board of a privateer, armed against the Spaniards, with a view of finding an opportunity of bringing apricots into Britain: and it appears that he succeeded in his design. To Sir Walter Rawleigh we have been indebted solely for the luxury of the tobacco-plant, that infinitely useful root, which forms a part of our meal, and often the entire meal of the poor man: tobacco, which deserved to have been called a Rosin.

Sir Anthony Ashley first planted cabbages in this country, and a cabbage at his feet appears on his monument. Sir Richard Weston first brought clover grass into England from Flanders, in 1645; and the figs planted by John Pole at Lambeth, so far back as the reign of Henry VIII, are said to be still remaining there: nor is it surprising, for Spilman, who set up the first paper-mill in England, at Dartford, in 1590, is said to have brought with him portmanteau the two first lime trees, which he planted here, and which are still growing. The Lombardy mulberry was introduced into England by the Earl of Rochford in 1758. The first mulberry trees in this country are standing at Sion-house.* By an Harleian ms. it is stated that the first general planting of mulberries for the making of silk in England was by William Stallenger, broker of the custom house, and Monsieur Verton, 1688. It is probable that Monsieur Verton, translated this novelty from his own country, where we have seen De Serres's great attempt. Here the mulberries succeeded better than the silk-worms.

The very names of many of our vegetable kingdom import their locality: from the majestic cedar of Lebanon, the small Cose-lettuce, which came from the isle of Cos; berries from Cerasuntia, a city of Pontus; the peach, Persicum, or mala Persica, Persian apples, from Persia; pistachio, or pistacia, is the Syrian word for that.

The chestnut, or chataigne, in French, and castagna in Italian, from Castagna, a town of Magnesia. Our plums chiefly from Syria and Damascus, the damson, Urtica plum, gives us a recollection of its distant birth.

It is somewhat curious to observe on this subject, that it exists an unsuspected intercourse between nations, a propagation of exotic plants, &c. Lucullus, after his return with Mithridates, introduced cherries from Pontus into Italy; and the newly imported fruit was found so good that it was rapidly propagated, and six and twenty years afterwards, as Pliny testifies, the cherry tree passed into Britain.† Thus a victory obtained by a Roman led over a king of Pontus, with which it would seem Britain could have no concern, was the real occasion of our countrymen possessing cherry orchards. Yet to suppose that it be told, that these cherries from the city of Pontus are not the cherries we now eat; for the whole race of cherry-trees was a Saxon period, and was only restored by the gardener of Henry VIII, who brought them from Flanders—just a word to enhance his own merits, concerning the Mithridaticum!

The calculating political economist will little sympathize with the peaceful triumphs of those active and generous men, who have thus propagated the truest wealth, and the most innocent luxuries of the people. The project of a tax, or an additional consumption of ardent spirits, or a act of parliament to put a convenient stop to popery, by forbidding the banes of some unhappy couple, will be more congenial to their researches; and they will leave without regret the names of those, whom we should owe to the grateful recollections of their country. The Romans, who with all their errors were at least polite, entertained very different notions of these introductions into their country of exotic fruits and flowers. Sir

The reader may find more dates amassed respecting the introduction of fruits, &c., in Gough's British Topography, p. 123, Harl. M.S. 6864. Pliny, Nat. Hist. Lib. xv, c. 26.

William Temple has elegantly noticed the fact. 'The great captains, and even consular men, who first brought them over, took pride in giving them their own names, by which they ran a great while in Rome, as in memory of some great service or pleasure they had done their country; so that not only laws and battles, but several sorts of apples and pears were called Manlian and Claudian, Pompeian and Tiberian, and by several other such noble names.' Pliny has paid his tribute of applause to Lucullus, for bringing cherry and nut trees from Pontus into Italy. And we have several modern instances, where the name of the transplanter, or rearer, has been preserved in this sort of creation. Peter Collinson, the botanist, to 'whom the English gardens are indebted for many new and curious species which he acquired by means of an extensive correspondence in America,' was highly gratified when Linnaeus baptised a plant with his name; and with great spirit asserts his honourable claim: 'Something, I think, was due to me for the great number of plants and seeds I have annually procured from abroad, and you have been so good as to pay it, by giving me a species of eternity, botanically speaking; that is, a name as long as men and books endure.' Such is the true animating language of these patriotic enthusiasts!

Some lines at the close of Peacham's Emblems give an idea of an English fruit garden in 1612. He mentions that cherries were not long known, and gives an origin to the name of filbert.

'The Persian Peach, and fruitful Quince;
And there the forward Almond grew,
With cherries knowne no long time since;
The Winter Warden, orchard's pride;
The Philibert that loves the vale,
And red queen-apple; so envide
Of school-boys, passing by the pale.'

USURERS OF THE SEVENTEENTH CENTURY.

A person whose history will serve as a canvass to exhibit some scenes of the arts of the money-trader was one AUDLEY, a lawyer, and a great practical philosopher, who concentrated his vigorous faculties in the science of the relative value of Money. He flourished through the reigns of James I, Charles I, and held a lucrative office in the 'court of wards,' till that singular court was abolished at the time of the restoration. In his own times he was called 'The great Audley,' an epithet so often abused, and here applied to the creation of enormous wealth. But there are minds of great capacity, concealed by the nature of their pursuits; and the wealth of Audley may be considered as the cloudy medium through which a bright genius shone, of which, had it been thrown into a nobler sphere of action, the 'greatness' would have been less ambiguous.

Audley lived at a time when divines were proclaiming 'the detestable sin of Usury,' prohibited by God and man; but the Mosaic prohibition was the municipal law of an agricultural commonwealth, which being without trade, the general poverty of its members could afford no interest for loans; but it was not forbidden the Israelite to take usury from 'the stranger.' Or they were quoting from the fathers, who understood this point, as they had that of 'original sin,' and 'the immaculate conception,' while the scholastics amused themselves with a quaint and collegiate fancy which they had picked up in Aristotle.

* The quince comes from Sydon, a town of Crete, we are told by Le Grand, in his Vie privée des Français, vol. I, p. 143; where may be found a list of the origin of most of our fruits.

† Peacham has here given a note. 'The filbert, so named of Philibert, a king of France, who caused by art sundry kinds to be brought forth: as did a gardener of Oranto in Italy by clove-gilliflowers, and carnations of such colours as we now see them.'

‡ The queen-apple was probably thus distinguished in compliment to Elizabeth. In Moffet's 'Health's Improvement,' I find an account of apples which are said to have been 'grafted upon a mulberry-stock, and then was thorough red as our queen apples, called by Ruellius, Rubellina, and Claudiana by Pliny.' I am told the race is not extinct; an apple of this description is yet to be found.

§ I find this Audley noticed in the curious obituary of the great book-collector Richard Smith. '1602, Nov. 16, died Mr. Hugh Audley, sometime of the court of wards, infinitely rich.' Peck's Dead. Cur. II, p. 542. And some memoirs in a very rare quarto tract, entitled 'The way to be rich, according to the practice of the great Audley, who began with two hundred pounds in the year 1606, and died worth four hundred thousand 1602.'

that interest for money had been forbidden by nature, because coin in itself was barren and unpropagating, unlike corn, of which every grain will produce many. But Audley considered no doubt that money was not incapable of multiplying itself provided it was in hands who knew to make it grow and 'breed,' as Shylock affirmed. The lawyers then however did not agree with the divines, nor the college-philosophers; they were straining at a more liberal interpretation of this odious term 'Usury.' Lord Bacon declared, that the suppression of Usury is only fit for an Utopian government; and Audley must have agreed with the learned Cowell, who in his 'Interpreter' derives the term ab usu et ere, quasi usu ere, which in our vernacular style was corrupted into Usury. Whatever the us might be in the eyes of some, it had become at least a contraersarial sin, as Sir Symonds D'Ewes calls it, in his manuscript Diary, who however was afraid to commit it.* Audley, no doubt, considered that interest was nothing more than rent for money; as rent was no better than Usury for land. The legal interest was then 'ten in the hundred'; but the thirty, the fifty, and the hundred for the hundred, the gripe of Usury, and the shameless contrivances of the money-traders, these he would attribute to the follies of others, or to his own genius.

This sage on the wealth of nations, with his pithy wisdom, and quaint sagacity, began with two hundred pounds, and lived to view his mortgages, his statutes, and his judgments so numerous, that it was observed, his papers would have made a good map of England. A contemporary dramatist, who copied from life, has opened the chamber of such an Usurer,—perhaps of our Audley.

—Here lay

A manor bound fast in a skin of parchment,
The wax continuing hard, the acres melting;
Here a sure deed of gift for a market-town,
If not redeem'd this day, which is not in
The unthrifty's power; there being scarce one shire
In Wales or England, where my monies are not Lent out at usury, the certain hook
To draw in more.—Massinger's City Madam.

This genius of thirty per-cent first had proved the decided vigour of his mind, by his enthusiastic devotion to his law studies; deprived of the leisure for study through his busy day, he stole the hours from his late nights and his early mornings; and without the means to procure a law-library, he invented a method to possess one without the cost; as fast as he learned, he taught, and by publishing some useful tracts on temporary occasions, he was enabled to purchase a library. He appears never to have read a book without its furnishing him some new practical design, and he probably studied too much for his own particular advantage. Such devoted studies was the way to become a lord chancellor; but the science of the law was here subordinate to that of a money-trader.

When yet but a clerk to the Clerk in the Counter, frequent opportunities occurred which Audley knew how to improve. He became a money-trader as he had become a law-writer, and the fears and follies of mankind were to furnish him with a trading capital. The fertility of his genius appeared in expedients and in quick contrivances. He was sure to be the friend of all men falling out. He took a deep concern in the affairs of his master's clients, and often much more than they were aware of. No man so ready at procuring bail or compounding debts. This was a considerable traffic then, as now. They hired themselves out for bail, swore what was required, and contrived to give false addresses. It seems they dressed themselves out for the occasion: a great seal-ring flamed on the finger, which, however was pure copper gilt, and they often assumed the name of some person of good credit. Savings, and small presents for gratuitous opinions, † D'Ewes's father lost a manor, which was recovered by the widow of the person who had sold it to him. Old D'Ewes considered this loss as a punishment for the usurious loan of money; the fact is, that he had purchased that manor with the interests accumulating from the money lent on it. His son intreated him to give over 'the practice of that controversial sig.' This expression shows that even in that age there were rational political economists. Mr. Bentham, in his little treatise on Usury, has taken the just views, cleared from the indistinct and partial ones so long prevalent. Collier has an admirable Essay on Usury, vol. III. It is a curious notion of Lord Bacon's that he would have interest at a lower rate in the country than in trading towns, because the merchant is best able to afford the highest.

often afterwards discovered to be very fallacious enabled him to purchase annuities of easy landholders, their treble amount secured on their estates. The indent owners, or the careless heirs, were soon caught in the usurer's nets; and, after the receipt of a few years' annuity, by some latent quibble, or some irregularity in the payments, usually ended in Audley's obtaining treble forfeiture. He could at all times out-knave all. One of these incidents has been preserved. A draper, of no honest reputation, being arrested by a merchant's debt of 200*l*, Audley bought the debt at 40*l*, for which the draper immediately offered him 60*l*. But Audley not consent, unless the draper indulged a sudden whim of his own: this was a formal contract, that the draper pay within twenty years, upon twenty certain days, a doubled. A knave, in haste to sign, is no calculator, as the contemporary dramatist describes one of the of those citizens, one part of whose business was

'To swear and break: they all grow rich by breaking the draper eagerly compounded. He afterwards 'rich.' Audley, silently watching his victim, within years, claims his doubled pennies, every month of twenty months. The pennies had now grown up to pounds. The knave perceived the trick, and preferred paying the forfeiture of his bond for 500*l*, rather than to receive the portion of all the little generation of compound interest of last descendant of 2000*l*, which would have closed the draper's shop. The inventive genius of Audley has here illustrated that popular tract of his own times, 'Fam's 'Worth of a Penny,' a gentleman who, he scarcely one left, consoled himself by detailing the man's comforts of life it might procure in the days of Charles

Such petty enterprises at length assumed a deeper of interest. He formed temporary partnerships with stewards of country gentlemen. They undertook of which they had to manage; and, anticipating the necessities, the estates in due time became cheap paid for Audley and the stewards. He usually contrived to make the wood pay for the land, which he called 'the feathers pay for the goose.' He had, however, a tenderness of conscience for his victim, that, having paid the live feathers before he sent the unfledged geese to the common, he would bestow a gratuitous lecture on his own science—teaching the art of making them again, by showing how to raise the remaining money. Audley thus made the tenant furnish at once the means to satisfy his own rapacity, and his employer's necessity. His avarice was not working by a blind, but on an extended principle; for he was only enabling the landholder to obtain what the tenant, with due industry, could afford to give. Adam Smith might have delivered himself in language of old Audley, so just was his standard of value of rents. 'Under an easy landlord,' said Audley, 'a tenant seldom thrives; contenting himself to make just measure of his rents, and not labouring for any surplusage of estate. Under a hard one, the tenant revenges himself upon the land, and runs away with the rent would raise my rents to the present price of all commodities; for if we should let our lands, as other men have before us, now other wares daily go on in price, we shall fall backward in our estates.' These axioms of political economy were discoveries in his day.

Audley knew mankind practically, and struck into his humours with the versatility of genius: oracularly, with the grave, he only stung the lighter mind. When the lord borrowing money complained to Audley of his extortion, his lordship exclaimed, 'What, do you not intend to use a conscience?' 'Yes, I intend hereafter to use one. We monied people must balance accounts; if you do not pay me, you cheat me; but, if you do, then I cheat your lordship.' Audley's monied conscience balanced that of his lordship's honour, against the probability of his rapacious profits. When he resided in the Temple and those 'pullets without feathers,' as an old writer described the brood, the good man would pulp out paternal benevolence on imprudent youth, grieving that they, under pretence of 'learning the law, only learnt to be lawless,' and knew by their own studies the process of an execution it was served on themselves. Nor could he fail in prophecy; for at the moment that the stoic was ending his ridicule, his agents were supplying them with certain means of verifying it; for, as it is quaintly said, he had been deceiving as well as his deceiving gentlemen.

The arts practised by the money-traders of that age have been detailed by one of the town-satirists of the her, in his 'English Villanies,' has told the story; we observe how an old story contains many incidents which may be discovered in a modern one. The article covering the usury by a pretended purchase and sale of him wares, even now practised, was then at its height.

'Measure for Measure' we find, here's young Master Rash, he's in for a commodity of brown paper and old ginger, nine score and seventeen pounds; which he made five marks ready money.

The eager 'gull,' for his immediate wants, takes at an honest price any goods on credit, which he immediately sells for less than half the cost; and when despatched, the vender and the purchaser have been the same man, and the 'brown paper and old ginger' merely nominal.

The whole displays a complete system of dupery, and the agents were graduated. The Manner of undoing gentlemen by taking up of Commodities, is the title of a play in 'English Villanies.' The 'warren' is the cant in which describes the whole party; but this requires a little explanation.

It is probable that rabbit-warrens were numerous about metropolises, a circumstance which must have multiplied teachers. Moffet, who wrote on diet in the reign of Elizabeth, notices their plentiful supply 'for the poor's subsistence.'—I cannot otherwise account for the appeals given to sharpers, and the terms of cheating being familiarly drawn from a rabbit-warren; not that even that day these cant terms travelled far out of their own time; for Robert Greene mentions a trial in which the law, good simple men, imagined that the coney-catcher was a warren, or one who had the care of a town.

The cant term of 'warren' included the young conies, half ruined prodigals of that day, with the younger heirs who had accomplished their ruin; these naturally fell together, as the pigeon and the black-leg of the present day. The coney-catchers were those who raised stakes on their necessities. To be 'coney-catched,' was to be cheated. The warren forms a combination altogether, to attract some novice, who in ease or in posse has present means good, and those to come great; he is glad to learn how money can be raised. The warren is after a tumbler;* and the nature of a London tumbler is 'to hunt dry-foot,' in this manner:—'The tumbler is let loose, and runs snuffing up and down in the shops, markets, goldsmiths, drapers, haberdashers, to meet a ferret, that is a citizen who is ready to sell a commodity. The tumbler in his first course usually returned disparaging, pretending to have out-wearied himself by hunting, and aware that the city ferrets are so cooped (that is, in their lips stitched up close) that he can't get them to do so great a sum as 500*l*., which the warren want. His herb being chewed down by the rabbit suckers, he kills their hearts. It irritates their appetite, and he teases him the tumbler, if he can't fasten on plate or pearls, or silks, to lay hold of brown paper, Bartholomew's, late strings, or hob nails. It hath been verily related,' says Decker, 'that one gentleman of great hopes took up 100*l* in bobby horses, and sold them for 30*l*.; and in points of mutton, and quarters of lamb, ready roasted sold them for three pounds.' Such commodities were sold purse-net.—The tumbler, on his second hunt, trots up and down again; at last lights on a ferret that will bite; the names are given in to a scrivener, who inquires whether they are good men, and finds four out of the five wind-shakers, but the fifth is an oak that can bear the name. Bonds are sealed, commodities delivered, and the tumbler fetches his second career; and their credit being obtained the purse-nets, the warren must now obtain money. The tumbler now hunts for the rabbit suckers, who buy these purse-nets; but the rabbit suckers, the greater devils than the ferrets, for they always bid dear; and after many exclamations the warren is glad the seller should repurchase his own commodities for his money, at thirty or fifty per cent under the cost. The tumbler does not finish till we come to the manner 'How the warren is spoiled.' I shall transcribe this part of the narrative in the lively style of this town-writer. 'While there is any grass to nibble upon, the rabbits are there; and the cold day of repayment, they retire into their holes; so that when the ferret makes account of five in chase, four disappear. Then he grows fierce, and tears open his own jaws to suck blood from him that is left. Sergeants, marshalsmen, and bailiffs, are sent forth, while he scenting at every corner, and with terrible paws haunts every walk. The bird is seized upon by these hawks, his estate looked into, his wings broken, his lands made over to a stranger. He pays 500*l*., who never had but 60*l*., or to prison; or he seals any bond, mortgages any lordship, does any thing, yields any thing. A little way in, he cares not how far he wades; the greater his possessions are, the apter he is to take up and to be trusted,—thus gentlemen are ferretted and undone! It is evident that the whole system turns on the single novice; those who join him in his bonds are stalking horses; the whole was to begin and to end with the single individual, the great coney of the warren. Such was the nature of those 'commodities,' to which Massinger and Shakspeare allude, and which the modern dramatist may exhibit in his comedy, and be still stretching after life.

Another scene, closely connected with the present, will complete the picture. The 'Ordinaries' of those days were the lounging places of the men of the town, and the 'fantastic gallants,' who herded together. Ordinaries were the 'exchange for news,' the echoing places for all sorts of town talk: there they might hear of the last new play and poem, and the last fresh widow, who was sighing for some knight to make her a lady; these resorts were attended also 'to save charges of house keeping.' The reign of James I is characterised by all the wantonness of prodigality among one class, and all the penuriousness and rapacity in another, which met in the dissolute indolence of a peace of twenty years. But a more striking feature in these 'Ordinaries' showed itself as soon as 'the voyder had cleared the table.' Then began 'the shuffling and cutting on one side, and the bones rattling on the other.' The 'Ordinarie,' in fact, was a gambling house, like those now expressively termed 'Hells,' and I doubt if the present 'Inferno' exceeded the whole diablesse of our ancestors.

In the former scene of sharpening they derived their cant terms from a rabbit-warren, but in the present, their allusions partly relate to an aviary, and truly the proverb suited them, of 'birds of a feather.' Those who first propose to sit down to play are called the leaders; the ruined gamblers are the forlorn hope; the great winner is the eagle; a stand-by, who encourages, but little ventures himself, the freshly-imported gallant, who is called the gull, is the woodpecker; and a monstrous bird of prey, who is always hovering round the table, is the gull-groper, who, at a pinch, is the benevolent Audley of the Ordinarie.

There was, besides, one other character of an original cast, apparently the friend of none of the party, and yet, in fact, 'the Atlas which supported the Ordinarie on his shoulders; he was sometimes significantly called the impostor.'

The gull is a young man whose father, a citizen or a squire, just dead, leaves him 'ten or twelve thousand pounds in ready money, besides some hundreds a year.' Scouts are sent out, and lie in ambush for him; they discover what 'apothecaries' shop he resorts to every morning, or in what tobacco shop in Fleet street he takes a pipe of smoke in the afternoon.* Some sharp wit of the Ordinarie, a pleasant fellow, whom Robert Greene calls 'the taker up,' one of universal conversation, lures the heir of seven hundred a year to 'The Ordinarie.' A gull sets the whole aviary in spirits; and Decker well describes the flutter of joy and expectation: 'The leaders maintained themselves brave; the forlorn hope, that drooped before, doth now gallantly come on; the eagle feathers his nest; the woodpecker picks up the crumbs; the gull-groper grows fat with good feeding; and the gull himself, at whom every one has a pull, hath in the end scarce feathers to keep his back warm.'

During the gull's progress through Primero and Gleek, he wants for no admirable advice and solemn warnings from two excellent friends; the gull groper, and at length, the impostor. The gull groper, who knows 'to half an acre,' all his means, takes the gull, when out of luck, to a side-window, and in a whisper talks of 'dice being made of women's bones, which would cozen any man;' but he pours his gold on the board; and a bond is rapturously signed for the next quarter-day. But the gull-groper, by a variety of expedients, avoids having the bond duly discharged; he contrives to get a judgment, and a sergeant with his mace procures the forfeiture of the bond; the treble value. But the 'impostor' has none of the milkiness of the 'gull-groper,'—he looks for no favour under heaven from any man; he is bluff with all the Ordinary; he spits at random; gingles his spurs into any man's cloak; and his 'humour is, to be a devil of a dare-all. All fear him as the tyrant they must obey. The tender gull trembles, and admires his valour. At length the devil he feared becomes his champion; and the poor gull, proud of his intimacy, hides himself under this eagle's wings.

The impostor sits close by his elbow, takes a partnership in his game, furnishes the stakes when out of luck, and in truth, does not care how fast the gull loses; for a twirl of his mustachio, a tip of his nose, or a wink of his eye, drives all the losses of the gull into the profits of the grand confederacy at the Ordinary. And when the impostor has fought the gull's quarrels many a time, at last he kicks up the table; and the gull sinks himself into the class of the forlorn-hope, he lives at the mercy of his late friends the gull-groper and the impostor, who send him out to lure some tender bird in feather.

Such were the hells of our ancestors, from which our worthies might take a lesson; and the 'warren' in which the Audleys were the conie-catchers.

But to return to our Audley; this philosophical usurer never pressed hard for his debts; like the fowler, he never shook his nets lest he might startle, satisfied to have them, without appearing to hold them. With great fondness he compared his 'bonds to infants, which battle best by sleeping.' To battle is to be nourished, a term still retained at the University of Oxford. His familiar companions were all subordinate actors in the great piece he was performing; he too had his part in the scene. When not taken by surprise, on his table usually lay open a great Bible, with Bishop Andrews's folio Sermons, which often gave him an opportunity of railing at the covetousness of the clergy! declaring their religion was 'a mere preach,' and that 'the time would never be well till we had Queen Elizabeth's Protestants again in fashion.' He was aware of all the evils arising out of a population beyond the means of subsistence, and dreaded an inundation of men, spreading like the spawn of a cod. Hence he considered marriage, with a modern political economist, as very dangerous; bitterly censuring the clergy, whose children, he said, never thrived, and whose widows were left destitute. An apostolical life, according to Audley, required only books, meat, and drink, to be had for fifty pounds a year! Celibacy, voluntary poverty, and all the mortifications of a primitive Christian, were the virtues practised by this puritan among his money bags.

Yet Audley's was that worldly wisdom which derives all its strength from the weaknesses of mankind. Every thing was to be obtained by stratagem, and it was his maxim, that to grasp our object the faster, we must go a little round about it. His life is said to have been one of intricacies and mysteries, using indirect means in all things; but if he walked in a labyrinth, it was to bewilder others; for the clue was still in his own hand: all he sought was that his designs should not be discovered by his actions. His word, we are told, was his bond; his hour was punctual; and his opinions were compressed and weighty; but if he was true to his bond-word, it was only a part of the system to give facility to the carrying on of his trade, for he was not strict to his honour; the pride of victory, as well as the passion for acquisition, combined in the character of Audley, as in more tremendous conquerors. His partners dreaded the effects of his law-library, and usually relinquished a claim rather than stand a suit against a latent quibble. When one menaced him by showing some money-bags, which he had resolved to empty in law against him, Audley, then in office in the court of wards, with a sarcastic grin, asked 'Whether the bags had any bottom?' 'Ay,' replied the exulting possessor, striking them. 'In that case I care not,' retorted the cynical officer of the court of wards; 'for in this court I have a constant spring; and I cannot spend in other courts more than I gain in this.' He had at once the means which would evade the law, and the spirit which could resist it.

The genius of Audley had crept out of the purloins of Guildhall, and entered the temple; and having often sauntered at 'Powles' down the great promenade which was reserved for 'Duke Humphrey and his guests,' he turned into that part called 'The Usurer's Alley,' with 'Thirty in the hundred,' and at length was enabled to purchase his office at that remarkable institution, the court of wards. The entire fortunes of those who now call wards in chancery were in the hands, and submitted to the arts or the tyranny of the officious court.

When Audley was asked the value of this new office he replied, that 'It might be worth some thousand pounds to him who after his death would instantly beaven; twice as much to him who would go to purgatory and nobody knows what to him who would adventure to hell.' Such was the pious casuistry of a witty Usurer. Whether he undertook this last adventure, for his fondness for thousand pounds, how can a sceptical biographer decide? Audley seems ever to have been weak, when his station was strong.

Some saving qualities, however, were mixed with vicious ones he liked the best. Another passion of dominion with the sovereign one: Audley's strongest passions of character were cast in the old law-lawyer's youth, and the pride of legal reputation was not in strength to the rage for money. If in the 'court of wards' he pounced on incumbrances which lay on estates and prowled about to discover the craving wants of owners, it appears that he also received liberal fees from the relatives of young heirs, to protect them from the rapacity of some great persons, but who could not certainly exceed Audley in subtlety. He was an admirable lawyer for he was not satisfied with hearing but examining clients; which he called 'pinching the cause where he perceived it was founded.' He made two observations on clients and lawyers, which have not lost their pungency. 'Many clients, in telling their case, rather plead than state it, so that the advocate heareth not the true state of the case till opened by the adverse party. Some lawyers set up an assurance-office in their chambers, and will warrant any cause brought unto them, knowing that if they fail, they lose nothing but what was lost long since, and credit.'

The career of Audley's ambition closed with the extinction of the 'court of wards,' by which he incurred the loss of above £100,000. On that occasion he observed, 'His ordinary losses were as the shaving of his head, which only grew the faster by them; but the loss of place was like the cutting off of a member, which was not recoverable.' The hoary Usurer pined at the decline of genius, discoursed on the vanity of the world, and his retirement. A facetious friend told him a story of an old man who having acquainted the young rats that he would lengthen retire to his hole, desiring none to come near to his curiosity, after some days, led them to venture to him into the hole; and there they discovered the old rat sitting in the midst of a rich parmesan cheese. It is probable that the loss of the last £100,000 disturbed his digestion, for he did not long survive his court of wards.

Such was this man, converting wisdom into cunning, invention into trickery, and wit into cynicism. Engaged in no honourable cause, he however showed a mind ready, making plain the crooked and involved path he was pursuing, to bear and to forbear. He was the great principle of Epictetus, and our moneyed Stoic bore all contempt and hatred of the living smilingly, while he forgot all the consolations of our common nature to obtain his end. He died in unblest celibacy.—And thus he received the curses of the living for his rapine, while the stranger who grasped the million he had raked together owed him a gratitude at his death.

CHIDIACK TITCHBOURNE.

In this volume I have drawn a picture of a Jewish story in our country; the present is a companion-piece, exhibiting a Roman Catholic one.

The domestic history of our country awakens our feelings far more than the public. In the one, we recognise ourselves as men; in the other, we are nothing but politicians. The domestic history is, indeed, entirely involved in the fate of the public; and our opinions are regulated according to the different countries, and by the different ages we live in: yet systems of politics, and modes of faith are for the individual, but the chance occurrences of human life usually found in the cradle, and laid in the grave; it is only the herd of mankind, or their designing leaders, who feed and curse one another with so much sincerity. Audley so intestine struggles or, perhaps, when they have ceased and our hearts are calm, we perceive the eternal force of men acting on humanity: then the heroic virtues and the sufferings of persons engaged in an opposite cause, acting on different principles than our own, appeal to sympathy, and even excite our admiration. A philosopher, born a Catholic, assuredly could commemorate as a pathetic history of some heroic Huguenot; while, with the same feeling in our heart, discover a romantic chivalrous band of Catholics.

CHIDOCK TITCHBOURNE is a name which appears in the conspiracy of Anthony Babington against Elizabeth; the history of this accomplished young man may enter into the romance of real life. Having discovered two interesting domestic documents relative to him, I am desirous of preserving a name and a character, which have claims on our sympathy.

There is an interesting historical novel, entitled 'The Man,' whose story is founded on this conspiracy; remarkable for being the production of a lady, without, if I recollect rightly, a single adventure of love. Of the fourteen characters implicated in this conspiracy, few were of the sort of men ordinarily engaged in dark assassinations. One has told the story with his usual grace; the fuller nature may be found in Camden; but the tale may yet live, from the character of CHIDOCK TITCHBOURNE, more interesting close.

Some youths, worthy of the heroes, rather than the traitors of England, had been practised on by the subtlety of Ballard, a disguised Jesuit of great vivacity and talents, whom Camden calls 'a sly priest a soldier's habit' for this versatile intriguer changed to all shapes, and took up all names; yet with all the arts a political Jesuit he found himself entrapped in the net of that more crafty one, the great Walsingham. Ballard had opened himself to Babington, a catholic; a youth large fortune, the graces of whose person were only inferior to his mind. In his travels, his generous temper had been touched by some confidential friends of the Scottish Mary; and the youth, susceptible of ambition, had been recommended to that queen; and an intercourse of letters took place, which seemed as deeply tinged with love as his loyalty. The intimacies of Babington were youths of vigorous tempers and studies; and in their exalted imaginations, they could only view in the imprisoned Mary of Scotland a sovereign, a saint, and a woman. But friendship, the most tender, if not the most sublime ever recorded, prevailed among this band of self-devoted victims; and in Damon and Pythias of antiquity were here outnumbered.

But these conspirators were surely more adapted for wars than for politicians. The most romantic incidents were interwoven in this dark conspiracy. Some of the letters to Mary were conveyed by a secret messenger, one in the pay of Walsingham; others were lodged in a concealed place covered by a loosened stone, in the wall of the queen's prison. All were transcribed by Walsingham before they reached Mary. Even the spies of that singular statesman were the companions, or the servants, of the archconspirator Ballard; for the minister seems hardly to have humoured his taste in assisting him through his extravagant plot. Yet, as if a plot of so loose a texture was not quite perilous, the extraordinary incident of a picture representing the secret conspirators in person, was probably considered as the highest stroke of political intrigue! The accomplished Babington had portrayed the conspirators, himself standing in the midst of them, that the imprisoned queen might thus have some kind of personal acquaintance with them. There was, at least, so much of chivalry as of Machiavelism in this conspiracy. This very picture, before it was delivered to Mary, the noble Walsingham had copied, to exhibit to Elizabeth the faces of her secret enemies. Houbraken in his portrait of Walsingham has introduced in the vignette the incident of this picture being shown to Elizabeth; a circumstance happily characteristic of the genius of this crafty and vigilant statesman. Camden tells us that Babington had first inscribed beneath the picture of this verse:

'Hi mihi sunt comites, quos ipse periculum ducunt.'

These are my companions, whom the same dangers lead. But as this verse was considered by some of less heated spirits as much too open and intelligible, they put one more ambiguous:

'Quorum hinc alio properantibus?'

What are these things to men hastening to another purpose?

This extraordinary collection of personages must have occasioned many alarms to Elizabeth, whenever any stranger approached her; till the conspiracy was suffered to be silently matured sufficiently to be ended. Once she perceived in her walks a conspirator, and on that occasion erected her 'lion port,' reprimanding her captain of the guards, loud enough to meet the conspirator's ear, that 'he had not a man in his company who wore a sword;—as was not fairly guarded,' exclaimed Elizabeth.

It is in the progress of the trial that the history and the feelings of these wondrous youths appear. In those times, when the government of the country yet felt itself unsettled, and mercy did not sit in the judgment-seat, even one of the judges could not refrain from being affected at the presence of so gallant a band as the prisoners at the bar: 'Oh Ballard, Ballard!' the judge exclaimed, 'what hast thou done? a sort of brave youths, otherwise endued with good gifts, by thy inducement hast thou brought to their utter destruction and confusion.' The Jesuit himself commands our respect, although we refuse him our esteem; for he felt some compunction at the tragical executions which were to follow, and 'wished all the blame might rest on him, could the shedding of his blood be the saving of Babington's life.'

When this romantic band of friends were called on for their defence, the most pathetic instances of domestic affection appeared: one had engaged in this plot solely to try to save his friend, for he had no hopes of it, nor any wish for its success; he had observed to his friend that 'the haughty and ambitious mind of Anthony Babington would be the destruction of himself and his friends; nevertheless he was willing to die with them! Another, to withdraw, if possible, one of these noble youths from the conspiracy, although he had broken off housekeeping, said, to employ his own language, 'I called back my servants again together, and began to keep house again more freely than ever I did, only because I was weary to see Tom Salisbury straggling, and willing to keep him about home.' Having attempted to secrete his friend, this gentleman observed, 'I am condemned, because I suffered Salisbury to escape, when I knew he was one of the conspirators. My case is hard and lamentable; either to betray my friend whom I love as myself, and to discover Tom Salisbury, the best man in my country, of whom I only made choice; or else to break my allegiance to my sovereign, and to undo myself and my posterity for ever. Whatever the political casuist may determine on this case the social being carries his own manual in the heart. The principle of the greatest of republics was to suffer nothing to exist in competition with its own ambition; but the Roman history is a history without fathers and brothers!—Another of the conspirators replied, 'For flying away with my friend, I fulfilled the part of a friend.' When the judge observed that, to perform his friendship, he had broken his allegiance to his sovereign; he bowed his head and confessed, 'Therein I have offended.'—Another, asked why he had fled into the woods, where he was discovered among some of the conspirators, proudly, or tenderly, replied, 'For company!'

When the sentence of condemnation had passed, then broke forth among this noble band that spirit of honour, which surely had never been witnessed at the bar among so many criminals. Their great minds seemed to have reconciled them to the most barbarous of deaths; but as their estates as traitors might be forfeited to the queen, their sole anxiety was now for their family and their creditors. One in the most pathetic terms recommends to her majesty's protection a beloved wife; another a destitute sister; but not among the least urgent of their supplications, was one that their creditors might not be injured by their untimely end. The statement of their affairs is curious and simple. 'If mercy be not to be had,' exclaimed one, 'I beseech you, my good lords, this; I owe some sums of money, but not very much, and I have more owing to me; I beseech that my debts may be paid with that which is owing to me.' Another prayed for a pardon; the judge complimented him, that 'he was one who might have done good service to his country; but declares he cannot obtain it.—'Then,' said the prisoner, 'I beseech that six angels, which such an one hath of mine, may be delivered to my brother to pay my debts.—' How much are thy debts?' demanded the judge. He answered, 'The same six angels will discharge it.'

That nothing might be wanting to complete the catastrophe of their sad story, our sympathy must accompany them to their tragical end, and to their last words. These heroic yet affectionate youths had a trial there, intolerable to their social feelings. The terrific process of executing traitors was the remains of feudal barbarism, and has only been abolished very recently. I must not refrain from painting this scene of blood; the duty of an historian must be severer than his taste, and I record in the note a scene of this nature.* The present one was full of horrors. Ballard was first executed, and snatched alive from the gallows to be embowelled: Babington looked on with an undaunted countenance, steadily gazing on that variety of tortures which he himself was in a moment to pass through; the others averted their faces, fervently praying. When the executioner began his tremendous office on Babington, the spirit of this haughty and heroic man cried out amidst the agony, Parce mihi, Domine Jesu! Spare me Lord Jesus! There were two days of execution; it was on the first that the noblest of these youths suffered; and the pity which such criminals had excited among the spectators evidently weakened the sense of their political crime; the solemnity, not the barbarity of the punishment affects the populace with right feelings. Elizabeth, an enlightened politician, commanded that on the second day the odious part of the sentence against traitors should not commence till after their death.

One of these generosi adolescentuli, youths of generous blood, was CHIDIOCK TITCHBOURNE, of Southampton, the more intimate friend of Babington. He had refused to connect himself with the assassination of Elizabeth, but his reluctant consent was inferred from his silence. His address to the populace breathes all the carelessness of life, in one who knew all its value. Proud of his ancient descent from a family which had existed before the Conquest, till now without a stain, he paints the thoughtless happiness of his days with his beloved friend, when any object rather than matters of state engaged their pursuits; the hours of misery were only first known the day he entered into the conspiracy. How feelingly he passes into the domestic scene, amidst his wife, his child, and his sisters! and even his servants! Well might he cry, more in tenderness than in reproach, 'Friendship hath brought me to this!'

'Countrymen, and my dear friends, you expect I should speak something; I am a bad orator, and my text is worse: It were in vain to enter into the discourse of the whole matter for which I am brought hither, for that it hath been revealed heretofore; let me be a warning to all young gentlemen, especially generosi adolescentuli. I had a friend, and a dear friend, of whom I made no small account, whose friendship hath brought me to this; he told

* Let not the delicate female start from the revolting scene, nor censure the writer, since that writer is a woman—suppressing her own agony, as she supported on her lap the head of the miserable sufferer. This account was drawn up by Mrs. Elizabeth Willoughby a Catholic lady, who, amidst the horrid execution, could still her own feelings in the attempt to soften those of the victim: she was a heroine, with a tender heart.

The subject was one of the executed Jesuits, Hugh Green, who often went by the name of Ferdinand Brooks, according to the custom of these people, who disguised themselves by double names; he suffered in 1642; and this narrative is taken from the curious and scarce folios of Dodd, a Catholic Church History of England.

'The hangman, either through unskillfulness, or for want of a sufficient presence of mind, had so ill-performed his first duty of hanging him, that when he was cut down he was perfectly sensible, and able to sit upright upon the ground, viewing the crowd that stood about him. The person who undertook to quarter him was one Barefoot, a barber, who, being very timorous when he found he was to attack a living man, it was near half an hour before the sufferer was rendered entirely insensible of pain. The mob pulled at the rope, and threw the Jesuit on his back. Then the barber immediately fell to work, ripped up his belly, and laid the flaps of skin on both sides; the poor gentlemen being so present to himself as to make the sign of the cross with one hand. During this operation, Mrs. Elizabeth Willoughby (the writer of this) knelt at the Jesuit's head, and held it fast beneath her hands. His face was covered with a thick sweat: the blood issued from his mouth, ears, and eyes, and his forehead bled with so much heat, that he assures us she could scarce endure her hand upon it. The barber was still under a great consternation.'—But I stop my pen amidst these circumstantial horrors.

me the whole matter, I cannot deny, as they had laid it down to be done; but I always thought it impious, and denied to be a dealer in it; but the regard of my friend caused me to be a man in whom the old proverb was verified; I was silent, and so consented. Before this thing chanced, we lived together in most flourishing estate: Of whom went report in the Strand, Fleet street, and elsewhere, about London, but of Babington and Titchbourne? No threshold was of force to brave our entry. Thus we lived, and wanted nothing we could wish for; and God knows what less in my head than matters of state. Now give me leave to declare the miseries sustained after I was acquainted with the action, wherein I may justly compare my estate to that of Adam's, who could not abstain one thing forbidden, to enjoy all other things the world could afford: the terror of conscience awaited me. After I considered the dangers wherewith I was fallen, I went to Sir John Peters in Essex, and appointed my horses should meet me at London, intending to go down into the country. I came to London, and then heard that all was bewrayed; whereupon, like Adam, we fled into the woods to hide ourselves. My dear countrymen, my sorrows may be your joy, yet mix your smiles with tears, and pity my case; I am descended from a house, from two hundred years before the Conquest, now stained till this my misfortune. I have a wife and one child; my wife Agnes, my dear wife, and there's my grief—and six sisters left in my hand—my poor servants, I know, their master being taken, were dispersed; for all which I do most heartily grieve. I expected some favour, tho' I deserved nothing less, that the remainder of my years might in some sort have recompensed my former guilt; which seeing I have missed, let me now meditate on the joys I hope to enjoy.'

Titchbourne had addressed a letter to his 'dear wife Agnes,' the night before he suffered, which I discovered among the Harleian MSS.* It overflows with the most natural feeling, and contains some touches of expression, all sweetness and tenderness, which mark the Shakespearean era. The same MS. has also preserved a more precious gem, in a small poem, composed at the same time, which indicates his genius, fertile in imagery and fraught with the melancholy philosophy of a fine and wounded spirit. The unhappy close of the life of such a noble youth, with all the prodigality of his feelings and the cultivation of his intellect, may still excite that sympathy in the generosi adolescentuli, which Chidiock Titchbourne would have felt for them!

'A letter written by CHIDIOCK TITCHBOURNE the night before he suffered death unto his wife, dated of anno 1586.

'To the most loving wife alive, I commend me unto you, and desire God to bless her with all happiness, pray for her dead husband, and be of good comfort, for I hope in Jesus Christ this morning to see the face of my maker and redeemer in the most joyful throne of his glorious kingdom. Commend me to all my friends, and desire them to pray for me, and in all charity to pardon me if I have offended them. Commend me to my six sisters poor desolate souls, advise them to serve God, for without him no goodness is to be expected: were it possible, my little sister Babb: the darlings of my race might be bred by her; God would reward her; but I do her wrong, I confess, that hath by my desolate negligence too little for herself, to add a further charge unto her. Deere wife, I give me, that have by these means so much impoverished her fortunes; patience and pardon good wife I crave—make of these our necessities a virtue, and lay no further burthen on my neck than hath already been. There be certain debts that I owe, and because I know not the order of the law, piteous it hath taken from me all, forfeited by my course of offence to her majesty, I cannot advise thee to benefit me herein, but if there fall out wherewithall, let them be discharged for God's sake. I will not that you trouble yourself with the performance of these matters, my own heart, but make it known to my uncles, and desire them, for the honour of God and the ease of their souls, to take care of them as they may, and especially care of my sisters bringing up the burthen is now laide on them. Now, sweet-cheek, what is left to bestow on thee, a small joynture, a small recompence for thy deserving, these graces following to be thine owne. God of his goodness give thee grace alwaies to remain his true and faithful servant, that through the merits of his bitter and blessed passion thou maist become in good time of his kingdom with the blessed women in heaven. May the Holy Ghost comfort thee with all necessities for the wealth of thy soul in the world to come, where until it shall please Almighty God I meete thee, farewell lovinge wife, farewell the dearest to me on all the earth, farewell!

'By the hand from the heart of thy most faithful louingu husband.

'VERSES

Made by CHIDDOCK TITCHBOURNE of himself in the Tower, the night before he suffered death, who was executed in Lincoln's Inn Fields for treason. 1586.

My prime of youth is but a frost of cares,
My feast of joy is but a dish of pain,
My crop of corn is but a field of tares,
And all my goodies is but vain hope of gain;
The day is fled, and yet I saw no sun,
And now I live, and now my life is done!

My spring is past, and yet it hath not sprung,
The fruit is dead, and yet the leaves are green,
My youth is past, and yet I am but young,
I saw the world, and yet I was not seen;
My thread is cut, and yet it is not spun,
And now I live, and now my life is done!

I sought for death, and found it in the wombe,
I lookt for life, and yet it was a shade,
I trade the groundes, and knew it was my tombe,
And now I dye, and now I am but made.
The glass is full, and yet my glass is run;
And now I live, and now my life is done!*

ELIZABETH AND HER PARLIAMENT.

The year 1566 was a remarkable period in the domestic annals of our great Elizabeth; then, for a moment broke forth a noble struggle between the freedom of the subject and the dignity of the sovereign.

One of the popular grievances of her glorious reign was the maiden state in which the queen persisted to live, notwithstanding such frequent remonstrances and exhortations. The nation in a moment might be thrown into the danger of a disputed succession; and it became necessary to allay that ferment which existed among all parties, while each was fixing on its own favourite, hereafter to ascend the throne. The birth of James I this year animated the partisans of Mary of Scotland; and men of the most opposite parties of England unanimously joined in the popular cry for the marriage of Elizabeth, or a settlement of the succession. This was a subject most painful to the thoughts of Elizabeth; she started from it with horror, and she was practising every imaginable artifice to evade it.

The real cause of this repugnance has been passed over by our historians. Camden, however, hints at it, when he places among other popular rumours of the day, that 'men cursed Huic, the Queen's physician, for disseminating her from marriage, for I know not what female infirmity.' The queen's physician thus incurred the odium of the nation for the integrity of his conduct; he well knew how precious was her life.†

This fact, once known, throws a new light over her conduct: the ambiguous expressions which she constantly employs, when she alludes to her marriage in her speeches, and in private conversations, are no longer mysterious.—She was always declaring, that she knew her subjects did not love her so little, as to wish to bury her before her time; even in the letter I shall now give, we find this

* This pathetic poem has been printed in one of the old editions of Sir Walter Raleigh's Poems, but could never have been written by him. In those times the collectors of the works of a celebrated writer would insert any fugitive pieces of merit, and pass them under a name which was certain of securing the reader's favour. The entire poem in every line echoes the feelings of Chidlock Titchbourne, who perished with all the charms of life and genius about him in the May-time of his existence.

† Foreign authors who had an intercourse with the English court seem to have been better informed, or at least found themselves under less restraint than our own home writers. In Boyle, note x, the reader will find this mysterious affair cleared up; at length in one of our own writers, Whitaker, in his Life of Queen of Scots vindicated, Vol. II, p. 502. Elizabeth's answer to the first Address of the Commons, on her marriage, in Home, Vol. V, p. 13, is now more intelligible; he has preserved her fanciful style.

remarkable expression; urging her to marriage, she said, was 'asking nothing less than wishing her to dig her grave before she was dead.' Conscious of the danger of her life by marriage she had early declared when she ascended the throne, that 'she would live and die a maiden queen;' but she afterwards discovered the political evil resulting from her unfortunate situation. Her conduct was admirable; her great genius turned even her weakness into strength, and proved how well she deserved the character which she had already obtained from an enlightened enemy—the great Sixtus V, who observed of her, Ch'era un gran cervello di Principessa! She had a princely head-piece! Elizabeth allowed her ministers to pledge her royal word to the commons, as often as they found necessary, for her resolution to marry; she kept all Europe at her feet, with the hopes and fears of her choice; she gave ready encouragements, perhaps allowed her agents to promote even invitations, to the offers of marriage she received from crowned heads; and all the coquetries, and the cajolings, so often and so fully recorded with which she freely honoured individuals, made her empire an empire of love, where love, however, could never appear. All these were merely political artifices, to conceal her secret resolution, which was, not to marry.

At the birth of James I, as Camden says, 'the sharp and hot spirits broke out, accusing the queen that she was neglecting her country and posterity.' All 'these humours,' observes Hume, 'broke out with great vehemence, in a new session of parliament, held after six prorogations.' The peers united with the commons. The queen had an empty exchequer, and was at their mercy. It was a moment of high ferment. Some of the boldest, and some of the most British spirits were at work; and they with the malice or wisdom of opposition, combined the supply with the succession; one was not to be had without the other.

This was a moment of great hope and anxiety with the French court; they were flattering themselves that her reign was touching a crisis; and La Mothe Fenelon, then the French ambassador at the court of Elizabeth, appears to have been busied in collecting hourly information of the warm debates in the commons, and what passed in their interviews with the queen. We may rather be astonished where he procured so much secret intelligence: he sometimes complains that he is not able to acquire it as fast as Catherine de Medicis and her son Charles IX wished.—There must have been Englishmen at our court, who were serving as French spies. In a private collection,* which consists of two or three hundred original letters of Charles IX, Catherine de Medecis, Henry III, and Mary of Scotland, &c., I find two despatches of this French ambassador, entirely relating to the present occurrence.—What renders them more curious is, that the debates on the question of the succession are imperfectly given in Sir Symonds D'Ewes's journals; the only resource open to us. Sir Symonds complains of the negligence of the clerk of the commons, who indeed seems to have exerted his negligence, whenever it was found most agreeable to the court party.

Previous to the warm debates in the commons, of which the present despatch furnishes a lively picture, on Saturday, 12 Oct. 1566, at a meeting of the lords of the council, held in the queen's apartment, the Duke of Norfolk, in the name of the whole nobility, addressed Elizabeth, urging her to settle the suspended points of the succession, and of her marriage, which had been promised in the last parliament. The queen was greatly angered on the occasion; she could not suffer to be urged on those points; she spoke with great animation. 'Hitherto you have had no opportunity to complain of me; I have well governed the country in peace, and if a late war of little consequence has broken out, which might have occasioned my subjects to complain of me, with me it has not originated, but with yourselves, as truly I believe. Lay your hands on your hearts, and blame yourselves. In respect to the choice of the succession, not one of ye shall have it; that choice I reserve to myself alone. I will not be buried while I am living, as my sister was. Do I not well know, how during the life of my sister every one hastened to me at Hatfield; I am at present inclined to see no such travellers, nor desire on this your advice in any way.† In regard to my marriage, you may see enough, that I am not distant from it, and in what respects the welfare of the kingdom: go each of you, and do your own duty.'

'SIR,

27 October, 1566.

'By my last despatch of the 21st instant,* among other matters, I informed your majesty of what was said on Saturday the 19th as well in parliament, as in the chamber of the queen, respecting the circumstance of the succession to this crown: since which I have learnt other particulars, which occurred a little before, and which I will not now omit to relate, before I mention what afterwards happened.

'On Wednesday the 16th of the present month, the comptroller of the queen's household† moved in the lower house of parliament, where the deputies of towns and counties meet, to obtain a subsidy;† taking into consideration, among other things, that the queen had emptied the exchequer, as well in the late wars, as in the maintenance of her ships at sea, for the protection of her kingdom, and her subjects; and which expenditure has been so excessive, that it could no further be supported without the aid of her good subjects, whose duty it was to offer money to her majesty, even before she required it, in consideration that, hitherto, she had been to them a benignant and courteous mistress.

'The comptroller having finished, one of the deputies, a country gentleman, rose in reply. He said, that he saw no occasion, nor any pressing necessity, which ought to move her majesty to ask for money of her subjects. And, in regard to the wars, which it was said had exhausted her treasury, she had undertaken them from herself, as she had thought proper; not for the defence of her kingdom, nor for the advantage of her subjects; but there was one thing which seemed to him more urgent, and far more necessary to examine concerning this campaign; which was, how the money raised by the late subsidy had been spent; and that every one who had had the handling of it should produce their accounts, that it might be known if the monies had been well or ill spent.

'On this, rises one named Mr Bauche,§ purveyor of the marine, and also a member of the said parliament; who shows, that it was most necessary that the commons should vote the said subsidies to her majesty, who had not only been at vast charges, and was so daily to maintain a great number of ships, but also in building new ones; repeating what the comptroller of the household had said, that they ought not to wait till the queen asked for supplies, but should make a voluntary offer of their services.

'Another country gentleman rises and replies, that the said Bauche had certainly his reasons to speak for the queen in the present case, since a great deal of her majesty's monies for the providing of ships passed through his hands; and the more he consumed, the greater was his profit. According to his notion, there were but too many purveyors in this kingdom, whose noses had grown so long, that they stretched from London to the west.¶ It was certainly proper to know if all they levied by their commission for the present campaign was entirely employed to the queen's profit.—Nothing further was debated on that day.

'The Friday following, when the subject of the subsidies was renewed, one of the gentlemen-deputies showed,

* This despatch is a meagre account, written before the ambassador obtained all the information the present letter displays. The chief particulars I have perceived above.

† By Sir Symonds D'Ewes's Journals it appears, that the French ambassador had mistaken the day, Wednesday the 16th, for Thursday the 17th of October. The ambassador is afterwards right in the other dates. The person who moved the house, whom he calls 'Le Scindique de la Roynie,' was Sir Edward Rogers, compiler of her majesty's household. The motion was seconded by Sir William Cecil, who entered more largely into the particulars of the queen's charges, incurred in the defence of New-Haven, in France, the repairs of her navy, and the Irish war with O'Neil. In the present narrative we fully discover the spirit of the independent members; and, at its close, that part of the secret history of Elizabeth which so powerfully develops her majestic character.

§ This gentleman's name does not appear in Sir Symonds D'Ewes's Journals. Mone. La Mothe Fenehon has, however, the uncommon merit contrary to the custom of his nation, of writing an English name somewhat recognizable; for Edward Bauche was one of the general surveyors of the victualling of the queen's ships, 1575, as I find in the Lansdowne MSS. vol. XVI. art. 60.

¶ In the original, 'Ille avoient le nez si long qu'il s'estendok depuis Londres jusques au pays d'West.'

that the queen having prayed* for the last subsidy, promised, and pledged her face to her subjects, that ter that one, she never would raise a single penny on them: and promised even to free them from the duty, of which promise they ought to press for the performance; adding that it was far more necessary for the kingdom to speak concerning an heir or successor to the crown, and of her marriage, than of a subsidy.

'The next day, which was Saturday the 18th, they began, with the exception of a single voice, a loud one for the succession. Amidst these confused voices and cries, one of the council prayed them to have a little patience, and with time they should be satisfied; but at that moment, other matters pressed,—it was necessary to satisfy the queen about a subsidy. "No!" cried the deputies, "we are expressly charged not to say any thing, until the queen resolutely answers that we now ask: and we require you to inform her majesty of our intention, which is such as we are commanded by all the towns, and subjects of this kingdom, whose deputies we are. We further require an act, or acknowledgement, of our having delivered this remonstrance, if we may satisfy our respective towns and counties that we have performed our charge." They alleged for excuse, that if they had omitted any part of this, the hands would answer for it. We shall see what will come of this.

'Tuesday the 22d, the principal lords, and the bishops of London, York, Winchester, and Durham, went together, after dinner, from the parliament to the queen, where they found in her private apartment. There, after the who were present had retired, and they remained all with her, the great treasurer, having the precedence in a spoke first in the name of all. He opened, by saying that the commons had required them to unite in one sentiment and agreement, to solicit her majesty to give an answer as she had promised, to appoint a successor to the crown; declaring it was necessary that compelled them to urge his point, that they might provide against the dangers which might happen to the kingdom, if they continued without the security they asked. This had been the custom of her royal predecessors, to provide long before for the succession, to preserve the peace of the kingdom; that the commons were all of one opinion, and so resolved to settle the succession before they would speak about a subsidy, or any other matter whatever, that hitherto, nothing but the most trivial discussions had passed in parliament, and so great an assembly was only wasting their time, and saw themselves entirely useless. They, however, supplicated her majesty, that she should be pleased to declare her will on this point, or at once to put an end to the parliament, so that every one might retire to his home.

'The Duke of Norfolk then spoke, and, after him, every one of the other lords, according to his rank holding the same language in strict conformity with that of the great treasurer.

'The queen returned no softer answer than she had on the preceding Saturday, to another party of the same company; saying that, "The commons were very rebellious, and that they had not dared to have attempted such things during the life of her father: that it was not for them to impede her affairs, and that it did not become a subject to compel the sovereign. What they asked, was nothing less than wishing her to dig her grave before she was dead." Addressing herself to the lords, she said, "My lords, do what you will; as for myself, I shall do nothing but according to my pleasure. All the resolutions which you may make can have no force without my consent and authority: besides, what you desire is an affair of much too great importance to be declared to a knot of hare-brains.¶ I will take council with men who understand justice and the laws, as I am deliberating to do: I will choose half a dozen of the most able I can find in my kingdom for consultation, and after having heard their advice, I will then discover

* This term is remarkable. In the original, 'Le Roy n'ayant impetré, which in Cotgrave's Dictionary, a consensual work, is explained by,—"To get by prayer, obtain by supplication by entreaty, procure by request." This significant expression conveys the real notion of this venerable Whig before Whiggism had received a denomination, and formed a party.

† The French ambassador, no doubt, flattered himself and his master, that all this 'patience' could only close in insurrection and civil war.

‡ In the original, 'A ung tas de cerreaux si legieres.'

to 'do my will.' On this she dismissed them in great anger.

By this, sire, your majesty may perceive that this queen is every day trying new inventions to escape from this passage, (that is, on fixing her marriage, or the succession.) She thinks that the Duke of Norfolk is principally the cause of this insisting,* which one person and the other stand to; and is so angry against him, that, if she can find any decent pretext to arrest him, I think she will not fail to do it; and he himself, as I understand, has already very little doubt of this.† The Duke told the Earl of Northumberland, that the queen remained steadfast to her own opinion, and would take no other advice than her own, and would do every thing herself.

The storms in our parliament do not necessarily end in political shipwrecks, when the head of the government is an Elizabeth. She, indeed, sent down a prohibition to the house from all debate on the subjects. But when she discovered a spirit in the commons, and language as bold as her own royal style, she knew how to revoke the exasperating prohibition. She even charmed them by the manner; for the commons returned her 'prayers and thanks,' and accompanied them with a subsidy. Her majesty found, by experience, that the present, like other passions, was more easily calmed and quieted by following than resisting, observes Sir Symonds D'Ewes.

The wisdom of Elizabeth however did not weaken her intrepidity. The struggle was glorious for both parties; but how she escaped through the storm which her mysterious conduct had at once raised and quelled, the sweetness and the sharpness, the commendation and the reprimand of her noble speech in closing the parliament, is told by Hume with the usual felicity of his narrative.‡

ANECDOTES OF PRINCE HENRY, THE SON OF JAMES I, WHEN A CHILD.

Prince Henry, the son of James I, whose premature death was lamented by the people, as well as by poets and historians, unquestionably would have proved an heroic and military character. Had he ascended the throne, the whole face of our history might have been changed; the days of Agincourt and Cressy had been revived, and Henry IX had rivalled Henry V. It is remarkable that Prince Henry resembled that monarch in his features, as Ben Jonson has truly recorded, though in a complimentary verse, and as we may see by his picture, among the ancient English ones at Dulwich college. Merlin, in a masque by Jonson, addresses Prince Henry,

'Yet rests that other thunderbolt of war,
Harry the Fifth; to whom in face you are
So like, as fate would have you so in worth.'

A youth who perished in his eighteenth year has furnished the subject of a volume, which even the deficient animation of its writer has not deprived of attraction.§ If the juvenile age of Prince Henry has proved such a theme for our admiration, we may be curious to learn what this extraordinary youth was, even at an earlier period. Authentic anecdotes of children are rare; a child has seldom a biographer by his side. We have indeed been recently treated with 'Anecdotes of Children,' in the 'Practical Education' of the literary family of the Edgeworths; but we may presume, that as Mr Edgeworth delighted in pieces of curious machinery in his house, these automatic infants, poets, and metaphysicians, of whom afterwards we have heard no more, seem to have resembled other automata, moving without any native impulse.

Prince Henry, at a very early age, not exceeding five years, evinced a thoughtfulness of character, singular in a child: something in the formation of this early character may be attributed to the Countess of Mar. This lady

* The word in the original is, insistence; an expressive word as used by the French ambassador; but which Boyer, in his Dictionary, doubts whether it be French, although he gives a modern authority; the present is much more ancient.

† The Duke of Norfolk was, 'without comparison, the first subject in England; and the qualities of his mind corresponded with his high station,' says Hume. He closed his career, at length, the victim of love and ambition, in his attempt to marry the Spanish Mary. So great and honourable a man could only be a criminal by halves; and, to such, the scaffold, and not the throne, is reserved, when they engage in enterprises, which, by their secrecy, in the eyes of a jealous sovereign, assume the form and guilt of a conspiracy.

§ Dr. Birch's Life of this Prince.

had been the nurse of James I, and to her care the king entrusted the prince. She is described in a manuscript of the times, as an 'ancient, virtuous, and severe lady, who was the prince's governess from his cradle.' At the age of five years the prince was consigned to his tutor, Mr (afterwards Sir) Adam Newton, a man of learning and capacity, whom the prince at length chose for his secretary. The severity of the old countess, and the strict discipline of his tutor, were not received without affection and reverence; although not at times without a shrewd excuse, or a turn of pleasantry, which latter faculty the princely boy seems to have possessed in a very high degree.

The prince early attracted the attention, and excited the hopes of those who were about his person. A manuscript narrative has been preserved, which was written by one who tells us, that he was 'an attendant upon the prince's person, since he was under the age of three years, having always diligently observed his disposition, behaviour, and speeches.'¶ It was at the earnest desire of Lord and Lady Lumley, that the writer of these anecdotes drew up this relation. The manuscript is without date, but as Lord Lumley died in April, 1609, and leaving no heir, his library was then purchased for the prince, Henry could not have reached his fifteenth year; this manuscript was evidently composed earlier; so that the latest anecdotes could not have occurred beyond his thirteenth or fourteenth year—a time of life, when few children can furnish a curious miscellany about themselves.

The writer set down every little circumstance he considered worth noticing, as it occurred. I shall attempt a sort of arrangement of the most interesting, to show, by an unity of the facts, the characteristic touches of the mind and dispositions of the princely boy.

Prince Henry in his childhood rarely wept, and endured pain without a groan. When a boy wrestled with him in earnest, and threw him, he was not 'seen to whine or weep at the hurt.' His sense of justice was early; for when his playmate the little Earl of Mar, ill treated one of his pages, Henry reproved his puerile friend: 'I love you because you are my lord's son and my cousin; but, if you be not better conditioned, I will love such an one better,' naming the child that had complained of him.

The first time he went to the town of Stirling to meet the king, observing without the gate of the town a stack of corn, it fancifully struck him with the shape of the top he used to play with; and the child exclaimed, 'That's a good top.' 'Why do you not then play with it?' he answered; 'Set you it up for me, and I will play with it.' This is just the fancy which we might expect in a lively child, with a shrewdness in the retort, above its years.

His martial character was perpetually discovering itself. When asked what instrument he liked best? he answered, 'a trumpet.' We are told that none could dance with more grace, but that he never delighted in dancing; while he performed his heroic exercises with pride and delight, more particularly when before the king, the constable of Castile, and other ambassadors. He was instructed by his master to handle and use the pike, to march and hold himself in an affected style of stateliness, according to the martinets of those days; but he soon rejected such petty and artificial fashions; yet to show that his dislike arose from no want of skill in a trifling accomplishment, he would sometimes resume it only to laugh at it, and instantly return to his own natural demeanor. On one of these occasions one of these martinets observing that they could never be good soldiers unless they always kept true order and measure in marching, 'What then must they do,' cried Henry, 'when they wade through a swift running water?' In all things freedom of action from his own native impulse he preferred to the settled rules of his teachers; and when his physician told him that he rode too fast, he replied, 'Must I ride by rules of physic?' When he was eating a cold copan in cold weather, the physician told him that that was not meat for the weather. 'You may see, doctor,' said Henry, 'that my cook is no astronomer.' And when the same physician observing him eat cold and hot meat together, protested against it, 'I cannot mind that now,' said the royal boy facetiously, 'though they should have run at tilt together in my belly.'

His national affections were strong. When one reported to Henry that the King of France had said that his bastard, as well as the bastard of Normandy, might conquer England,—the princely boy exclaimed, 'I'll to cuffs with him, if he go about any such means.'—There was a dish of jelly before the prince in the form of a crown, with three lillies: and a kind of buffoon, whom the prince used to banter, said to the prince that that dish was worth a crown. 'Aye!' exclaimed the future English hero, 'I would I had that crown!'—It would be a great dish,' rejoined the buffoon. 'How can that be,' replied the prince, 'since you value it but a crown?'—When James I asked him whether he loved Englishmen or Frenchmen better, he replied, 'Englishmen, because he was of kindred to more noble persons of England than of France,' and when the king inquired whether he loved the English or Germans better? he replied, the English; on which the king observing that his mother was a German, the prince replied, 'Sir, you save the wit thereof.' A southern speech, adds the writer, which is as much as to say—you are the cause thereof.

Born in Scotland, and heir to the crown of England, at a time when the mutual jealousies of the two nations were running so high, the boy often had occasion to express the unity of affection, which was really in his heart. Being questioned by a nobleman, whether, after his father, he had rather be a king of England or Scotland? he asked, 'which of them was best?' being answered, that it was England, 'Then,' said the Scottish born prince, 'would I have both.' And once in reading this verse in Virgil,

Tros Tyriusve mihi nullo discrimine agetur,

the boy said he would make use of that verse for himself, with a slight alteration, thus—

'Anglus Scotusve mihi nullo discrimine agetur.'

He was careful to keep alive the same feeling for another part of the British dominions, and the young prince appears to have been regarded with great affection by the Welsh; for when once the prince asked a gentleman at what mark he should shoot? the courtier pointed with levity at a Welshman who was present. 'Will you see then,' said the princely boy, 'how I will shoot at Welshmen?' Turning his back from him, the Prince shot his arrow in the air.—When a Welshman who had taken a large carouse, in the fulness of his heart and his head, said in the presence of the king, that the prince should have 40,000 Welshmen to wait upon him against any king in Christendom; the king, not a little jealous, hastily inquired, 'To do what?' the little prince turned away the momentary alarm by his facetiousness, 'To cut off the heads of 40,000 loeks.'

His bold and martial character was discoverable in minute circumstances like these. Eating in the king's presence a dish of milk, the king asked him why he ate so much child's meat? 'Sir, it is also man's meat,' Henry replied;—and immediately after, having fed heartily on a partridge, the king observed, that that meat would make him a coward, according to the prevalent notions of the age respecting diet; to which the young prince replied, 'Though it be but a cowardly fowl, it shall not make me a coward.'—Once taking strawberries with two spoons, when one might have sufficed, our infant Mars gaily exclaimed, 'The one I use as a rapier, and the other as a dagger.'

Adam Newton appears to have filled his office as preceptor with no servility to the capricious fancies of the princely boy. Desirous, however, of cherishing the generous spirit and playful humour of Henry, his tutor encouraged a freedom of jesting with him, which appears to have been carried at times to a degree of momentary irritability on the side of the tutor, by the keen humour of the boy. While the royal pupil held his master in equal reverence and affection, the gayety of his temper sometimes twitched the equability or the gravity of the preceptor. When Newton, wishing to set an example to the prince in heroic exercises, one day practised the pike, and tossing it with such little skill as to have failed in the attempt, the young prince telling him of his failure, Newton obviously lost his temper, observing, that 'to find fault was an evil humour.'

Master, I take the humour of you.' 'It becomes not a prince,' observed Newton. 'Then,' retorted the young prince, 'doth it worse become a prince's master?'—Some of these harmless bickerings are amusing. When his tutor, playing at shuffle board with the prince, blamed him for changing so often, and taking up a piece, threw it on the board, and missed his aim, the prince smilingly exclaimed, 'Well thrown, master?' on which the tutor, a little vexed, said 'he would not strive with a prince at shuffle board.' Henry observed, 'Yet you gownsmen should be beat at such exercises, which are not meet for men who are more stirring.' The tutor, a little irritated, said, 'I am meet for whipping of boys.' 'You want then,' retorted the prince, 'that which a ploughman or cart driver can do better than you.' 'I can do more,' said the tutor, 'for I can govern foolish children.' On which the prince, who, in his respect for his tutor, did not care to carry the jest further, rose from table, and in a low voice to those near him said, 'He had need be a wise man that could do that.'—Newton was sometimes severe in his chastisements; for when the prince was playing at golf, and having warned his tutor who was standing by in conversation, that he was going to strike the ball, and having lifted up the golf-club, some one observing, 'Beware, Sir, that you hit not Mr Newton?' the prince drew back the club, but smilingly observed, 'Had I done so, I had but paid my debts.'—At another time, when he was amusing himself with the sports of a child, his tutor wishing to draw him to more manly exercises, amongst other things, said to him in good humour, 'God send you a wise wife!' 'That she may govern you and me!' said the prince. The tutor observed, that 'he had one of his own'; the prince replied, 'But mine, if I have one, would govern your wife, and by that means would govern both you and me.'—Henry, at this early age, excelled in a quickness of reply, combined with reflection, which marks the precocity of his intellect. His tutor having laid a wager with the prince that he could not refrain from standing with his back to the fire, and seeing him forget himself once or twice, standing in that posture, the tutor said, 'Sir, the wager is won; you have failed twice.' 'Master,' replied Henry, 'Saint Peter's cock crew thrice.' A musician having played a voluntary in his presence, was requested to play the same again. 'I could not for the kingdom of Spain,' said the musician, 'for this were harder than for a preacher to repeat word by word a sermon that he had not learned by rote.' A clergyman standing by, observed that he thought a preacher might do that; 'Perhaps,' rejoined the young prince, 'for a bishoprick.'

The natural facetiousness of his temper appears frequently in the good humour with which the little prince was accustomed to treat his domestics. He had two of opposite characters, who were frequently set by the ears for the sake of the sport; the one, Murray, nick-named 'the tailor,' loved his liquor; and the other was a stout 'trencherman.' The king desired the prince to put an end to these brawls, and to make the men agree and that the agreement should be written and subscribed by both. 'Then,' said the prince, 'must the drunken tailor subscribe it with chalk, for he cannot write his name, and then I will make them agree upon this condition—that the trencherman shall go into the cellar and drink with Will Murray, and Will Murray shall make a great wallet for the trencherman to carry his victuals in.'—One of his servants having cut the prince's finger, and sucked out the blood with his mouth, that it might heal the more easily, the young prince, who expressed no displeasure at the accident, said to him pleasantly, 'If, which God forbid! my father, myself, and the rest of his kindred should fail, you might claim the crown, for you have now in you the blood royal.'—Our little prince once resolved on a hearty game of play, and for this purpose only admitted his young gentlemen, and excluded the men; it happened that an old servant, not aware of the juncture, entered the apartment, on which the prince told him he might play too; and when the prince was asked why he admitted this old man rather than the other men, he rejoined, 'Because he had a right to be of their number, for Senex his puer.

Nor was Henry susceptible of gross flattery, for when once he wore white shoes, and one said he longed to kiss his foot, the prince said to the fawning courtier, 'Sir I am not the pope'; the other replied that he would not kiss the pope's foot, except it were to bite off his great toe. The prince gravely rejoined; 'At Rome you would be glad to kiss his foot, and forget the rest.'

It was then the mode, when the king or the prince travelled, to sleep with their suite at the house, of the nobility; and the loyalty and zeal of the host were usually displayed in the reception given to the royal guests. It happened that in one of these excursions the prince's servants complained that they had been obliged to go to bed supperless, through the pinching parsimony of the house, which the little prince at the time of hearing seemed to take no great notice of. The next morning the lady of the house coming to pay her respects to him she found him turning over a volume that had many pictures in it; one of which was a painting of a company sitting at a banquet; this he showed her. 'I invite you madam, to a feast.' 'To what feast?' she asked. 'To this feast,' said the boy. 'What, would your highness give me but a painted feast? Fixing his eye on her, he said, 'No better, madam, is found in this house.' There was a delicacy and greatness of spirit in this ingenious reprimand, far excelling the wit of a child.

According to this anecdote-writer, it appears that James I probably did not delight in the martial dispositions of his son, whose habits and opinions were, in all respects, forming themselves opposite to his own tranquil and literary character. The writer says that, 'his majesty, with the tokens of love to him, would sometimes interlace sharp speeches, and other demonstrations of fatherly severity.' Henry, who however lived, though he died early, to become a patron of ingenious men and a lover of genius, was himself at least as much enamoured of the pike as of the pen. The king, to rouse him to study, told him, that if he did not apply more diligently to his book, his brother duke Charles, who seemed already attached to study, would prove more able for government and for the cabinet; and that himself would be only fit for field exercises and military affairs. To his father, the little prince made no reply; but when his tutor one day reminded him of what his father had said, to stimulate our young prince to literary diligence, Henry asked, whether he thought his brother would prove so good a scholar? His tutor replied, that he was likely to prove so. 'Then,' rejoined our little prince will I make Charles archbishop of Canterbury.

Our Henry was devoutly pious and rigid in never permitting before him any licentious language or manners. It is well known that James I had a habit of swearing,—in so-called expletives in conversation, which, in truth, only expressed the warmth of his feelings; but in that age, when Puritanism had already possessed half the nation, an oath was considered as nothing short of blasphemy. Henry once made a keen allusion to this verbal frailty of his father's; for when he was told that some hawks were to be sent to him, but it was thought that the king would intercept some of them, he replied 'He may do as he pleases, for he shall not be put to the oath for the matter.' The king once asking him what were the best verses he had learned in the first book of Virgil, Henry answered, These:

Rex erat Æneas nobis quo iunior alter
Nec pietate fuit, nec bello major et armis.

Such are a few of the puerile anecdotes of a prince who died in early youth, gleaned from a contemporary manuscript, by an eye and ear witness. They are trifles, but trifes consecrated by his name. They are genuine: and the philosopher knows how to value the indications of a great and heroic character. There are among them some, which may occasion an inattentive reader to forget that they are all the speeches and the actions of a child!

THE DIARY OF A MASTER OF THE CEREMONIES.

Of court-etiquette, few are acquainted with its mysticisms, and still fewer have lost themselves in its labyrinth of forms. Whence its origin? Perhaps from those grave and courtly Italians, who, in their petty pompous courts, made the whole business of their effeminate days consist in punctillios; and, wanting realities to keep themselves alive, affected the mere shadows of life and action, in a world of these mockeries of state. It suited well the genius of a people who boasted of elementary works, to teach low affronts were to be given, and how to be taken; and who had some reason to pride themselves in producing the Cortigiano di Castiglione, and the Galateo di Della Casa. They carried this refining temper into the most trivial circumstances, when a court was to be the theatre and monarch and their representatives the actors. Precedence, and other honorary discriminations, establish the useful distinctions of ranks, and of individuals; but their minute court forms, subtilised by Italian conceits, with an erudition of precedents, and a logic of nice distinctions, imparted a touch of dignity of science to the solemn soporifics of a master of the ceremonies, who exhausted all the faculties of his soul on the equiponderance of the first place of inferior degree with the last of a superior; who turned into a political contest the placing of a chair and a stool; made a scorpion at the stairs' head, or at the door, raise a clash between two rival nations; a visit out of time require a negotiation of three months; or an awkward invitation produce a sudden fit of sickness; while many a rising antagonist, in the formidable shapes of ambassadors, were ready to despatch a courier to their courts, for the omission or neglect, of a single punctillio. The pride of nations, in peaceful times, has only three means to maintain their jealousy of power: yet should not the people be grateful to the sovereign who confines his campaigns to his drawing-room; whose field-marshal is a tripping master of the ceremonies; whose stratagems are only to save the inviolability of court-etiquette; and whose battles of peace are only for precedence?

When the Earls of Holland and Carlisle, our ambassadors extraordinary to the court of France in 1624, were at Paris, to treat of the marriage of Charles with Henrietta, and to join in a league against Spain, before they showed their propositions, they were desirous of ascertaining in what manner Cardinal Richelieu would receive them. The Marquis of Ville-aux-Ciers was employed in this negotiation, which appeared at least as important as the marriage and the league. He brought for answer, that the cardinal would receive them as he did the ambassadors of the Emperor and the King of Spain; that he could not give them the right hand in his own house, because he never honoured in this way those ambassadors; but that, in reconducting them out of his room, he would go farther than he was accustomed to do, provided that they would permit him to cover this unusual proceeding with a pretext, that the others might not draw any consequences from it in their favour. Our ambassadors did not disapprove of this expedient, but they begged time to receive the instructions of his majesty. As this would create a considerable delay, they proposed another, which would set at rest, for the moment, the punctillio. They observed, that if the cardinal would feign himself sick, they would go to see him: on which the cardinal immediately went to bed, and an interview, so important to both nations, took place, and articles of great difficulty were discussed, by the cardinal's bedside! When the Nuncio Spada would have made the cardinal jealous of the pretensions of the English ambassadors, and reproached him with yielding his precedence to them, the cardinal denied this. 'I never go before them, it is true, but likewise I never accompany them; I wait for them only in the chamber of audience, either seated in the most honourable place, or standing, till the table is ready: I am always the first to speak, and the first to be seated; and besides I have never chosen to return their visit, which has made the Earl of Carlisle so outrageous.*

Such was the ludicrous gravity of those court-etiquettes, or punctillios, combined with political consequences, of which I am now to exhibit a picture.

When James I ascended the throne of his united kingdoms, and promised himself and the world long halcyon days of peace, foreign princes, and a long train of ambassadors from every European power, resorted to the English court. The pacific monarch, in emulation of an office which already existed in the courts of Europe, created that of Master of the Ceremonies, after the mode of France, observes Roger Coke.† This was now found necessary to preserve the state, and allay the perpetual jealousies of the representatives of their sovereigns. The first officer was Sir Lewis Lewknor,‡ with an assistant, Sir John Finett, who, at length, succeeded him under Charles I, and seems to have been more amply blest with the genius of the place; his soul doated on the honour of the office; and in that age of peace and of ceremony, we may be astonished at the subtlety of his inventive shifts and contrivances, in quieting that school of angry and rigid boys whom he had under his care—the ambassadors of Europe!

Sir John Finett, like a man of genius, in office, and living too in an age of diaries, has not resisted the pleasant labour of perpetuating his own narrative.§ He has told every circumstance with a chronological exactitude, which passed in his province as master of the ceremonies; and when we consider that he was a busy actor amidst the whole diplomatic corps, we shall not be surprised by discovering, in this small volume of great curiosity, a vein of secret and authentic history; it throws a new light on many important events, in which the historians of the times are deficient, who had not the knowledge of this assiduous observer. But my present purpose is not to treat Sir John with all the ceremonious punctilios, of which he was himself the arbiter; nor to quote him on grave subjects, which future historians may well do.

§ I give the title of this rare volume, 'Finett Philoxenus Some choice observations of Sir John Finett, Knight, and master of the ceremonies to the two last kings; touching the reception and precedence, the treatment and audience, the punctillios and contents of foreign ambassadors in England. Legum Illicitum Mundum, 1656.' This very curious diary was published after the author's death, by his friend James Howell, the well-known writer; and Olfyn, whose literary curiosity scarcely anything in our domestic literature has escaped, has analysed the volume with his accustomed care. Its mentions that there was a manuscript in being, more full than the one published; of which I have not been able to learn further.

This volume contains the ruptures of a morning, and the peace-makings of an evening; sometimes it tells of 'a clash between the Savoy and Florence ambassadors for precedence';—now of 'questions betwixt the Imperial and Venetian ambassadors, concerning titles and visits,' how they were to address one another, and who was to pay the first visit!—then 'the Frenchman takes exceptions about placing.' This historian of the levee now records, 'that the French ambassador gets ground of the Spanish;' but soon after, so eventual were these drawing room politics, that a day of festival has passed away in suspense, while a privy council has been hastily summoned, to inquire why the French ambassador had 'a deflection of rheum in his teeth, besides a fit of the ague,' although he hoped to be present at the same festival next year! or being invited to a mask, declared 'his stomach would not agree with cold meats': 'thereby pointing' (shrewdly observes Sir John) 'at the invitation and presence of the Spanish ambassador, who, at the mask the Christmas before, had appeared in the first place.'

Sometimes we discover our master of the ceremonies disentangling himself, and the lord chamberlain, from the most provoking perplexities, by a clever and civil lie. Thus it happened, when the Muscovite ambassador would not yield precedence to the French nor Spaniard. On this occasion, Sir John, at his wits end, contrived an obscure situation, in which the Russ imagined he was highly honoured, as there he enjoyed a full sight of the king's face, though he could see nothing of the entertainment itself; while the other ambassadors were so kind as 'not to take exception,' not caring about the Russian, from the remoteness of his country, and the little interest that court then had in Europe! But Sir John displayed even a bolder invention when the Muscovite, at his reception at Whitehall, complained that only one lord was in waiting at the stairs-head, while no one had met him in the court-yard. Sir John assured him that in England it was considered a greater honour to be received by one lord than by two!

Sir John discovered all his acumen in the solemn investigation of 'Which was the upper end of the table?' Arguments and inferences were deduced from precedents quoted; but as precedents sometimes look contrary ways, this affair might still have remained sub judice, had not Sir John oracularly pronounced that 'in spite of the chimneys in England, where the best man sits is that end of the table.' Sir John, indeed, would often take the most enlarged view of things; as when the Spanish ambassador, after hunting with the king at Theobalds, dined with his majesty in the privy chamber, his son Don Antonio dined in the council chamber with some of the king's attendants. Don Antonio seated himself on a stool at the end of the table. 'One of the gentlemen ushers took exception at this, being, he said, irregular and unusual, that place being ever wont to be reserved empty for state!' In a word, no person in the world was ever to sit on that stool; but Sir John, holding a conference before he chose to disturb the Spanish grandee, finally determined that this was the superstition of a gentleman-usher, and it was therefore neglected. Thus Sir John could, at a critical moment, exert a more liberal spirit, and risk an empty stool against a little ease and quiet; which were no common occurrences with that martyr of state, a master of ceremonies!

But Sir John, to me he is so entertaining a personage that I do not care to get rid of him, had to overcome difficulties which stretched his fine genius on tenter hooks. Once, rarely did the like unlucky accident happen to the wary master of the ceremonies, did Sir John exceed the civility of his instructions, or rather his half-instructions. Being sent to invite the Dutch ambassador, and the States' commissioners, then a young and new government, to the ceremonies of St George's day, they inquired whether they should have the same respect paid to them as other ambassadors? The bland Sir John, out of the milkiness of his blood, said he doubted it not. As soon, however, as he returned to the lord chamberlain, he discovered, that he had been sought for up and down, to stop the invitation. The lord chamberlain said, Sir John had exceeded his commission, if he had invited the Dutchmen 'to stand in the closet of the queen's side; because the Spanish ambassador would never endure them so near him, where there was but a thin wainscot board between, and a window which might be opened!' Sir John said gently, he had done no otherwise than he had been desired; which, however, the lord chamberlain, in part, denied, (cautious and civil!) 'and I was not so unmannerly as to contend against, (supple, but uneasy!)' This affair ended miserably for the poor Dutchmen. Those new republicans were then regarded with the most jealous contempt by all the ambassadors, and were just venturing on their first dancing steps, to move among crowned heads. The Dutch now resolved not to be present; declaring they had just received an urgent invitation, from the Earl of Exeter, to dine at Wimbledon. A piece of supercherie to save appearances; probably the happy contrivance of the combined geniuses of the lord chamberlain and the master of the ceremonies!

I will now exhibit some curious details from these archives of fantastical state, and paint a courtly world, where politics and civility seem to have been at perpetual variance.

When the Palatine arrived in England to marry Elizabeth, the only daughter of James the First, 'the feasting and jollity' of the court were interrupted by the discontent of the archduke's ambassador, of which these were the material points:

Sir John waited on him, to honour with his presence the solemnity on the second or third days, either to dinner or supper, or both.

The archduke's ambassador paused: with a troubled countenance inquiring whether the Spanish ambassador was invited? 'I answered, answerable to my instructions in case of such demand, that he was sick, and could not be there. He was yesterday, quoth he, so well, as that the offer might have very well been made him, and perhaps accepted.'

To this Sir John replied, that the French and Venetian ambassadors holding between them one course of correspondence, and the Spanish and the archduke's another, their invitations had been usually joint.

This the archduke's ambassador denied; and affirmed, that they had been separately invited to Marks, &c, but he had never;—that France had always yielded precedence to the archduke's predecessors, when they were but Dukes of Burgundy, of which he was ready to produce 'ancient proofs'; and that Venice was a mean republic, a sort of burghers, and a handful of territory, compared to his monarchical sovereign;—and to all this he added, that the Venetian bragged of the frequent favours he had received.

Sir John returns in great distress to the lord chamberlain and his majesty. A solemn declaration is drawn up, in which James I most gravely laments that the archduke's ambassador has taken this offence; but his majesty offers these most cogent arguments in his own favour: that the Venetian had announced to his majesty, that his republic had ordered his men new liveries on the occasion, an honour, he adds, not usual with princes—the Spanish ambassador, not finding himself well for the first day (because, by the way, he did not care to dispute precedence with the Frenchman,) his majesty conceiving that the solemnity of the marriage being one continued act through divers days, it admitted neither præsumptus nor posterioris: and then James proves too much, by boldly asserting, that the last day should be taken for the greatest day! As in other cases, for instance in that of Christmas, where Twelfth-day, the last day, is held as the greatest!

But the French and Venetian ambassadors, so carried by the Spanish and the archduke's, were themselves not less chary, and crustily fastidious. The insolent Frenchman first attempted to take precedence of the Prince of Wales; and the Venetian stood upon this point, that they should sit on chairs, though the prince had but a stool; and, particularly, that the carver should not stand before him! 'But,' adds Sir John, 'neither of them prevailed in their reasonless pretences.'

Nor was it peaceable even at the nuptial dinner, which closed with the following catastrophe of etiquette:

Sir John having ushered among the countesses the lady of the French ambassador, he left her to the ranging of the lord chamberlain, who ordered she should be placed at the able next beneath the countesses and above the baronesses, but to ! 'The viscountess of Effingham standing to her woman's right, and possessed already of her proper place as she called it,) would not remove lower, so held the hand of the ambassatrice, till after dinner, when the French ambassador, informed of the difference and opposition, stood out for his wife's coach.' With great trouble, the French lady was persuaded to stay, the Countess of Kilbre, and the Viscountess of Haddington, making no scruple of yielding their places. Sir John, unbending his ravity, facetiously adds, 'The Lady of Effingham, in the interim, forbearing (with rather too much than too little teach) both her supper and her company.' This spoilt bird of quality, tugging at the French ambassadress to keep her down, mortified to be seated at the side of the French woman that day, frowning and frowned on, and using superfluous to bed, passed the wedding-day of the 'abstine and Princess Elizabeth, like a cross girl on a run.

One of the most subtle of these men of punctillio, and he most troublesome, was the Venetian ambassador; for he has his particular aptitude to find fault, and pick out objections among all the others of his body.

On the marriage of the Earl of Somerset, the Venetians were invited to the mask, but not the dinner, as last year to reverse had occurred. The Frenchman, who drew always with the Venetian, at this moment chose to act by himself on the watch of precedence, jealous of the Spaniard newly arrived. When invited, he inquired if the Spanish ambassador was to be there? and humbly beseeched his majesty to be excused from indisposition. We shall now see Sir John put into the most lively action, by the subtle Venetian.

'I was scarcely back at court with the French ambassador's answer, when I was told, that a gentleman from the Venetian ambassador had been to seek me; who, arriving at last found me, said that his lord desired me, that ever I would do him favour, I would take the pains to come to him instantly. I, winding the cause to be some bon buzz gotten into his brain, from some intelligence he had from the French of that morning's proceeding, exacted my present coming, that I might take further instructions from the lord chamberlain; wherewith as soon as I was sufficiently armed, I went to the Venetian.'

But the Venetian would not confer with Sir John, though he sent for him in such a hurry, except in presence of his own secretary. Then the Venetian desired Sir John to repeat the words of his invitation, and those also of his own answer! which poor Sir John actually did! For he adds, 'I yielded, but not without discovering my insatiation to be so peremptorily pressed on, as if he had meant to trip me.'

The Venetian having thus compelled Sir John to concur both invitation and answer, gravely complimented him on his correctness to a title! Yet still was the Venetian not in less trouble: and now he confessed that the king had given a formal invitation to the French ambassador, and not to him!

This was a new stage in this important negotiation: it had all the diplomatic sagacity of Sir John, to extract a secrecy; and which was, that the Frenchman had, indeed, conveyed the intelligence secretly to the Venetian. Sir John now acknowledged that he had suspected as much when he received the message, and not to be taken by surprise, he had come prepared with a long apology, ending for peace sake, with the same formal invitation for the Venetian. Now the Venetian insisted again that Sir John should deliver the invitation in the same precise words as it had been given to the Frenchman. Sir John, with his never-failing courtly docility, performed it to a syllable. Neither both parties during all those proceedings could find moving a risible muscle at one another, our grave history records not.

The Venetian's final answer seemed now perfectly satisfactory, declaring he would not excuse his absence as the Frenchman had, on the most frivolous pretence; and further, he expressed his high satisfaction with last year's essential testimony of the royal favour, in the public thanks conferred on him, and regretted that the quiet of his majesty should be so frequently disturbed by these trifles, about invitations, which so often 'over-thronged moments at the feast.'

Sir John now imagined that all was happily concluded, was retiring with the sweetness of a dove, and the swiftness of a mouse, to fly to the lord chamberlain,— when behold the Venetian would not relinquish his hold, but turned on him 'with the reading of another scruple, et hinc illa lacrima! asking whether the archduke's ambassador was also invited?' Poor Sir John, to keep himself clear 'from categorical asseverations,' declared 'he could not resolve him.' Then the Venetian observed, 'Sir John was dissembling! and he hoped and imagined that Sir John had in his instructions, that he was first to have gone to him (the Venetian,) and on his return to the archduke's ambassador.' Matters now threatened to be as irreconcilable as ever, for it seems the Venetian was standing on the point of precedence with the archduke's ambassador. The political Sir John, wishing to gratify the Venetian at no expense, adds, 'he thought it ill manners to mar a belief of an ambassador's making;—and so allowed him to think that he had been invited before the archduke's ambassador!'

This Venetian proved himself to be, to the great torment of Sir John, a stupendous genius in his own way, ever on the watch to be treated al paro di testa coronato—equal with crowned heads; and, when at a tilt, refused being placed among the ambassadors of Savoy and the States-general, &c, while the Spanish and French ambassadors were seated alone on the opposite side. The Venetian declared that this would be a diminution of his quality; the first place of an inferior degree being ever held worse than the last of a superior. This refined observation delighted Sir John, who dignifies it as an axiom, yet afterwards came to doubt it with a sed hoc quære—query this! If it be true in politics, it is not so in common sense according to the proverbs of both nations; for the honest English declares, that 'Better be the head of the yeomanry than the tail of the gentry!' while the subtle Italian has it, 'E meglio esser testa di Luccio, che coda di Stiorione;' better be the head of a pike than the tail of a sturgeon.' But before we quit Sir John, let us hear him in his own words, reasoning with that fine critical tact, which he undoubtedly possessed, on right and left hands, but reasoning with infinite modesty as well as genius. Hear this sage of punctillios, this philosopher of courtesies.

'The Axiom before delivered by the Venetian ambassador was judged, upon discourse I had with some of understanding, to be of value in a distinct company, but might be otherwise in a joint assembly.' And then Sir John, like a philosophical historian, explores some great public event—'As at the conclusion of the peace at Urvins (the only part of the peace he cared about,) the French and Spanish meeting, contended for precedence—who should sit at the right hand of the pope's legate; an expedient was found, of sending into France for the pope's nuncio residing there, who, seated at the right hand of the said legate (the legate himself sitting at the table's end,) the French ambassador being offered the choice of the next place, he took that at the legate's left hand, leaving the second at the right hand to the Spanish, who, taking it, persuaded himself to have the better of it; sed de hoc quære.' How modestly, yet how shrewdly insinuated!

So much, if not too much, of the Diary of a Master of the Ceremonies; where the important personages strangely contrast with the frivolity and feppery of their actions.

By this work it appears that all foreign ambassadors were entirely entertained, for their diet, lodgings, coaches, with all their train, at the cost of the English monarch, and on their departure received customary presents of considerable value; from 1000 to 5000 ounces of gilt plate; and in more cases than one, the meanest complaints were made by the ambassadors, about short allowances. That the foreign ambassadors in return made presents to the masters of the ceremonies, from thirty to fifty 'pieces,' or in plate or jewel; and some so grudgingly, that Sir John Finett often vents his indignation, and commemorates the indignity. As thus,—on one of the Spanish ambassadors—extraordinary waiting at Deal for three days, Sir John, 'expecting the wind with the patience' of an hungry entertainment from a close-handed ambassador, as his present to me at his parting from Dover being but an old gilt livery pot, that had lost his felloe not worth above 12 pounds, accompanied with two pair of Spanish gloves to make it almost 15, to my shame and his.' When he left this scurvy ambassador-extraordinary to his fate aboard the ship, he exults that 'the cross-winds held him in the Downs almost a seven-night before they would blow him over.'

From this mode of receiving ambassadors, two inconveniences resulted; their perpetual jars of punctillios; and their singular intrigues to obtain precedence, which so complete, y narrated the patience of the most pacific sovereign, that James was compelled to make great alterations in his domestic comforts, and was perpetually embroiled in the most ridiculous contests. At length Charles I perceived the great charge of these embassies, ordinary and extraordinary, often on frivolous pretences; and with an empty treasury, and an uncomplying parliament, he grew less anxious for such ruinous honours.* He gave notice to foreign ambassadors, that he should not any more 'defray their diet, nor provide coaches for them, &c.' 'This frugal purpose' cost Sir John many altercations, who seems to view it, as the glory of the British monarch being on the wane. The unsettled state of Charles was appearing in 1636, by the querulous narrative of the master of the ceremonies; the etiquettes of the court were disturbed by the erratic course of its great star; and the master of the ceremonies was reduced to keep blank letters to superscribe, and address to any nobleman who was to be found, from the absence of the great officers of state. On this occasion the ambassador of the Duke of Mantova, who had long desired his parting audience, when the king objected to the unfitness of the place he was then in, replied, that 'if it were under a tree, it should be to him as a palace.'

Yet although we smile at this science of etiquette and these rigid forms of ceremony, when they were altogether discarded, a great statesman lamented them, and found the inconvenience and mischief in the political consequences which followed their neglect. Charles II, who was no admirer of these regulated formalities of court-etiquette, seems to have broken up the pomp and pride of the former master of the ceremonies; and the grave and the great chancellor of human nature, as Warburton calls Clarendon, censured and felt all the inconveniences of this open intercourse of an ambassador with the king. Thus he observed in the case of the Spanish ambassador, who, he writes, 'took the advantage of the license of the court, where no rules of formalities were yet established (and to which the king himself was not enough inclined) but all doors open to all persons; which the ambassador finding, he made himself a domestic, came to the king at all hours, and spake to him when, and as long as he would without any ceremony, or desiring an audience according to the old custom; but came into the bed-chamber while the king was dressing himself, and mingled in all discourses with the same freedom he would use in his own. And from this never heard-of license, introduced by the French and the Spaniard at this time without any dislike in the king, though not permitted in any court in Christendom, many inconveniences and mischiefs broke in, which could never be shut out.'*

DIARIES.—MORAL, HISTORICAL, AND CRITICAL.

We converse with the absent by letters, and with ourselves by diaries; but vanity is more gratified by dedicating its time to the little labours which have a chance of immediate notice and may circulate from hand to hand, than by the honest pages of a volume reserved only for solitary contemplation; or to be a future relic of ourselves, when we shall no more hear of ourselves.

Marcus Antoninus's celebrated work entitled Tower's Travels Of the things which concern himself, would be a good definition of the use and purpose of a diary. Shaftesbury calls a diary, 'A Faultbook,' intended for self-correction; and a Colonel Hardwood in the reign of Charles I kept a diary, which, in the spirit of the times, he entitled 'Slip, Infirmities, and Passages of providence.' Such a diary is a moral instrument, should the writer exercise

* Charles I. had, however adopted them, and long preserved the stateliness of his court with foreign powers, as appears by these extracts from manuscript letters of the time:

Mr. Mead writes to Sir M. Stuteville, July 25, 1629. 'His majesty was wont to answer the French ambassador in his own language; now he speaks in English, and by an interpreter. And so doth Sir Thomas Edmondes to the French king, contrary to the ancient custom: so that altho' of late we have not equalled them in arms, yet now we shall equal them in ceremonies.'

Oct. 31, 1628.

'This day fortnight the States' ambassador going to visit my lord treasurer about some business, whereas his lordship was wont always to bring them but to the stairs' head, he then, after a great deal of courteous resistance on the ambassador's part, attended him through the hall and court-yard, even to the very boot of his coach.' Blane MSS. 4178

it on himself and on all around him. Men then wrote folios concerning themselves; and it sometimes happened, as proved by many that I have examined in manuscript, that often writing in retirement they would write when they had nothing to write.

Diaries must be out of date in a lounging age; although I have myself known several who have continued to practise with pleasure and utility. One of our old writers quaintly observes, that 'the ancients used to take the stomach-pill of self-examination every night. Some used little books, or tablets, which they tied at their girdles, in which they kept a memorial of what they did, against the night-reckoning.' We know that Titus, the delight of mankind as he has been called, kept a diary of all his actions, and when at night he found upon examination that he had performed nothing memorable, he would exclaim 'Amica! diem perdidimus!' Friends! we have lost a day.

Among our own countrymen, in times more favourable for a concentrated mind than in this age of scattered thought and of the fragments of genius, the custom long prevailed and we their posterity are still reaping the benefit of the lonely hours, and diurnal records. It is always pleasing to recollect the name of Alfred, and we have deeply to regret the loss of a manual which this monarch, so strict manager of his time, yet found leisure to pursue; it would have interested us more even than his translations, which have come down to us. Alfred carried in his bosom a memorandum leaves, in which he made collections from his studies, and took so much pleasure in the frequent examination of this journal, that he called it his head-book. In cause, says Spelman, day and night he ever had it in his hand. This manual, as my learned friend Mr. Turner in his elaborate and philosophical Life of Alfred, has shown by some curious extracts from Malmesbury, was the repository of his own occasional literary reflections. An association of ideas connects two other of our illustrious princes with Alfred.

Prince Henry, the son of James I, our English Marcus, who was wept by all the Muses, and mourned by the brave in Britain, devoted a great portion of his time to literary intercourse; and the finest geniuses of the age addressed their works to him, and wrote several at a prince's suggestion: Dallington, in the preface of a curious Aphorisms, Civil and Military, has described Prince Henry's domestic life: 'Myself,' says he, 'the ablest of many in that academy, for so was his family, in this especial employment for his proper use, which he pleased favourably to entertain, and often to read over.'

The diary of Edward VI, written with his own hand conveys a notion of that precocity of intellect, in that educated prince, which would not suffer his infirm heel to relax in his royal duties. This prince was solemnly struck with the feeling that he was not seated on a throne to be a trifler or a sensualist; and this simplicity of mind is very remarkable in the entries of his diary where on one occasion, to remind himself of the cause of his secret proffer of friendship to aid the Emperor Germany with men against the Turk, and to keep it present secret from the French court, the young monarch inserts, 'this was done on intent to get some friend. The reasonings be in my desk.' So zealous was he have before him a state of public affairs, that often in the middle of the month he recalls to mind passages which had omitted in the beginning: what was done every day of moment, he retired into his study to set down. As James II wrote with his own hand the daily occurrence of his times, his reflections and conjectures; and he treasured up his materials for history than 'perhaps a sovereign prince has left behind him.' Adversity schooled him into reflection, and softened into humane spirit of bigotry; and it is something in his favour, after his abdication he collected his thoughts, and mortified himself by the penance of a diary. Could a Cæsar or a Cromwell have composed one? Neither of these could suffer solitude and darkness; they started at casual recollections!—what would they have done, if memory marshalled their crimes, and arranged them in the terrors of chronology?

When the national character retained more original and individuality than our monotonous habits now, our later ancestors displayed a love of application, and was a source of happiness, quite lost to us. Till the middle of the last century, they were as great economists of their time, as of their estates; and few with them were one hurried, yet tedious festival. Living more well himself, more separated, they were therefore more original in their prejudices, their principles, and in the conclusion of their minds. They resided more on their estates, and the metropolis was usually resigned to the men of trade in their royal Exchange, and the preferment was among the back-stairs at Whitehall. Lord Clarendon tells us in his 'Life' that his grand-father in James I.'s time had never been in London after the death of Elizabeth, though he lived thirty years afterwards; and a wife, to whom he had been married forty years, had never once visited the metropolis. On this fact he makes serious observation; 'The wisdom and frugality of that age being such, that few gentlemen made journeys to London, or any other expensive journey, but upon important business, and their wives never; by which providence they enjoyed and improved their estates in the country, and kept good hospitality in their house, brought up their children well, and were beloved by their neighbours.' This will appear a very coarse homespun happiness, and we must seem very gross virtues to our artificial feelings; it is a surely created a national character; made a point of every country gentleman; and, finally, produced the civil war some of the most sublime and original characters that ever acted a great part on the theatre of man's life.

This was the age of Diaries! The head of almost every family formed one. Ridiculous people may have written solennis diaries, as Elias Ashmole's; but many of our greatest characters in public life have left such monuments in their diurnal labours.

These diaries were a substitute to every thinking man's newspapers, magazines, and annual registers; but we who imagine that these are a substitute for the scenic and dramatic life of the diary of a man of genius, like Swift who wrote one, or even of a sensible observer, who sat amidst the scenes he describes, only show that they are better acquainted with the mere ephemeral and equal labours.

There is a curious passage in a letter of Sir Thomas Browne, recommending to Sir Francis Bacon, then a young man on his travels, the mode by which he should make his journey profitable to his country and his friends.' His expressions are remarkable. 'Let all these riches be treasured not only in your memory, where time may lessen your stock, but rather in good writings and books of account, which will keep them safe for your use hereafter.' By his good writings and books of account, he describes the view of a student and an observer; these 'good writings' preserve what wear out in the memory, and these books of account render to a man an account of himself himself.

It was this solitary reflection and industry which assuredly contributed so largely to form the gigantic minds of Seldens, the Camdens, the Cokes, and others of that great age of genius. When Coke fell into disgrace, he retired into private life, the discarded statesman did not make himself into a lethargy, but on the contrary seemed almost to rejoice that an opportunity was at length afforded him of indulging in studies more congenial to his age. Then he found leisure not only to revise his law writings, which were thirty volumes written with his own hand, but what most pleased him, he was enabled to write a manual, which he called Vade Mecum, and which contained a retrospective view of his life, since he noted in it the most remarkable occurrences which had happened to him. It is not probable that such a work could have been destroyed but by accident; and it might, perhaps, yet be recovered.

The interest of the public was the business of Camden's; observes Bishop Gibson; and, indeed, this was the secret of the men of that age. Camden kept a diary of occurrences in the reign of James I.; not that at his advanced age, and with his infirm health, he could ever hope that he should make use of these materials; but that this, inspired by the love of truth, and of that labour and delights in preparing its materials for posterity. Bishop Gibson has made an important observation on the use of such a diary, which cannot be too often repeated to those who have the opportunities of forming one; and whom I transcribe it. 'Were this practised by persons burning and curiosity, who have the opportunities of being into the public affairs of a kingdom, the short hints and sketches of this kind would often set things in a truer and more regular histories.'

A student of this class was Sir Symonds D'Ewes, an independent country gentleman, to whose zeal we owe the valuable journals of parliament in Elizabeth's reign, and who has left in manuscript a voluminous diary, from which may be drawn some curious matters. In the preface to his journals, he has presented a noble picture of his literary reveries, and the intended productions of his pen. They will animate the youthful student, and show the active genius of the gentlemen of that day; the present diarist observes, 'Having now finished these volumes, I have already entered upon other and greater labours, conceiving myself not to be born for myself alone.'

'Qui vivat sibi solus, homo sequit esse beatus,
Malo mori, nam sic vivere nolo mihi.'

He then gives a list of his intended historical works, and adds 'These I have proposed to myself to labour in, besides diverse others, smaller works: like him that shoots at the sun, not in hopes to reach it, but to shoot as high as possibly his strength, art, or skill, will permit. So though I know it impossible to finish all these during my short and uncertain life, having already entered into the thirtieth year of my age, and having many unavoidable cares of an estate and family, yet if I can finish a little in each kind, it may hereafter stir up some able judges to add an end to the whole:

'Sic mihi contingat vivere, atque mori.'

Richard Baxter, whose facility and diligence, it is said, produced one hundred and forty-five distinct works, wrote, he himself says, 'in the crowd of all my other employments.' Assuredly the one which may excite astonishment is his voluminous auto-biography, forming a folio of more than seven hundred closely-printed pages; a history which takes a considerable compass, from 1615 to 1648; whose writer pries into the very seed of events, and whose personal knowledge of the leading actors of his times throws a perpetual interest over his lengthened pages. Yet this was not written with a view of publication by himself; he still continued this work, till time and strength wore out the hand that could no longer hold the pen, and left it to the judgment of others, whether it should be given to the world.

These were private persons. It may excite our surprise to discover that our statesmen, and others engaged in active public life, occupied themselves with the same habitual attention to what was passing around them in the form of diaries, or their own memoirs, or in forming collections for future times, with no possible view but for posthumous utility. They seem to have been inspired by the most genuine passion of patriotism, and an awful love of posterity. What motive less powerful could induce many noblemen and gentlemen to transcribe volumes; to transmit to posterity authentic narratives, which would not even admit of contemporary notice; either because the facts were then well known to all, or of so secret a nature as to render them dangerous to be communicated to their own times. They sought neither fame nor interest; for many collections of this nature have come down to us without even the names of the scribes, which have been usually discovered by accidental circumstances. It may be said, that this toil was the pleasure of idle men—the idlers then were of a distinct race from our own. There is scarcely a person of reputation among them, who has not left such laborious records of himself. I intend drawing up a list of such diaries and memoirs; which derive their importance from the diarists themselves. Even the women of this time partook of the same thoughtful dispositions. It appears that the Duchess of York, wife of James II, and the daughter of Clarendon drew up a narrative of his life; the celebrated Duchess of Newcastle has formed a dignified biography of her husband: Lady Fanshawe's Memoirs are partially known by some curious extracts; and recently Mrs Hutchinson's Memoirs of her Colonel delighted every curious reader.

Whitelocke's 'Memorials' is a diary full of important public matters; and the noble editor, the Earl of Anglesea, observes, that 'our author not only served the state, in several stations, both at home and in foreign countries, but likewise conversed with books, and made himself a large provision from his studies and contemplation, like that noble Roman Portius Cato, as described by Nepos. He was all along so much in business, one would not imagine he ever had leisure for books; yet, who considers his studies might believe he had been always shut up with his friend Selden, and the dust of action never fallen on his gown.' When Whitelocke was sent on an embassy to Sweden, he journalized it; it amounts to two bulky quartos, extremely curious. He has even left us a history of England.

Yet all is not told of Whitelocke; and we have deeply to regret the loss, or at least the concealment, of a work addressed to his family, which apparently would be still more interesting, as exhibiting his domestic habits and feelings; and affording a model for those in public life, who had the spirit to imitate such greatness of mind, of which we have not many examples. Whitelocke had drawn up a great work, which he entitled 'Remembrances of the Labours of Whitelocke in the Annals of his Life, for the Instruction of his Children.' To Dr Morton, the editor of Whitelocke's 'Journal of the Swedish Embassy,' we owe the notice of this work, and I shall transcribe his dignified feelings in regretting the want of these MSS. 'Such a work, and by such a father, is become the inheritance of every child, whose abilities and station in life may at any time hereafter call upon him to deliberate for his country—and for his family and person, as parts of the great whole; and I confess myself to be one of those who lament the suppression of that branch of the Annals which relates to the author himself in his private capacity; they would have afforded great pleasure, as well as instruction, to the world in their entire form. The first volume, containing the first twenty years of his life, may one day see the light; but the greatest part has hitherto escaped my inquiries.' This is all we know of a work of equal moral and philosophical curiosity. The preface, however, to these 'Remembrances' has been fortunately preserved, and it is an extraordinary production. In this it appears that Whitelocke himself owed the first idea of his own work to one left by his father, which existed in the family, and to which he repeatedly refers his children. He says, 'The memory and worth of your deceased grandfather deserves all honour and imitation, both from you and me; his LIBER FAMILIARIS, his own story, written by himself, will be left to you, and was an encouragement and precedent to this larger work.' Here is a family picture quite new to us; the heads of the house are its historians, and these records of the heart were animated by examples and precepts, drawn from their own bosoms; and as Whitelocke feelingly expresses it, 'all is recommended to the perusal, and intended for the instruction of my own house, and almost in every page you will find a dedication to you, my dear children.'

The habit of laborious studies, and a zealous attention to the history of his own times, produced the Register and Chronicle of Bishop Kennett, 'containing matters of fact, delivered in the words of the most authentic papers and records, all daily entered and commented on: it includes an account of all pamphlets as they appeared. This history, more valuable to us than to his own contemporaries, occupied two large folios; of which only one has been printed, a zealous labour, which could only have been carried on from a motive of pure patriotism. It is, however, but a small part of the diligence of the bishop, since his own manuscripts form a small library of themselves.

The malignant vengeance of Prynne in exposing the diary of Laud to the public eye lost all its purpose, for nothing appeared more favourable to Laud than this exposition of his private diary. We forget the harshness in the personal manners of Laud himself, and sympathize even with his errors, when we turn over the simple leaves of this diary, which obviously was not intended for any purpose but for his own private eye and collected meditations. There his whole heart is laid open; his errors are not concealed, and the purity of his intentions is established. Laud, who had too haughtily blended the prime minister with the archbishop, still, from conscientious motives, in the hurry of public duties, and in the pomp of public honours, could steal aside into solitude, to account to God and himself for every day, and 'the evil thereof.'

The diary of Henry Earl of Clarendon, who inherited the industry of his father, has partly escaped destruction; it presents us with a picture of the manners of the age; from whence, says Bishop Douglas, we may learn that at the close of the last century, a man of the first quality made it his constant practice to pass his time without shaking his arm at a gaming table, associating with jockies at Newmarket, or murdering time by a constant round of giddy dissipation, if not of criminal indulgence. Diaries were not uncommon in the last age: Lord Anglesey, who made so great a figure in the reign of Charles II, left one behind him; and one said to have been written by the Duke of Shrewsbury still exists.

But the most admirable example is Lord Clarendon's History of his own 'Life,' or rather of the court, every event and person passing before him. In this masterpiece he copies nature with freedom, and has equally touched the individual character. There that great man opens the most concealed transactions, and tells the views of the most opposite dispositions; and then engaged, when in exile, in furthering the royal interests with the loyalists, and when, on the restoration, conducting the difficult affairs of a great nation, a careless monarch, and a dissipated court, yet besides his inner history of the civil wars, 'the chancellor of human nature' passed his life in habitual reflection, and his pen in idleness and employment. Such was the admirable industry of our later ancestors; their diaries and their memoirs are monuments!

James II is an illustrious instance of the admirable industry of our ancestors. With his own hand this prince wrote down the chief occurrences of his times, and of his instant reflections and conjectures. Perhaps no sovereign prince, said Macpherson, has been known to be left behind him better materials for history. We at least possess a considerable portion of his diary, which is that of a man of business and of honest intentions, containing many remarkable facts which had otherwise escaped our historians.

The literary man has formed diaries purely of his studies, and the practice may be called journalizing the mind in a summary of studies, and a register of loose hints and notions, that sometimes happily occur; and like Rimborgius, that enthusiast for study, whose animated exhortations to young students have been aptly compared to the sound of a trumpet in the field of battle, marked out every night, before going to sleep, what had been done during the studious day. Of this class of diaries, Gibbon has given us an illustrious model; and there is an unpublished quarto of the late Barré Roberts, a young student of genius, devoted to curious researches, which deserves to meet the public eye. I should like to see a little be published with this title, 'Otium deliciosum in quo objecta vel in actione, vel in lectione, vel in visione, ad singulos dies Anni 1629 observata representantur.' This writer was a German, who boldly published for the course of one year whatever he read or had seen every day in that year. It was an experiment, if honestly performed, this might be a curious to the philosophical observer; but to write down every thing, may end in something like nothing.

A great poetical contemporary of our own country does not think that even DREAMS should pass away unnoticed, and he calls this register, his Nocturnal. His dreams are assuredly poetical; as Lauder, who journalized his, and to have been made up of the affairs of state and religion, the personages are his patrons, his enemies, and others; his dreams are scenical and dramatic. Works of this nature are not designed for the public eye; they are domestic annals, to be guarded in the little archives of a family; they are offerings cast before our Lares.

Pleasant, when youth is long expired, to trace
The forms our pencil or our pen design'd;
Such was our youthful air, and shape and face,
Such the soft image of our youthful mind.

SHAKESPEARE.

LICENSEES OF THE PRESS.

In the history of literature, and perhaps in that of human mind, the institution of the Licensees of the Press and Censors of Books, was a bold invention, designed to counteract that of the Press itself; and even to convert the newly discovered instrument of human freedom into a machine which might serve to perpetuate that system of passive obedience, which had so long enabled modern Rome to dictate her laws to the universe. It was thought possible in the subtlety of Italian Atenies and Spanish monachism to place a sentinel on the very thoughts, as well as on the persons of authors; and in extreme cases, that book might be condemned to the flames, as well as heretics.

Of this institution, the beginnings are obscure, for it originated in caution and fear; but as the work betrays its workman, and the national physiognomy the native, it is evident that so inquisitorial an act could only have originated in the inquisition itself.* Feeble or partial attempt.

* Dr C. Symmons has denounced Sirix IV, as 'the first who placed the press under the control of a state-licensed Life of Milton, p. 214. I am not acquainted with his authority but as Sirix IV, died as early as 1494, I suspect this will mean Sirix V, who was busy enough with this office. M light previously have existed, for we learn that the monks in a part of their libraries called the inferno, which was the part which they least visited, for it contained, or it did, all the prohibited books which they could smuggle to it. But this inquisitorial power assumed its most formidable shape in the council of Trent, when some honey spirits from Rome and Madrid, where they are all governing, foresaw the revolution of this new age of poets. The triple-crowned pontiff had in vain rolled the masters of the Vatican, to strike out of the hands of all the volumes of Wickliffe, of Huss, and of Luther, and even menaced their eager readers with death. At his council Pius IV was presented with a catalogue of books which they denounced that the perusal ought to be forbidden; his bull not only confirmed this list of the ungodly, but added rules how books should be judged.* Subsequent popes enlarged these catalogues, and added to the rules, as the monstrous novelties started up. Inquisitors of books were appointed; at Rome they consisted of certain cardinals and 'the master of the holy palace'; and literary inquisitors were elected at Madrid, at Lisbon, at Naples, and for the Low Countries; they were watching the ubiquity of the human mind. These catalogues of prohibited books were called Indexes; and at Rome a list of these literary despots are still called 'the Congregation of the Index.' The simple Index is a list of condemned books never to be opened; but the Expurgatory Index indicates those only prohibited till they have undergone a purification. No book was to be allowed on any subject, or in any language, which contained a single passage, an ambiguous sentence, even a word, which in the most distant sense, could be construed opposite to the doctrines of the supreme authority of this council of Trent; there it seems to have been enacted, that all men, literate and illiterate, prince and peasant, the Italian, the Spaniard, and the Netherlander should take the mint-stamp of their thoughts from the council of Trent, and millions of souls be struck off at one blow, out of the same used mould.

The sages who compiled these Indexes, indeed, long had reason to imagine that passive obedience was attached to the human character; and therefore they considered, that the publications of their adversaries required no other notice, than a convenient insertion in their Indexes. But the heretics diligently reprinted them with ample prefaces and useful annotations; Dr James, of Oxford, republished a Index with due animadversions. The parties made an Index use of them; while the catholic crossed himself every title, the heretic would purchase no book which had not been indexed. One of their portions exposed a list of those authors whose heads were condemned as well as their books; it was a catalogue of men of genius. The results of these Indexes were somewhat curious. In they were formed in different countries, the opinions are often diametrically opposite to each other. The learned Arias Montanus, who was a chief inquisitor in the Netherlands, and concerned in the Antwerp Index, used to see his own works placed in the Roman Index; and the inquisitor of Naples was so displeased with the Spanish Index, that he persisted to assert, that it had never been printed at Madrid! Men who began by insisting that all the world should not differ from their opinions, ended by not agreeing with themselves. A civil war raged among the Index-makers: and if one criminated, the other retaliated. If one discovered ten places necessary to be expurgated, another found thirty, and a third inclined to put the whole work in the condemned list. The inquisition at length became so doubtful of their own opinions, that they sometimes expressed in their license for printing,

In his history of France, mentions that Philip II, had a large print of books prohibited by the Spanish inquisition; and Paul IV, the following year, 1559, ordered the holy see at Rome to publish a similar catalogue. Such was the use of what was called the Index. However, we have an Index made at Venice in 1543, Feignor's Livres condamnées, the most ancient at the British Museum is one of Antwerp, 1578. The learned Dr James, the first chief librarian of Bodleian, derives this institution from the council of Trent, held in 1542. See 'The Mystery of the Indexes Expurgatory,' p. 372. These Indexes appear to have been very early to be obtained, for Dr James says, that the Index of Antwerp was discovered accidentally by Junius, who reprinted it; Spanish and Portuguese was never known till we took it; and the Roman Index was procured with great trouble.

that they 'tolerated the reading, after the book had been corrected by themselves, till such time as the work should be considered worthy of some further correction.' The expurgatory Indexes excited louder complaints than those which simply condemned books; because the purgers and castrators, as they were termed, or, as Milton calls them, 'the executioners of books,' by omitting, or interpolating passages, made an author say, or unsay, what the inquisitors chose: and their editions, after the death of the authors, were compared to the erasures or forgeries in records; for the books which an author leaves behind him, with his last corrections, are like his last will and testament, and the public are the legitimate heirs of an author's opinions.

The whole process of these expurgatory Indexes, that 'rakes through the entrails of many an old god author, with a violation worse than any could be offered to his tomb,' as Milton says, must inevitably draw off the life-blood, and leave an author a mere spectre! A book in Spain and Portugal passes through six or seven courts before it can be published, and is supposed to recommend itself by the information, that it is published with all the necessary privileges. They would sometimes keep works from publication till they had 'properly qualified them, interem ac calificam,' which in one case is said to have occupied them during forty years. Authors of genius have taken fright at the gripe of 'the master of the holy palace,' or the lacerating scratches of the 'corrector general por su magestad.' At Madrid and Lisbon, and even at Rome, this licensing of books has confined most of their authors to the body of the good fathers themselves.

The Commentaries on the Luciad, by Faria de Souza, had occupied his zealous labours for twenty-five years, and were favourably received by the learned. But the commentator was brought before this tribunal of criticism and religion, as suspected of heretical opinions; when the accuser did not succeed before the inquisitors of Madrid, he carried the charge to that of Lisbon; an injunction was immediately issued to forbid the sale of the Commentaries, and it cost the commentator an elaborate defence, to demonstrate the catholicism of the poet and himself. The Commentators finally were released from perpetual imprisonment.

This system has prospered to admiration, in keeping them all down to a certain meanness of spirit, and happily preserved stationary and childish stupidity through the nation, on which so much depended.

Nani's History of Venice is allowed to be printed, because it contained nothing against princes. Princes then were either immaculate, or historians false. The History of Guicciardini is still scarred with the merciless wound of the papistic censor; and a curious account of the origin and increase of papal power was long wanting in the third and fourth book of his history. Velly's History of France would have been an admirable work, had it not been printed at Paris!

When the insertions in the Index were found of no other use than to bring the peccant volumes under the eyes of the curious, they employed the secular arm in burning them in public places. The history of these literary conflagrations has often been traced by writers of opposite parties; for the truth is, that both used them; zealots seem all formed of one material, whatever be their party. They had yet to learn, that burning was not confuting, and that these public fires were an advertisement by proclamation. The publisher of Erasmus's Colloquies intrigued to procure the burning of his book, which raised the sale to twenty-four thousand!

A curious literary anecdote has reached us of the times of Henry VIII. Tonstall, Bishop of London, whose extreme moderation, of which he was accused at the time, preferred burning books to that of authors, which was then getting into practice; to testify his abhorrence of Tindal's principles, who had printed a translation of the New Testament, a sealed book for the multitude, thought of purchasing all the copies of Tindal's translation, and annihilating them in the common flame. This occurred to him when passing through Antwerp in 1529, then a place of refuge for the Tindalists. He employed an English merchant there for this business, who happened to be a secret follower of Tindal, and acquainted him with the bishop's intention. Tindal was extremely glad to hear of the project, for he was desirous of printing a more correct edition of his version; but the first impression still hung on his hands, and he was too poor to make a new one; he furnished the English merchant with all his unsold copies, which the bishop as eagerly bought, and had them all publicly burnt in Chesapeake: which the people not only declared was 'a burning of the word of God,' but it so inflamed the desire of reading that volume, that the second edition was sought after at any price; and when one of the Tindalists, who was sent here to sell them, was promised by the lord chancellor in a private examination, that he should not suffer if he would reveal who encouraged and supported his party at Antwerp, the Tindalist immediately accepted the offer, and assured the lord chancellor that the greatest encouragement was from Tonstall, the Bishop of London, who had bought up half the impression, and enabled them to produce a second!

* This bull is dated March 26, 1564.

In the reign of Henry VIII, we seem to have burnt books on both sides; it was an age of unsettled opinions; in Edward's, the Catholic works were burnt; and Mary had her Pyramids of Protestant volumes; in Elizabeth's, political pamphlets fed the flames; and libels in the reign of James I, and his sons.

Such was this black dwarf of literature, generated by Italian craft and Spanish monkery, which, however, was fondly adopted as it crept in among all the nations of Europe. France cannot exactly fix on the era of her Censures de Livres;* and we ourselves, who gave it its death-blow, found the custom prevail without any authority from our statutes. The practice of licensing books was unquestionably derived from the inquisition, and was applied here first to books of religion. Britain long groaned under the leaden stamp of an Imprimatur;† and long witnessed men of genius either suffering the vigorous limbs of their productions to be shamefully mutilated in public, or voluntarily committing a literary suicide in their own manuscripts. Camden declared that he was not suffered to print all his Elizabeth, and sent those passages over to De Thou, the French historian, who printed his history faithfully two years after Camden's first edition, 1615.—The same happened to Lord Herbert's History of Henry VIII, which has never been given according to the original. In the Poems of Lord Brooke, we find a lacuna of the first twenty pages: it was a poem on religion, cancelled by the order of Archbishop Laud. The Great Sir Matthew Hale ordered that none of his works should be printed after his death; as he apprehended, that, in the licensing of them, some things might be struck out or altered, which he had observed, not without some indignation, had been done to those of a learned friend; and he preferred bequeathing his uncorrupted ass to the Society of Lincoln's Inn, as their only guardians; hoping that they were a treasure worth keeping.‡ Contemporary authors have frequent allusions to such books, imperfect and mutilated at the caprice or the violence of a licenser.

The laws of England have never violated the freedom and the dignity of its press. 'There is no law to prevent the printing of any book in England, only a decree in the star-chamber,' said the learned Selden.§ Proclamations were occasionally issued against authors and books; and foreign works were, at times, prohibited. The freedom of the press was rather circumvented, than openly attacked, in the reign of Elizabeth; who dreaded those Roman Catholics who were at once disputing her right to the throne, and the religion of the state. Foreign publications, or 'books from any parts beyond the seas,' were therefore prohibited.|| The press, however, was not free under the reign of a sovereign, whose high-toned feelings, and the exigencies of the times, rendered as despotic in deeds, as the pacific James was in words. Although the press had then no restrictions, an author was always at the mercy of the government. Elizabeth too had a keen scent after what she called treason, which she allowed to take in a large compass. She condemned one author (with a publisher) to have the hand cut off which wrote his book and she hanged another.* It was Sir Francis Bacon, his father, who once pleasantly turned aside the keen edge of her regal vindictiveness; for when Elizabeth was inquiring, whether an author, whose book she had given him to examine, was not guilty of treason? he replied, 'Not treason, madam; but of robbery, if you please; for he has taken all that is worth noticing in him from Tacitus as Ballust.' With the fear of Elizabeth before his eyes, Whilshed castrated the volumes of his History. Whilshed Fletcher, after his Russian embassy, congratulated himself with having escaped with his head, and on his turn, wrote a book called 'The Russian Commonwealth describing its tyranny, Elizabeth forbade the publishing the work. Our Russian merchants were frightened, they petitioned the queen to suppress the work; the original petition with the offensive passages exists among Lansdowne manuscripts. It is curious to contrast this fact with another better known, under the reign of William III; then the press had obtained its perfect freedom and even the shadow of the sovereign could not pass between an author and his work. When the Danish ambassador complained to the king of the freedom which Le Molesworth had exercised on his master's government, his account of Denmark; and hinted that, if a Dane had done the same with the King of England, he would, complaint, have taken the author's head off;—'That I can do,' replied the sovereign of a free people, 'but, if I please, I will tell him what you say, and he shall put it in the next edition of his book.' What an immense interposition between the feelings of Elizabeth and William! who hardly a century betwixt them!

James I proclaimed Buchanan's history, and a poem tract of his, at 'the Mercat Cross; and every one was to bring his copy 'to be perused and purged of the offensive extraordinary matters,' under a heavy penalty. Kim whom Milton calls 'the Reformer of a Kingdom,' was so curtailed; and 'the sense of that great man shall, to posterity, be lost for the fearfulness, or the presumptuous rashness of a perfunctory licenser.'

The regular establishment of licensers of the press appeared under Charles I. It must be placed among the projects of Laud, and the king, I suspect, inclined to it, for, by a passage in a manuscript letter of the times, it is that when Charles printed his speech on the dissolution of the parliament, which excited such general discontent some one printed Queen Elizabeth's last speech, as a companion-piece. This was presented to the king by his printer John Bill, not from a political motive, but merely by way of complaint that another had printed without licence or license, that which, as the king's printer, he asserted was his own copy-right. Charles does not appear to have been pleased with the gift, and observed, 'You print print anything.' Three gentlemen of the bed-chamber continued the writer, standing by, commended Mr I very much, and prayed him to come oftener with such liberties to the king, because they might do some good.†

One of the consequences of this persecution of the press was the raising up of a new class of publishers, under the government of Charles I, those who became noted for, it was then called, 'unlawful and unlicensed books.' Sparks

* The author, with his publisher, who had their right hand cut off, was John Stubbs of Lincoln's Inn, a head-headed Puritan, whose sister was married to Thomas Carrwright, head of that faction. This execution took place upon a scaffold, in the market-place at Westminster. After Stubbs had his right hand cut off, with his left he pulled off his hat, cried, with a loud voice, 'God save the queen!' the multitude standing deeply silent, either out of horror at this new and wonted kind of punishment, or else out of commiseration for the man, whose character was unblemished. Camden was a witness to this transaction, has related it. The author and the printer, and the publisher, were condemned to a barbarous punishment, on an act of Philip and Mary, against the authors and publishers of seditious writings. Some years were honest enough to assert that the sentence was rigorous, for that act was only a temporary one, and died with Queen Mary; but, of these honest lawyers, one was sent to the Tower, and another was so sharply reprimanded, that resigned his place as a judge in the common pleas. Of lawyers, as the lord chief justice, who frowned on the prescriptive far more than in the Stuart-reigns, asserted, 'Queen Mary was a king; and that an act made by any king unless repealed, must always exist, because the King of England never dies!'

|| The consequence of this prohibition was, that our own men of learning were at a loss to know what arms the enemies of England, and of her religion, were fabricating against us. This was absolutely necessary, which appears by a curious fact in Strype's Life of Whitgift. There we find a licenser for the importation of foreign books, granted to an Italian merchant, who was to collect abroad this sort of libels; but he was to deposit them with the archbishop and the privy council, &c. A few, no doubt, were obtained by the curious, Catholic or Protestant. Strype's Life of Whitgift, p. 288.

the publisher of Prynne's 'Histriomastix,' was of this class have already entered more particularly into this subject.* The Presbyterian party in Parliament, who thus found the press closed on them, vehemently cried out for its freedom; and it was imagined, that when they had ascended into power, the odious office of a licenser of the press would have been abolished; but these pretended friends of freedom, on the contrary, discovered themselves as tenderly true to the office as the old government, and maintained it with the extremest rigour. Such is the political history of mankind.

The literary fate of Milton was remarkable; his genius was castrated alike by the monarchical and the republican government. The royal licenser expunged several passages from Milton's history, in which Milton had painted the superstition, the pride, and the cunning of the Saxon Monks, which the sagacious licenser applied to Charles II and the Pope; but Milton had before suffered as merciless a mutilation from his old friends the republicans; who suppressed a bold picture, taken from life, which he had introduced into his History of the Long Parliament and Assembly of Divines. Milton gave the unlicensed passages the Earl of Anglesa, a literary nobleman, the editor of Shallock's Memorials; and the castrated passages, which could not be licensed in 1670, was received with similar interest when separately published in 1681.† 'If we be found in an author's book one sentence of a venous edge, uttered in the height of zeal, and who knows whether it might not be the dictate of a divine spirit, yet in mixing every low decrepid humour of their own, they will not pardon him their dash.'

This office seems to have lain dormant a short time under Cromwell, from the scruples of a conscientious licenser, who desired the council of state in 1649 for reasons was, to be discharged from that employment. This habit, the licenser, was evidently deeply touched by Milton's address for 'The Liberty of Unlicensed Printing.' The office was, however, revived on the restoration of Charles II; and through the reign of James II the abuses of licensers were unquestionably not discouraged; their mutilations of books reprinted appear to have been very bad; for in reprinting Gage's 'Survey of the West Indies,' which originally consisted of twenty-two chapters, in 1648 and 1657, with a dedication to Sir Thomas Fairfax, in 1677, after expunging the passages in honour of Fairfax, the dedication is dexterously turned into a eulogy; and the twenty-second chapter being obnoxious to containing particulars of the artifices of 'the papalines,' converting the author, was entirely chopped away by the licenser's hatchet. The castrated chapter, as usual, was preserved afterwards separately. Literary despotism is short-sighted in its views, for the expedients it employs are certain of overturning themselves.

On this subject we must not omit noticing one of the most and most eloquent prose compositions of Milton; the Areopagitica: a Speech for the Liberty of Unlicensed Printing.† It is a work of love and inspiration, breathing the most enlarged spirit of literature; separating, at a awful distance from the multitude, that character who is born to study and to love learning for itself, not for any other end, but, perhaps, for that lasting fame and perpetuity of praise, which God and good men have promised shall be the reward of those whose published labours advance the good of mankind.

One part of this unparalleled effusion turns on 'the policy which ought to be in every licenser.' It will suit new licensers of public opinion, a laborious corps well paid, who constitute themselves without an act of stamper. I shall pick out but a few sentences, that I may insert some little facts, casually preserved, of the ineptitude of such an officer.

He who is made judge to sit upon the birth or death of a book, whether they may be waisted into this world or not, need to be a man above the common measure, both studious, learned and judicious; there may be else no mean mistakes in his censure. If he be of such worth as behoves him, there cannot be a more tedious and unpleasant journey-work, a greater loss of time levied upon his head, than to be made the perpetual reader of unchosen books and pamphlets. There is no book acceptable, unless at certain seasons; but to be enjoined the reading of that at all times, whereof three pages would not down at any time, is an imposition which I cannot believe how he that values time and his own studies, or is but of a sensible nostril, should be able to endure.—What advantages is it to be a man over it to be a boy at school, if we have only escaped the ferula to come under the fescue of an Imprimatur?—if serious and elaborate writings, as if they were no more than the theme of a grammar lad under his pedagogue, must not be uttered without the cursory eyes of a temporising licenser? When a man writes to the world, he summons up all his reason and deliberation to assist him; he searches, meditates, is industrious, and likely consults and confers with his judicious friends, as well as any that writ before him; if in this, the most consummate act of his fidelity and ripeness, no years, no industry, no former proof of his abilities, can bring him to that state of maturity, as not to be still mistrusted and suspected, unless he carry all his considerate diligence, all his midnight watchings, and expense of Palladian oil, to the hasty view of an unlicensed licenser, perhaps much his younger, perhaps far his inferior in judgment, perhaps one who never knew the labour of book-writing; and if he be not repulsed or slighted, must appear in print like a Punie with his guardian, and his censor's hand on the back of his title to be his bail and surety that he is no idiot or seducer; it cannot be but a dishonour and derogation to the author, to the book, to the privilege and dignity of learning.

The reader may now follow the stream in the great original; I must, however, preserve one image of exquisite sarcasm.

'Debtors and delinquents walk about without a keeper; but inoffensive books must not stir forth without a visible jailor in their title; nor is it to the common people less than a reproach: for if we dare not trust them with an English pamphlet, what do we but censure them for a giddy, vicious, and ungrounded people, in such a sick and weak state of faith and discretion, as to be able to take nothing but through the glister-pipe of a licenser!'

The ignorance and stupidity of these censors were often, indeed, as remarkable as their exterminating spirit. The noble simile of Milton, of Satan with the rising-sun, in the first book of the Paradise Lost, had nearly occasioned the suppression of our national epic: it was supposed to contain a treasonable allusion. The tragedy of Arminius, by one Paterson, who was an amanuensis of the poet Thomson, was intended for representation, but the dramatic censor refused a license; as Edward and Eleonora was not permitted to be performed, being considered a party work, our sagacious state-critic imagined that Paterson's own play was in the same predicament by being in the same hand-writing! The French have retained many curious facts of the singular ineptitude of these censors. Malebranche said, that he could never obtain an approbation for his research after truth, because it was unintelligible to his censors; and, at length Mezeray, the historian, approved of it as a book of geometry. Latterly in France, it is said, that the greatest geniuses were obliged to submit their works to the critical understanding of persons who had formerly been low dependents on some man of quality, and who appear to have brought the same servility of mind to the examination of works of genius. There is something, which, on the principle of incongruity and contrast, becomes exquisitely ludicrous, in observing the works of men of genius allowed to be printed, and even commended by certain persons who have never printed their names but to their licenses. One of these gentlemen suppressed a work, because it contained principles of government, which appeared to him not conformable to the laws of Moses. Another said to a geometician, 'I cannot permit the publication of your book: you dare to say, that between to given points, the shortest line is the straight line. Do you think me such an idiot as not to perceive your allusion? If your work appeared, I should make enemies of all those who find, by crooked ways, an easier admittance into court, than by a straight line. Consider their number! At this moment the censors in Austria appear singularly inept; for, not long ago, they con-

It is inserted in the uncancelled edition of Milton's prose works in 1738. It is a retort on Presbyterian Clement Walker's History of the Independents; and Warburton in his admirable characters of the historians of this period, alluding to Clement Walker, says, 'Milton was even with him in the fine and severe character he gave of the Presbyterian administration.'

denied as heretical, two books; of which one, entitled 'Principes de la Trigonometrie,' the censor would not allow to be printed, because the Trinity, which he imagined to be included in trigonometry, was not permitted to be discussed: and the other, on the 'Destruction of Insects,' he insisted had a covert allusion to the Jesuits, who, he conceived, were thus malignantly designated.*

A curious literary anecdote has been recorded of the learned Richard Turion, who was a contributor. Compelled to insert in one of his works the qualifying opinions of the censor of the Sorbonne, he inserted them within crotchets. But a strange misfortune attended this contrivance. The printer, who was not let into the secret, printed the work without these essential marks; by which means the enraged author saw his own peculiar opinions overturned in the very work written to maintain them.

These appear trifling minutiae; and yet, like a hair in a watch, which utterly destroys its progress, these little inepties obliged writers to have recourse to foreign presses; compelled a Montesquieu to write with concealed ambiguity, and many to sign a recantation of principles which they could never change. The recantation of Selden, extorted from his hand on his suppressed 'Historie of Tithes,' humiliated a great mind; but it could not remove a particle from the masses of his learning, nor darken the luminous conviction of his reasonings; nor did it diminish the number of those who assented to his principles. Recantations usually prove the force of authority, rather than the change of opinion. When a Dr Pocklington was condemned to make a recantation, he hit the etymology of the word, while he caught at the spirit—he began thus: 'If conto be to sing, recanto is to sing again.' So that he recanted his offending opinions, by repeating them in his recantation.

At the revolution in England, licenses for the press ceased; but its liberty did not commence till 1694, when every restraint was taken off by the firm and decisive tone of the commons. It was granted, says our philosophic Hume, 'to the great displeasure of the king and his ministers, who, seeing nowhere, in any government during present or past ages, any example of such unlimited freedom, doubted much of its salutary effects; and probably, thought that no books or writings would ever so much improve the general understanding of men, as to render it safe to entrust them with indulgence so easily abused.'

And the present moment verifies the prescient conjecture of the philosopher. Such is the licentiousness of our press, that some, not perhaps the most hostile to the cause of freedom, would not be averse to manacle authors once more with an Imprimatur. It will not be denied that Erasmus was a friend to the freedom of the press; yet he was so shocked at the licentiousness of Luther's pen, that there was a time when he considered it as necessary to restrain its liberty. It was then as now. Erasmus had, indeed, been miserably calumniated, and expected future libels. I am glad, however, to observe, that he afterwards, on a more impartial investigation, confessed that such a remedy was much more dangerous than the disease. To restrain the liberty of the press can only be the interest of the individual, never that of the public; one must be a patriot here: we must stand in the field with an unshielded breast, since the safety of the people is the supreme law. There were, in Milton's days, some who said of this institution, that, although the inventors were bad, the thing, for all that, might be good. 'This may be so,' replies the vehement advocate for 'uncensored printing.' But as the commonwealths have existed through all ages, and have forborne to use it, he sees no necessity for the invention; and held it as a dangerous and suspicious fruit from the tree which bore it. 'The ages of the wisest commonwealths, Milton seems not to have recollected, were not diseased with the popular infection of publications issuing at all hours, and propagated with a celerity on which the ancients could not calculate. The learned Dr James, who has denounced the invention of the Indesces, confesses, however, that it was not unuseful when it restrained the publications of atheistic and immoral works. But it is our lot to bear with all the consequent evils, that we may preserve the good inviolate; since as the profound Hume has declared, 'The Liberty of Britain is gone for ever, when such attempts shall succeed.'

A constitutional sovereign will consider the freedom of the press as the sole organ of the feelings of the people. Censors he will leave to the fate of calumny; a fate similar to those, who, having over-charged their arms with the feeblest intentions, find that the death which they intended for others, in bursting, only annihilates themselves.

OF ANAGRAMS AND ECHO VERSES.

The 'true' modern critics on our elder writers are apt to thunder their anathemas on innocent heads: little wed in the eras of our literature, and the fashions of a wit, popular criticism must submit to be guided by the erry historian.

Kippis condemns Sir Symonds D'Ewes for his admiration of two anagrams, expressive of the feelings of his times. It required the valour of Falstaff to attack extant anagrams; and our pretended English Bayle thought he self secure, in pronouncing all anagrammatists to be want in judgment and taste: yet, if this mechanical critic did not know something of the state and nature of anagram in Sir Symonds's day, he was more deficient in that comity of literature, which his work required, than plain honest Sir Symonds in the taste and judgment of what he is so contemptuously deprived. The author who decides on the taste of another age by those of his own day, and whose knowledge of the national literature does not extend beyond his own century, is neither historian nor critic. The truth is, that Anagrams were then the fashionable amusements of the witty and the most learned.

Kippis says, and others have repeated, 'That Sir Symonds D'Ewes's judgment and taste, with regard to wit, were as contemptible as can well be imagined, will be evident from the following passage taken from his account of Carr Earl of Somerset and his wife: 'This discourse gave many satirical wit occasion to vent themselves into simple [stinging] libels, in which they spared neither the persons nor families of that unfortunate pair. There came also two anagrams to my hands, not unworthy to be owned by the rarist wits of this age.' These were, of very descriptive of the lady; and the other, of an incident in which this infamous woman was so deeply criminalized.

FRANCES HOWARD, THOMAS OVERBURY,
'Car finds a Whore, O! O! base Murders!

This sort of wit is not false at least than the criticism which infers that D'Ewes's judgment and taste were contemptible as can well be; for he might have added these anagrams, which, however, are not of the nicest construction, and yet not have been so destitute of those qualities of which he is so authoritatively divested.

Camden has a chapter in his 'Remains' on Anagram which he defines to be a dissolution of a (person's) name into its letters, as its elements; and a new connexion in words is formed by their transposition, if possible with addition, subtraction, or change of the letters; and if words must make a sentence applicable to the person named. The Anagram is complimentary or satirical; it may contain some allusion to an event, or describe some personal characteristic.

Such difficult trifles it may be convenient at all times discard; but, if ingenious minds can convert an Anagram into a means of exercising their ingenuity, the things themselves will necessarily become ingenious. No ingenuity can make an Acrostic ingenious; for this is nothing but a mechanical arrangement of the letters of a name, and of this literary folly long prevailed in Europe.

As for Anagrams, if antiquity can consecrate some lies, they are of very ancient date. They were used among the Hebrews, among the cabalistic sciences; they pretended to discover occult qualities in proper names; was an oriental practice; and was caught by the Greek Plato had strange notions of the influence of Anagrams when drawn out of persons' names; and the later Platonists are full of the mysteries of the anagrammatic virtues of names. The chimerical associations of the charmed and qualities of a man with his name anagrammatists may often have instigated to the choice of a vocation, otherwise affected his imagination.

Lycophon has left some on record: two on Ptolemy Philadelphus, King of Egypt, and his Queen Arsinoë. The king's name was thus anagrammatised:

Learning, which revived under Francis the First ance, did not disdain to cultivate this small flower of wit. I have had such a felicity in making these trifles, that my illustrious persons sent their names to him to be anagrammatised. Another fanciful one on our James I, whose rightful claim to the British monarchy, as the descendant of the legendary Arthur, could only have satisfied genealogists of romance reading:

Charles James Stewart, Claims Arthur's seat.

Sylvester, the translator of Du Bartas, considered himself fortunate when he found in the name of his sovereign, the strongest bond of affection to his service. In the dedication he rings loyal changes on the name of his liege, James Stuart; in which he finds a just master! The anagram on Monk, afterwards Duke of Albemarle, in the restoration of Charles II, included an important link in our history:

Georgius Monke, Dux de Aumarle,
Ego Regem reduxi Ano. Sa MDCLVV.

A slight reversing of the letters in a name produced a happy compliment: as in Vernon was found Renous; and he celebrated Sir Thomas Wiat bore his own designation in his name, a Wit. Of the poet Waller the anagrammatist said,

'His brows need not with Lawrel be bound,
Since in his name with Lawrel he is crown'd.'

Randle Holmes, who has written a very extraordinary volume on heraldry, was complimented by an expressive anagram:

Lo, Men's Herald!

These anagrams were often devoted to the personal attachments of love or friendship. A friend delighted to write his name with the name of his friend. Crashawe, the poet, had a literary intimate of the name of Car, who was his posthumous editor; and, in prefixing some elegiac name, discovers that his late friend Crashawe was Car; so the anagram of Crashawe runs: He was Car. On this quaint discovery, he has indulged all the tenderness of his recollections:

'Was Car then Crashawe, or was Crashawe Car?
Since both within one name combined are.
Yes, Car's Crashawe, he Car; 'tis Love alone
Which melts two hearts, of both composing one,
So Crashawe's still the same, &c.'

A happy anagram on a person's name might have a moral effect on the feelings: as there is reason to believe, that certain celebrated names have had some influence on the personal character. When one Martha Nicolson was found out to be Seen calm in heart, the anagram, in becoming familiar to her, might afford an opportune admonition. But, perhaps, the happiest of anagrams was that produced on a singular person and occasion. Lady Eleanor Davies, the wife of the celebrated Sir John Davies, the poet, was a very extraordinary character. She was the Cassandra of her age; and several of her predictions warranted her to conceive she was a prophetess. As her prophecies in the troubled times of Charles I were usually against the government, she was, at length, brought by them into the court of High Commission. The prophetess was not a little mad, and fancied the spirit of Daniel was in her, from an anagram she had formed of her name

Eleanor Davies.
Reveal O Daniel!

The anagram had too much by an L, and too little by an s; yet Daniel and reveal was in it, and that was sufficient to satisfy her inspirations. The court attempted to dispossess the spirit from the lady, while the bishops were in vain reasoning the point with her out of the scriptures, to no purpose, she poisoning text against text:—one of the deans of the arches, says Heylin, shot her thorough and thorough with an arrow borrowed from her own quiver: he took a pen, and at last hit upon this excellent anagram:

Dame Eleanor Davies.
Never so mad a Ladie!

The happy fancy put the solemn court into laughter, and Cassandra into the utmost dejection of spirit. Foiled by her own weapons, her spirit suddenly forsook her; and either she never afterwards ventured on prophesying, or the anagram perpetually reminded her hearers of her state—and we hear no more of this prophetess!

Thus much have I written in favour of Sir Symonds D'Ewes's keen relish of 'a stinging anagram'; and on the error of those literary historians, who do not enter into the spirit of the age they are writing on.

We find in the Scribleriad, the Anagrams appearing in the land of false wit:

'But with still more disorder'd march advance, (Nor march it seem'd, but wild fantastic dance,
The uncouth Anagrams, distorted train,
Shifting, in double mazes, o'er the plain.'

C. II, 161

The fine humour of Addison was never more playful than in his account of that anagrammatist, who, after shutting himself up for half a year, and having taken certain liberties with the name of his mistress, discovered, on presenting his anagram, that he had mis-spelt her surname; by which he was so thunderstruck with his misfortune, that in a little time after he lost his senses, which, indeed, had been very much impaired by that continual application he had given to his anagram.

One Frenzelius, a German, prided himself on perpetuating the name of every person of eminence who died by an anagram; but by the description of the bodily pain he suffered on these occasions, when he shut himself up for those rash attempts, he seems to have shared in the dying pangs of the mortals whom he so painfully celebrated. Others appear to have practiced this art with more facility. A French poet, deeply in love, in one day sent his mistress, whose name was Margdelaine, three dozen of anagrams on her single name!

Even old Camden, who lived in the golden age of anagrams, notices the difficilia quæ pulchra, the charming difficulty, 'as a whetstone of patience to them that shall practise it.' For some have been seen to bite their pen, scratch their heads, bend their brows, bite their lips, beat the board, tear their paper, when the names were fair for somewhat, and caught nothing therein.' Such was the troubled happiness of an anagrammatist: yet, adds our venerable author, notwithstanding 'the sour sort of critics, good anagrams yield a delightful comfort, and pleasant motion in honest minds.'

When the mania of making Anagrams prevailed, the little persons at court flattered the great ones by inventing anagrams for them; and when the wit of the maker proved to be as barren as the letters of the name, they dropped or changed them, raving with the alphabet and racking their wits. Among the manuscripts of the grave Sir Julius Caesar, one cannot but smile at a bundle emphatically endorsed 'Trash.' It is a collection of these court anagrams; a remarkable evidence of that ineptitude to which mere fashionable wit can carry the frivolous.

In consigning this intellectual exercise to oblivion, we must not confound the miserable and the happy together. A man of genius would not consume an hour in extracting even a fortunate anagram from a name, although on an extraordinary person or occasion its appositeness might be worth an epigram. Much of la merit will arise from the association of ideas; a trifle can only produce what is trifling, but an elegant mind may delight by some elegant allusion, and a satirical one by its causticity. We have some recent ones, which will not easily be forgotten.

A similar contrivance, that of Echo Verses, may here be noticed. I have given a specimen of these in a modern French writer, whose sportive pen has thrown out so much wit and humour in his Echoes.* Nothing ought to be contemned which, in the hands of a man of genius, is converted into a medium of his talents. No verses have been considered more contemptible than these, which, with all their kindred, have been anathematized by Butler, in his exquisite character of 'a small poet,' in his 'Remains,' whom he describes as 'tumbling through the hoop of an anagram' and 'all those gambols of wit.' The philosophical critic will be more tolerant than was the orthodox church of wit in that day, which was, indeed, alarmed at the fantastical heresies which were then prevailing. I say not a word in favour of unmeaning Acrostics; but Anagrams and Echo Verses may be shown capable of reflecting the ingenuity of their makers. I preserve a copy of Echo Verses, which exhibit a curious picture of the state of our religious fanatics, the Roundheads of Charles I, as an evidence, that in the hands of a wit, even such things can be converted into the instruments of wit.

At the end of a comedy presented at the entertainment of the prince, by the scholars of Trinity College, Cambridge, in March 1641, printed for James Calvin, 1642, the author, Francis Cole, holds in a print a paper in one hand, and a round hat in another. At the end of all is this humorous little poem.

THE ECHHO!

Now Echo, on what's religion grounded? Round-head!
 Whose is professor most considerable? Rabble!
 How do these prove themselves to be the godly? Oddly!
 But they in life are known to be the holy. O lie!
 Who are these preachers, men or women-common? Common!
 Come they from any universitie? Cite!
 Do they not learning from their doctrine sever? Ever!
 Yet they pretend that they do edifie; O lie!
 What do you call it then, to crucify? Ay
 What Church have they, and what pulpits? Pits!
 But now in chambers the Conventicle; Tickle!
 The godly sisters shrewdly are belled. Belled!
 The godly number then will soon transcend. End!
 As for the temples they with zeal embrace them. Rase they!
 What do they make of bishop's hierarchy? Archie!†
 Are crosses, images, ornaments their scandal? All!
 Nor will they leave us many ceremonies, Monies!
 Must even religion down for satisfaction. Faction.
 How stand they affected to the government civil? Evil!
 But to the king they say they are most loyal. Lye all.
 Then God keep King and State from these same men. Amen!

ORTHOGRAPHY OF PROPER NAMES.

We are often perplexed to decide how the names of some of our eminent men ought to be written; and we find that they are even now written diversely. The truth is that our orthography was so long unsettled among us, that it appears by various documents of the times which I have seen, that persons were at a loss how to write their own names, and most certainly have written them variously. I have sometimes suspected that estates may have been

* See p. 79.

† An allusion probably to Archibald Armstrong, the fool or privileged jester of Charles I, usually called Archy, who had a quarrel with Archbishop Laud, and of whom many arch things are on record; there is a little jest-book very high-priced and of little worth which bears the title of Archy's Jests lost, and descents confounded, by such uncertain and disagreeing signatures of the same person. In a late will respecting the Duchess of Norfolk's estate, one of the executors has his name printed Higden, while in the genealogy it appears Hickden. I think I have seen Ben Jonson's name written by himself with an h; and Dryden made use of an i. I have seen an injunction to printers with the sign manual of Charles II, not to print Samuel Betler acquire's book or poem called Hudibras without his consent; but I do not know whether Butler thus wrote his name. As late as in 1680 a Dr Croone was at such a loss to have his name pronounced rightly, that he tried six different ways of writing it, as appears by printed books; Croo, Croon, Crova, Crovo, Croone, and Croovne; all which appear under his own hand, as he wrote it differently at different periods of his life. In the subscription book of the Royal Society he writes W. Croone, but in his will at the Commons he signs W. Croone. Ray the naturalist informs us in his letters, p. 72, that he first wrote his name Way, but afterwards omitted the W. Dr Whitby, in books published by himself, writes his name sometimes Whitby. And among the Harleian Manuscripts there is a large collection of letters, to which I have often referred; written between 1620 and 1630 by Joseph Mead: and yet in all his printed letters, and his works, even within that period, it is spelt Mede: by which signature we recognize the name of a learned man better known to us: it was long before I discovered the letter writer to have been this scholar. Oldys, in some curious manuscript memoirs of his family, has traced the family name through a great variety of changes, and sometimes it is at such variance, that the person indicated will not always appear to have belonged to the family. We saw recently an advertisement in the newspapers offering five thousand pounds to prove a marriage in the family of the Knevetts, which occurred about 1633. What most disconcerts the inquirer is their discovery that the family name was written in six or seven different ways; a circumstance which I have not doubt will be found in most family names in England. Fuller mentions that the name of Pillers was spelt fourteen different ways in the deeds of that family.

I shall illustrate this subject by the history of the names of two of our most illustrious countrymen, Shakespeare and Rawleigh.

We all remember the day, when a violent literary controversy was opened, nor is it yet closed, respecting the spelling of our poet's name. One great editor persisted in his triumphant discovery, by printing Shakspeare, while another would only partially yield, Shakespeare; but all parties seemed willing to drop the usual and natural derivation of his name, in which we are surely warranted from a passage in a contemporary writer, who alludes by the name to a conceit of his own, of the martial spirit of the poet. The truth seems to be, then, that personal names were written by the ear, since the persons themselves did not attend to the accurate writing of their own names, which they changed sometimes capriciously and sometimes with anxious nicety. Our great poet's name appears Shakspeare in the register of Stratford church; it is Shakespeare in the body of his will, but that very instrument is indorsed Mr Shakspeare's will. He himself has written his name in two different ways, Shakspeare and Shakspere. Mr Colman says, the poet's name in his own county is pronounced with the first a short, which account for this mode of writing the name, and proves that the orthoepy rather than the orthography of a person's name was most attended to; a very questionable and uncertain standard.

Another remarkable instance of this sort is the name of Sir Walter Rawley, which I am myself uncertain how to write; although I have discovered a fact which proves that it should be pronounced.

Rawley's name was spelt by himself and by his contemporaries in all sorts of ways. We find it Ralegh, Releigh, Rawleigh, Rawley, and Rawly; the last of which at least preserves its pronunciation. This great man, when young, appears to have subscribed his name 'Walter Rawley of the Middle Temple' to a copy of verses, printed among others prefixed to a satire called the Steel-glass, in George Gascoigne's Works, 1578. Sir Walter was then a young student, and these verses both by their spirit and signature cannot fail to be his; however this matter is doubtful, for the critics have not met elsewhere with his name thus written. The orthoepy of the name of this great man I can establish by the following fact. When Walter was first introduced to James I on the king's side in England, with whom, being united with an opposite party, he was no favourite; the Scottish monarch gave him this broad reception: 'Rawly! Rawly! true enough, for I think of thee very Rawly, mon!' There is an enigma contained in a distich written by a lady of times, which preserves the real pronunciation of the name of this extraordinary man.

What's bad for the stomach, and the word of dishonour, the name of the man, whom the king will not honour; thus our ancient personal names were written down by ear, at a period when we had no settled orthography; even at a later period, not distant from our own times, so persons, it might be shown, have been equally puzzled how to write their names; witness the Thomsons, Thompsons; the Wartons, the Whartons, &c.

NAMES OF OUR STREETS.

Lord Orford has, in one of his letters, projected a curiosity to be written in a walk through the streets of the metropolis, similar to a French work entitled 'Anecdotes des Rues de Paris.' I know of no such work, and suspect the vivacious writer alluded in his mind to Saint Foix's main historiques sur Paris, a very entertaining work, which the plan is that projected by his lordship. We have had Pennant's 'London,' a work of this description; on the whole, this is a superficial performance, as it gives manners, characters, and events. That antiquary named every thing, and grasped scarcely any thing; he wanted the patience of research, and the keen spirit which defines the past. Should Lord Orford's project be carried into execution, or rather, should Pennant be hereafter proved, it would be first necessary to obtain the original name, or their meanings, of our streets, free from the disguise in which time has concealed them. We shall otherwise lose many characters of persons, and many remarkable events, of which their original denominations would aid the historian of our streets.

I have noted down a few of these modern misnomers, and the future historian may be excited to discover more.

Mincheon-lane was Mincheon-lane; from tenements belonging to the Mincheons, or the nuns of St Helen's in Minchepet-street.

Gutter-lane, corrupted from Gutherson's-lane; from its first owner, a citizen of great trade.

Blackwell-hall was Bakeswell's-hall, from one Thomas Bakeswell; and originally called Basing's-hough, from a considerable family of that name, whose arms were once on the ancient building, and whose name is still perpetuated in Basing's-lane.

Fench-lane was Finke's-lane, from a whole family of this name.

Thrid-needle-street, was originally Thrid-needle-street, as Samuel Clarke dates it from his study there.

Wiltter-lane is a corruption of Belzetter's-lane; from the first builder or owner.

Crooked-friars was Crowched or Crossed-friars.

Leithery was so named from the noise of founders at their work, and, as Howell pretends, this place was called Leithery disdainfully.

Garlick-hill was Garlick-hithe, or hise, where garlick was sold.

Petter-lane has been erroneously supposed to have some connexion with the fetters of criminals. It was in Charles I's first time written Fector-lane, and is so in Howell's metropolis, who explains it as Fectors (or idle people) lying there as in a way leading to gardens. It was the name of these Fectors, or 'mighty beggars.' The Faiwour, that is, a defector, or defaulter, became Fector, and in the real pronunciation, or conception, of names, Fector has been altered in Petter-lane.

Gracious-street, sometimes called Gracious-street, was originally Grass-street, from a herb-market there.

Fench-street, from a fenny or moorish ground by a fen-side.

Galley-key has preserved its name, but its origin may have been lost. Howell, in his 'Londinopolis,' says, 'here sell strangers called Galley-men, who brought wine, &c., to the Galley.'

Green-street, says Penant, 'I am sorry to degrade into Gre-street,' whether it alludes to the little vivacious eel, or to the merry character of its tenants, he does not resolve.

Bridewell was St Bridget's well, from one dedicated to Saint Bride or Bridget.

Marybone was St Mary-on-the-Bourne, corrupted to Mary-bone; as Holborn was Old Bourne, or the Old River; Bourne being the ancient English for river; hence the Scottish Burn.

Newington was New-town.

Maiden-lane was so called from an image of the virgin, which, in catholic days, had stood there, as Bagford writes to Hearne; and he says, that the frequent sign of the Maiden-head was derived from 'our Lady's-head.'

Lad-lane was originally Lady's-lane, from the same personage.

Road-lane was so denominated from a Road, or Jesus on the cross, there placed, which was held in great regard.

Piccadilly was named after a hall called Piccadilla-hall, a place of sale for Piccadillies or Turn-overs; a part of the fashionable dress which appeared about 1614. It has preserved its name uncorrupted; for Barnabe Rich, in his 'Honestie of the Age,' has this passage on 'the body-makers that do swarm through all parts, both of London and about London. The body is still pampered up in the very dross of excess. He that some fortie years sithe should have asked after a Pickadilly, I wonder who would have understood him; or could have told what a Pickadilly had been, either fish or flesh.'

Strype notices that in the liberties of Saint Catharine is a place called Hangman's-gains; the traders of Hammes and Guynes, in France, anciently resorted there; thence the strange corruption.

Smithfield is a corruption of Smoothfield: smith signifies smooth, from the Saxon smeth. An antiquarian friend had seen it described in a deed as campus planus, which confirms the original meaning. It is described in Fitz Stephen's account of London, written before the twelfth century, as a plain field, both in reality and name, where every Friday there is a celebrated rendezvous of fine horses, brought hither to be sold. Thither come to look or buy, a great number of earls, barons, knights, and a swarm of citizens. It is a pleasing sight to behold the ambling nags and generous colts, proudly prancing. This ancient writer continues a minute description, and perhaps gives the earliest one of a horse-race in this country. It is remarkable that Smithfield should have continued as a market for cattle for more than six centuries with only the loss of its vowels.

This is sufficient to show how the names of our streets require either to be corrected or explained, by their historian. The French, among the numerous projects for the moral improvement of civilized man, had one, which, had it not been polluted by a horrid faction, might have been directed to a noble end. It was to name streets after eminent men. This would at least preserve them from the corruption of the people, and exhibit a perpetual monument of moral feeling, and of glory, to the rising genius of every age. With what excitement and delight may the young contemplative, who first studies at Gray's Inn, be reminded of Verulam-buildings!

The names of streets will often be found connected with some singular event, or the character of some person. Not long ago, a Hebrew, who had a quarrel with his community, built a neighbourhood at Bethnal-green, and retained the subject of his anger in the name which the houses bear, of Parim-place. This may startle some theological antiquary at a remote period, who may idly lose himself in abstruse conjectures on the sanctity of a name, derived from a well known Hebrew festival: and, perhaps, colonize the spot with an ancient horde of Israelites.

SECRET HISTORY OF EDWARD YERE, EARL OF OXFORD.

It is an odd circumstance in literary research, that I am enabled to correct a story which was written about 1680. The Aubrey papers, recently published with singular faithfulness, retaining all their peculiarities, even to the grossest errors, were memoranda for the use of Anthony Wood's great work. But besides these, the Oxford antiquary had a very extensive literary correspondence, and it is known, that when speechless and dying, he evinced the fortitude to call in two friends to destroy a vast multitude of papers: about two bushels full were ordered for the fire, lighted for the occasion: and, 'as he was expiring he expressed both his knowledge and approbation of what was done, by throwing out his hands.' These two bushels full were not, however, all his papers; his more private ones he had ordered not to be opened for seven years.

I suspect also, that a great number of letters were not burnt on this occasion; for I have discovered a manuscript written about 1730 to 1730, and which, the writer tells us, consists of 'Excerpts out of Anthony Wood's papers.' It is closely written, and contains many curious facts not to be found elsewhere, as far as I have hitherto discovered. These papers of Anthony Wood probably still exist in the Ashmolean Museum: should they have perished, in that case this solitary manuscript will be the sole record of many interesting particulars not known to the public.

By these I correct a little story, which may be found in the Aubrey papers, Vol. III, 366. It is an account of one Nicholas Hill, a man of great learning, and in the high confidence of a remarkable and munificent Earl of Oxford, travelling with him abroad. I transcribe the printed Aubrey account.

"In his travels with his lord (I forget whether Italy or Germany, but I think the former), a poor man begged him to give him a penny. "A penny!" said Mr Hill. "What do'st say to ten pounds?" "Ah! ten pounds," said the beggar: "that would make a man happy." N. Hill gave him immediately ten pounds, and put it down upon account. Item, to a beggar ten pounds to make him happy?—The point of this story has been marred in the telling: it was drawn up from the following one, which must have been the original. This extract was made from a letter by Aubrey to A. Wood, dated July 15, 1689. "A poor man asked Mr Hill, his lordship's steward, once to give him sixpence, or a shilling, for an alms. "What dost say if I give thee ten pounds?" "Ten pounds! that would make a man of me." Hill gave it him, and put down in his account, "Item, 10*l* for making a man," which his lordship inquiring about for the oddness of the expression, not only allowed, but was pleased with it."

This philosophical humourist was the steward of Edward Vere, Earl of Oxford, in the reign of Elizabeth. The peer was a person of elegant accomplishments; and Lord Orford, in his 'Noble Authors,' has given a higher character of him than perhaps he may deserve. He was of the highest rank, in great favour with the queen, and, to employ the style of the day, when all our fashions and our poetry were moulding themselves on the Italian model, he was the 'Mirror of Tuscanismo;' and, in a word, this coxcombical peer, after a seven years' residence in Florence, returned highly 'Italianated.' The ludicrous motive of this peregrination is given in the present manuscript account. Haughty of his descent and his alliance, irritable with effeminate delicacy and personal vanity, a little circumstance, almost too minute to be recorded, inflicted such an injury on his pride, that in his mind it required years of absence from the court of England, ere it could be forgotten. Once making a low obeisance to the queen before the whole court, this stately and inflated peer suffered a mischance which has happened, it is said, on a like occasion—it was 'light as air.' But this accident so sensibly hurt his mawkish delicacy, and so humbled his aristocratic dignity, that he could not raise his eyes on his royal mistress. He resolved from that day 'to be a banished man,' and resided for seven years in Italy, living in more grandeur at Florence than the Grand Duke of Tuscany. He spent in those years forty thousand pounds. On his return he presented the queen with embroidered gloves and perfumes, then for the first time introduced into England, as Stowe has noticed. Part of the new presents seem to have some reference to the earl's former mischance. The queen received them graciously, and was even painted wearing those gloves; but my authority states, that the masculine sense of Elizabeth could not abstain from congratulating the noble coxcomb; perceiving, she said, that at length my lord forgot the mentioning the little mischance of seven years ago!

The peer's munificence abroad was indeed the talk of Europe; but the secret motive of this was as wicked as that of his travels had been ridiculous. This earl of Oxford had married the daughter of Lord Burleigh, and, when this great statesman would not consent to save the life of the Duke of Norfolk, the friend of this earl, he swore to revenge himself on the countess, out of hatred to his father-in-law. He not only forsook her, but studied every means to waste that great inheritance which had descended to him from his ancestors. Secret history often startles us with unexpected discoveries: the personal affections of this earl induce him to quit a court, where he stood in the highest favour, to domesticate himself abroad; and a family pique was the motive of that splendid prodigality which, at Florence, could throw into shade the court of Tudor itself.

ANCIENT COOKERY AND COOKS.

The memorable grand dinner given by the classical tutor in Peregrine Pickle has indisposed our tastes for cookery of the ancients; but, since it is often 'the cat who spoils the broth,' we cannot be sure but that even 'the black Lacedæmonian,' stirred by the spear of a Spartan might have had a poignancy for him, which did not happen on that occasion.

Their cookery must have been superior to our humble art, since they could find dainties in the tough membranes of the matrices of a sow, and the flesh of young hawks, and a young ass. The elder Pliny tells, that a man had studied the art of fattening snails with paste so successfully, that the shells of some of his snails would contain many quarts.* The same monstrous taste fed those prodigious goose livers; a taste still prevailing in Italy. Swine were fattened with whey and figs, and eel fish in their ponds were increased by such artificial means. Our prize oxen might astonish a Roman, as much as one of their crammed peacocks would ourselves. Glutton produces monsters, and turns away from nature to feed on unwholesome meats. The flesh of young fowls in autumn, when they fed on grapes, is praised by Galen and Hippocrates equals the flesh of puppies to that of hogs. The humorous Dr King, who has touched on this subject suspects that many of the Greek dishes appear charming from their mellifluous terminations, resounding with ais and toies†.

The numerous descriptions of ancient cookery which Athenæus has preserved indicate an unrivalled dexterity and refinement: and the ancients, indeed, appear to have raised the culinary art into a science, and dignified it into professors. They had writers who exhausted their erudition and ingenuity in verse and prose; while ours were proud to immortalize their names by the invention of a poignant sauce, or a popular gâteau. Apicinus, a name immortalised, and now synonymous with a gorging, was the inventor of cakes called Apicians; and one Ariston after many unsuccessful combinations, at length hit on a peculiar manner of seasoning hams, thence called Aristonians. The name of a late nobleman among ourselves is thus invoked every day.

Of these Eruditi gule, Archestratus, a culinary philosopher, composed an epic or didactic poem on good eating. His 'Gastrology' became the creed of the epicures, as its pathos appears to have made what is so expressively called 'their mouths water.' The idea has been recently successfully imitated by a French poet. Archestratus thus opens his subject:

'I write these precepts for immortal Greece,
That round a table delicately spread,
Or, three, or four, may sit in choice repose,
Or five at most. Who otherwise shall dine,
Are like a troop marauding for their prey.'

The elegant Romans declared, that a repast should consist of less in number than the Graces, nor of more than the Muses. They had, however, a quaint proverb which Alexander ab Alexandro has preserved, not favourable even to so large a dinner-party as nine; it turns on play of words:

'Septem convivium, Novem convivium facere.'

An elegant Roman, meeting a friend, regretted it could not invite him to dinner, 'because my number is complete.'

When Archestratus acknowledges that some things are for the winter, and some for the summer, he consoles himself, that though we cannot have them at the same time yet, at least, we may talk about them at all times.

This great genius seems to have travelled over land and seas that he might critically examine the things themselves and improve, with new discoveries, the table-luxuries. It indicates the places for peculiar edibles, and exquisite tables; and promulgates his precepts with the zeal of time legislator, who is dictating a code designed to avert the imperfect state of society. A philosopher worthy to bear the title of cook, or a cook worthy to be a philosopher, according to the numerous passages scattered in Athenæus, was an extraordinary genius, endowed not merely with a natural aptitude, but with all acquired accomplishments. The philosophy, the metaphysics, of cookery appears in the following sage :

' Know then, the Cook, a dinner that's bespoke
Aspiring to prepare, with prescient zeal
Should know the tastes and humours of the guests;
For if he drudges through the common work,
Thoughtless of manner, careless what the place
And seasons claim; and what the favouring hour
Auspicious to his genius may present,
Why, standing midst the multitude of men,
Call we this plodding fricassee a Cook?
Oh differing far! and one is not the other!
We call indeed the general of an army
Him who is charged to lead to the war;
But the true general is the man whose mind,
Mastering events, anticipates, combines;
Else is he but a leader to his men!
With our profession thus: the first who comes
May with a humble toil, or slice, or chop,
Prepare the ingredients, and around the fire
Obsequious, him I call a fricassee!
But ah! the cook a brighter glory crowns!
Well skill'd is he to know the place, the hour,
Him who invites, and him who is invited,
What fish in season makes the market rich,
A choice delicious rarity! I know
That all, as always find; but always all,
Charms not the palate, critically fine.
Archestratus, in culinary lore
Deep for his time, in this more learned age,
Is wanting: and full oft he surely talks
Of what he never ate. Suspect his page,
Nor load thy genius with a barren precept.
Look not in books for what some idle sage
So idly raved: for cookery is an art
Comporting ill with rhetoric: 'tis an art
Still changing, and of momentary triumph!
Know on thyself thy genius must depend.
All books of cookery, all helps of art,
All critic learning, all commenting notes,
Are vain, if void of genius, thou wouldst cook!
The culinary sage thus spoke: his friend
Demands 'Where is the ideal cook thou paintest?'
'Lo, I the man!' the savouring sage replied.
'Now be thine eyes the witness of my art!
This tunny dressed, so odorously shall steam,
The spicy sweetness so shall seal thy sense,
That thou in a delicious reverie
Shalt slumber heavenly o'er the salt dish!'

In another passage a Master-Cook conceives himself to be a pupil of Epicurus, whose favourite but ambiguous maxim, that 'Voluptuousness is the sovereign good,' was interpreted by the best-civilians of antiquity in the plain sense.

MASTER COOK.

Behold in me a pupil of the school
Of the sage Epicurus.

FRIEND.

Thou a sage!

MASTER COOK.

Ay! Epicurus too was sure a cook,
And knew the sovereign good. Nature his study,
While practice perfected his theory.
Diverse philosophy alone can teach
The difference which the fish *Gloceius shows
In winter and in summer; how to learn
Which fish to choose, when set the Flelades,
And at the solstice. 'Tis change of seasons

* The commentators have not been able always to assign known names to the great variety of fish, particularly sea-fish. The ancient used, many of which we should revolt at. One of their deities was a shell-fish, prickly like a hedge-hog, called Echinus. They ate the dog-fish, the star-fish, porpoises, sea-hogs, and even seals. In Dr Moffet's regimen of diet, is a preceding curious writer of the reign of Elizabeth, republished by Otdy, may be found an ample account of the 'sea-birds' used by the ancients. Whatever the Gloceius was, it seems to have been of great size, and a shell-fish, as we may learn from the following curious passage in Athenæus. A fisher, informed that his son is leading a dissolute life, enraged, communicates with his pedagogue:—'Knave! thou art the fish! hast thou ever known a philosopher yield himself so entirely to the pleasures thou teldest me of?' The pedagogue replies by a 'Yes! and that the sages of the portico are great drunkards, and none know better than they how to attack a Gloceius.'

Which threatens mankind, and shakes their changeable frame.

This dost thou comprehend? Know, what we use
In season, is most seasonably good!

FRIEND.

Most learned cook, who can observe these canons?

MASTER COOK.

And therefore phlegm and colics make a man
A most indecent guest. The aliment
Dress'd in my kitchen is true aliment;
Light of digestion easily it passes:
The chyle soft-blending from the juicy food
Repairs the solids.

FRIEND.

Ah! the chyle! the solids!
Thou new Democritus! thou sage of medicine!
Versed in the mysteries of the lairic art!

MASTER COOK.

Now mark the blunders of our vulgar cooks!
See them prepare a dish of various fish,
Showering profuse the pounded Indian grain,
An overpowering vapour, gallimaufry:
A multitude confused of pothering odours!
But, know, the genius of the art consists
To make the nostrils feel each scent distinct;
And not in washing plates to free from smoke.
I never enter in my kitchen, I!
But sit apart, and in the cool direct;
Observant of what passes, scullions toll.

FRIEND.

What dost thou there?

MASTER COOK.

I guide the mighty whole;
Explore the causes, prophesy the dish.
'Tis thus I speak: 'Leave, leave that ponderous ham
Keep up the fire, and lively play the flame
Beneath those lobster-patties; patient here.
Fix'd as a statue, skim, incessant skim.
Steep well this small Gloceius in its sauce,
And boil that sea-dog in a cullender;
This eel requires more salt and majorum;
Roast well that piece of kid on either side
Equal; that sweetbread boil not over much.'
'Tis thus, my friend, I make the concert play

FRIEND.

O man of science! 'tis thy babble kills!

MASTER COOK.

And then no useless dish my table crowds,
Harmonious ranged, and concordantly just!

FRIEND.

Ha! what means this?

MASTER COOK.

Divinest music all;
As in a concert instruments resound,
My ordered dishes in their courses chime.
So Epicurus dictated the art
Of sweet voluptuousness, and ate in order,
Musing delighted o'er the sovereign good!
Let raving stokes in a labyrinth
Run after virtue; they shall find no end.
Thou, what is foreign to mankind, abjure!

FRIEND.

Right honest Cook! thou wak'st me from their dreams!
Another Cook informs us that he adapts his repasts to his personages.

I like to see the faces of my guests,
To feed them as their age and station claim.
My kitchen changes, as my guests inspire
The various spectacle; for lovers now,
Philosophers, and now for financiers.
If my young royster be a mottled spark,
Who melts an acre in a savoury dish
To charm his mistress, scuttle-fish and crabs,
And all the shelly-race, with mixture due
Of cordials portended, exquisitely rich.
For such a host, my friend! expends much more
In oil than cotton; solely studying love!
To a philosopher, that animal
Voracious, solid ham and bulky feet;
But to the financier, with costly nonsense,
Gloceius rare, or rarely more rare.
Insensible the palate of old age,
More difficult than the soft lips of youth
To move, I put much mustard in their dish;
With quickening sauces make their stupor less,
And lash the lazy blood that creeps within

Another genius, in tracing the art of Cookery, derives from it nothing less than the origin of society; and I think that some philosopher has defined Man to be 'a cooking animal.'

COOK.

The art of cookery drew us gently forth
From that ferocious light when void of faith
The Anthropophaginan ate his brother!
To cookery we owe well-ordered states,
Assembling men in dear society.
Wild was the earth, man feasting upon man,
When one of nobler senses and milder heart
First sacrificed an animal; the flesh
Was sweet; and man then ceased to feed on man!
And something of the rudeness of those times
The priest commemorates; for to this day,
He roasts the victim's entrails without salt.
In those dark times, beneath the earth lay hid
The precious salt, that gold of cookery!
But when its particles the palate thrill'd,
The source of seasonings, charm of cookery! came.
They served a punch with rich ingredients stored;
And tender kid, within two covering plates,
Warm melted in the mouth. So art improved!
At length a miracle not yet perform'd,
They minced the meat which rold in herbage soft
Nor meat nor herbage seem'd, but to the eye
And to the taste, the counterfeited dish
Mimick'd some curious fish; invention rare!
Then every dish was season'd more and more,
Salted, or sour, or sweet, and mingled oft Oatmeal and honey. To enjoy the meal
Men congregated in the populous towns,
And cities flourish'd, which we cooks adorn'd,
With all the pleasures of domestic life.

An arch-cook insinuates, that there remain only two 'pillars of the state,' besides himself, of the school of Sinon, one of the great masters of the condimenting art. Sinon, we are told, applied the elements of all the arts and sciences to this favourite one. Natural philosophy could produce a secret seasoning for a dish; and architecture the art of conducting the smoke out of a chimney; which, says he, if ungovernable, makes a great difference in the dressing. From the military science he derived a sublime idea of order; drilling the under-cooks, marshalling the kitchen, hastening one, and making another a sentinel.

We find however, that a portion of this divine art, one of the professors acknowledges to be vapouring and bragging—a seasoning in this art, as well as in others. A cook ought never to come unaccompanied by all the pomp and parade of the kitchen: with a scurvy appearance, he will be turned away at sight; for all have eyes, but a few only understanding.

Another occult part of this profound mystery, besides vapouring, consisted, it seems, in filching. Such is the counsel of a patriarch to an apprentice: a precept which contains a truth for all ages of cookery.

'Carion! time well thy ambidextrous part
Nor always filch. It was but yesterday,
Blundering, they nearly caught thee in the fact;
None of thy balls had livers, and the guests,
In horror, pierced their airy emptiness.
Not even the brains were there, thou brainless hound!
If thou art hired among the middling class,
Who pay thee freely, be thou honourable!
But for this day, where now we go to cook
E'en cut the master's throat for all I care;
"A word to thy wife," and show thyself my scholar!
There thou mayst filch and revel, all may yield
Some secret profit to thy sharking hand.
'Tis an old miser gives a sordid dinner,
And weeps o'er every sparing dish at table;
Then if I do not find thou dost devour
All thou canst touch, e'en to the very coals,
I will disown thee! Lo! Old skin-fist comes;
In his dry eyes what parsimony stares!

These cooks of the ancients, who appears to have been hired for a grand dinner, carried their art to the most whimsical profession. They were so dexterous as to be able to serve up a whole pig boiled on one side, and roasted on the other. The cook who performed this feat defies his guests to detect the place where the knife had separated the animal, or how it was contrived to stuff the belly with an olio, composed of thrushes and other birds, slices of the matrices of a sow, the yolk of eggs, the scellies of hens with their soft eggs, flavoured with a rich juice, and minced meats highly spiced. When this cook is entreated to explain this secret art, he solemnly swears by the manes of those who braved all the dangers of the Plain of Marathia and combated at sea at Salamis, that he will not reveal a secret that year. But of an incident, so triumphant in the annals of the gastric art, our philosopher would not deign posterity of the knowledge. The animal had been bled death by a wound under the shoulder, whence, after a pious effusion, the master-cook extracted the entrails washed them with wine, and hanging the animal by the feet he crammed down the throat the stuffings already prepared. Then covering the half of the pig with a paste of bread thickened with wine and oil, he put it in a small oven, on a heated table of brass, where it was gently roasted with all due care: when the skin was browned, he bled the other side; and then taking away the barley paste, the pig was served up, at once boiled and roasted. The cooks with a vegetable could counterfeited the shape, the taste of fish and flesh. The king of Bithynia, in an expedition against the Scythians, in the winter and of great distance from the sea, had a violent longing for small fish called apies—a pilchard, a herring, or an anchovy. His cook cut a turnip to the perfect imitation of its shape then fried in oil, salted, and well powdered with the grain of a dozen black poppies, his majesty's taste was so exquisitely deceived, that he praised the root to his guests as an excellent fish. This transmutation of vegetables in meat or fish is a province of the culinary art which we appear to have lost; yet these are cibi innocentes, compared with the things themselves. No people are such good of mere animal food as our own; the art of preparing vegetables, pulse, and roots, is scarcely known in this country. This cheaper and healthful food should be introduced among the common people, who neglect them from a knowing how to dress them. The peasant, for want of this skill, treads underfoot the best meat in the world; as sometimes the best way of dressing it is least costly.

The gastric art must have reached to its last perfection when we find that it had its history; and that they knew how to ascertain the era of a dish with a sort of chronological exactness. The philosophers of Athens at table dissert on every dish, and tell us of one called meate, that there was a treatise composed on it; that it was first introduced at Athens, at the epocha of the Macedonian empire but that it was undoubtedly a Thessalian invention; it most sumptuous people of all the Greeks. The meat was a term at length applied to any dainty, of excessive delicacy, always served the last.

But, as no art has ever attained perfection without numerous admirers, and as it is the public which only can make such exquisite cooks, our curiosity may be excited to inquire, whether the patrons of the gastric art were as great enthusiasts as its professors?

We see they had writers who exhausted their genius on these professional topics; and books of cookery were much read: for a comic poet, quoted by Athenæus, exhibits a character exulting in having procured 'The new Kitchen of Philoxenus, which,' says he, 'I keep for myself to read in my solitude.' That these devotees to the culinary art undertook journeys to remote parts of the world, in quest of these discoveries, sufficient facts authenticate. England had the honour to furnish them with oysters, which they fetched from about Sandwich. Juvenal* records, that Montanus was so well skilled in the science of good eating, that he could tell by the first bite, whether they were English or not. The well-known Apicius poured into his stomach an immense fortune. He usually resided at Minturna, a town in Campania, where he ate shrimps at a high price: they were so large, that those of Smyrna, and the prawns of Alexandria, could not be compared with the shrimps of Minturna. However, this luckless epicure was informed, that the shrimps in Africa were more monstrous; and he embarks without losing a day. He encounters a great storm, and through imminent danger arrives at the shores of Africa. The fishermen bring him the largest for size their nets could furnish. Apicius shakes his head: 'Have you never any larger?' he inquires. The answer was not favourable to his hopes. Apicius rejects them, and fondly remembers the shrimps of his own Minturna. He orders his pilot to return to Italy, and leaves Africa with a look of contempt.

A fraternal genius was Philoxenus: he whose higher wish was to possess a crane's neck, that he might be the longer in savouring his dainties; and who appears to have invented some expedients which might answer, in some degree, the purpose. This impudent epicure was so little attentive to the feelings of his brother-guests, that in the hot bath, he avowedly habituated himself to keep his hands in the scalding water; and even used to gargle his throat with it, that he might have less impediment in swallowing the hottest dishes. He bribed the cooks to serve up the repeat smoking hot, that he might gloriously devour what he chose before any one else could venture to touch the dish. It seemed as if he had used his fingers to handle fire. 'He is an oven, not a man!' exclaimed a grumbling fellow-guest. Once having embarked for Epheus, for the purpose of eating fish, his favourite food, he arrived at the market, and found all the stalls empty. There was a wedding in the town, and all the fish had been bespoken. He hastens to embrace the new married couple, and singing an epithalamium, the dithyrambic epicure enchanted the company. The bridegroom was delighted by the honour of the presence of such a poet, and earnestly requested he would come on the morrow. 'I will come, young friend, if there is no fish at the market!'—It was this Philoeremus who, at the table of Dionysius, the tyrant of Sicily, having near him a small barrel, and observing a large one near the prince, took the little one, and held it to his ear. Dionysius inquired the reason. 'At present,' replied the ingenious epicure, 'I am so occupied by my Silvæ (a poem in honour of the mistress of the tyrant,) that I wished to inquire of this little fish, whether he could give me some information about Nereus; but he is silent, and I imagine that they have taken him up too young: I have no doubt that old one, opposite to you, would perfectly satisfy me.' Dionysius rewarded the pleasant conversation with the large barrel.

ANCIENT AND MODERN SATURNALIA.

The Stagirite discovered that our nature delights in imitation, and perhaps in nothing more than in representing persons, different from ourselves, in mockery of them; in fact, there is a passion for masquerade in human nature. Children discover this propensity; and the populace, who are the children of society, through all ages have been honoured by their governors with festivals and recreations, which are made up of this malicious transformation of persons and things; and the humble orders of society have been privileged by the higher, to please themselves by burlesquing and ridiculing the great, at short seasons, as some consolation for the rest of the year.

The Saturnalia of the Romans is a remarkable instance of this characteristic of mankind. Macrobius could not trace the origin of this institution, and seems to derive it from the Grecians; so that it might have arisen in some remote period of antiquity, and among another people. The inscription seems supported by a passage in Gibbon's Misallianus,* who discovers traces of this institution among the more ancient nations; and Huet imagined that he saw in the jubilee of the Hebrews some similar usages. It is to be regretted that Gibbon does not afford us any new light on the cause in which originated the institution itself. The jubilee of the Hebrews was the solemn festival of an agricultural people but bears none of the ludicrous characteristics of the Roman Saturnalia.

It would have been satisfactory to have discovered the occasion of the inconceivable licentiousness which was sanctioned by the legislator,—this overturning of the principles of society, and this public ridicule of its laws, customs, and its feelings. We are told, these festivals, dedicated to Saturn, were designed to represent the natural equality which prevailed in his golden age; and for this purpose the slaves were allowed to change places with the masters. This was, however, giving the people a false notion of the equality of men: for, while the slave was converted into the master, the pretended equality was much violated as in the usual situation of the parties. The political misconception of this term of natural equality seems, however, to have been carried on through all ages; and the political Saturnalia had lately nearly thrown Europe into a state of that worse than slavery, where people are masters.

The Roman Saturnalia were latterly prolonged to a week's debauchery and folly; and a diary of that week's joys and deeds would have furnished a copious chronicle of Prolepseis. Some notions we acquire from the laws of the Saturnalia of Lucian, an Epistle of Seneca's,† and from Horace, who, from his love of quiet, retired from the city during this noisy season.

It was towards the close of December, that all the town was in an unusual motion, and the children every where invoking Saturn; nothing now to be seen but tables spread out for feasting, and nothing heard but shouts of merriment; all business was dismissed, and none at work but cooks and confectioners; no account of expenses was to be kept, and it appears that one-tenth part of a man's income was to be appropriated to this jollity. All exertion of mind and body was forbidden, except for the purpose of recreation; nothing to be read or recited which did not provoke mirth, adapted to the season and the place. The slaves were allowed the utmost freedom of railery, and truth, with their masters:* sitting with them at table, dressed in their clothes, playing all sorts of tricks, telling them of their faults to their faces, while they smutted them. The slaves were imaginary kings, as indeed a lottery determined their rank; and as their masters attended them, whenever it happened that these performed their office clumsily, doubtless with some recollections of their own similar misdeeds, the slave made the master leap into the water head-foremost. No one was allowed to be angry, and he who was played on, if he loved his own comfort, would be the first to laugh. Glasses of all sizes were to be ready, and all were to drink when and what they chose; none but the most skilful musicians and tumblers were allowed to perform, for those people are worth nothing unless exquisite, as the Saturnalian laws decreed. Dancing, singing, and shouting, and carrying a female musician thrice around their shoulders, accompanied by every grotesque humour they imagined, were indulged in that short week, which was to repay the many in which the masters had their revenge for the reign of this pretended equality. Another custom prevailed at this season: the priests performed their sacrifices to Saturn bare-headed, which Pitiscus explains in the spirit of this extraordinary institution, as designed to show that time discovers, or as in the present case of the bare-headed priests, uncovers, all things.

Such was the Roman Saturnalia, the favourite popular recreation of Paganism; and as the sports and games of the people outlast the date of their empires, and are carried with them, however they may change their name and their place on the globe, the grosser pleasures of the Saturnalia were too well adapted to their tastes to be forgotten. The Saturnalia, therefore, long generated the most extraordinary institutions among the nations of modern Europe; and, what seems more extraordinary than the unknown origin of the parent absurdity itself, the Saturnalia crept into the services and offices of the christian church. Strange it is to observe at the altar, the rites of religion burlesqued, and all its offices performed with the utmost buffoonery. It is only by tracing them to the Roman Saturnalia, that we can at all account for these grotesque sports—that extraordinary mixture of libertinism and profaneeness, so long continued under christianity.

Such were the feasts of the ass, the feast of fools or madmen, feles des fous—the feast of the bull—of the innocent—and that of the seuadiacres, which perhaps, in its original term, meant only sub-deacons, but their conduct was expressed by the conversion of a pun into seuadiacres or diacres saouls, drunken deacons. Institutions of this nature, even more numerous than the historian has usually recorded, and varied in their mode, seem to surpass each other in their utter extravagance.†

These profane festivals were universally practised in the middle ages, and, as I shall show, comparatively even in modern times. The ignorant and the careless clergy then imagined it was the surest means to retain the populace, who were always inclined to these pagan revivies.

* Horace, in his dialogue with his slave Davus, exhibits a lively picture of this circumstance. Lib. II, Sat. 7.

† A large volume might be composed on these grotesque, profane, and licentious feasts. Du Cange notices several under different terms in his Glossary—Festum Asinorum, Kalenæ, Cervulæ. A curious collection has been made by the Abbé Artigny, in the fourth and seventh volumes of his Mémoires d'Histoire, &c. Du Radier, in his Recreations Historiques, vol. I, p. 106, has noticed several writers on the subject, and preserves one on the hunting of a man, called Adam, from Ash-Wednesday to Holy-Thursaday, and treating him with a good supper at night, peculiar to a town in Saxony. See Ancillon's Mélanges Critiques, &c. I, 36, where the passage from Raphael de Volterra is found at length. In my learned friend, Mr Turner's second volume of his History of England, p. 367, will be found a copious and a curious note on this subject.

* Miscellaneous Works, vol. V, 504.

† Seneca, Epist. 18.

These grotesque festivals have sometimes amused the pens of foreign and domestic antiquaries; for our own country has participated as keenly in these irreligious fooleries. In the feast of asses, an ass covered with sacerdotal robes was gravely conducted to the choir, where service was performed before the ass, and a hymn chanted in as discordant a manner as they could contrive; the office was a medley of all that had been sung in the course of the year; pails of water were flung at the head of the chanters; the ass was supplied with drink and provender at every division of the service; and the asinines were drinking, dancing, and braying for two days. The hymn to the ass has been preserved; each stanza ends with the burden 'Hez! Sire Ane, hez!' 'Huza! Seignior Ass, Huza!' On other occasions, they put burnt old shoes to fume in the censers; ran about the church leaping, singing, and dancing obscenely; scattering ordure among the audience; playing at dice upon the altar! while a boy-bishop, or a pope of fools, burlesqued the divine service. Sometimes they disguised themselves in the skins of animals, and pretending to be transformed into the animal they represented, it became dangerous, or worse, to meet these abandoned fools. There was a procurator of fools, who was shaved in public, during which he entertained the populace with all the balderdash his genius could invent. We had in Leicester, in 1416, what was called a glutton mass; during the five days of the festival of the Virgin Mary. The people rose early to mass, during which they practised eating and drinking with the most zealous velocity, and, as in France, drew from the corners of the altar the rich puddings placed there.

So late as in 1645, a pupil of Gassendi, writing to his master what he himself witnessed at Aix on the feast of the Innocence, says, 'I have seen, in some monasteries in this province, extravagances solemnized, which the pagans would not have practised. Neither the clergy, nor the guardians, indeed, go to the choir on this day, but all is given up to the lay-brethren, the cabbage-cutters, the errand-boys, the cooks and scullions, the gardeners; in a word, all the menials fill their places in the church, and insist that they perform the offices proper for the day.— They dress themselves with all the sacerdotal ornaments, but torn to rags, or wear them inside out; they hold in their hands the books reversed or sideways, which they pretend to read with large spectacles without glasses, and to which they fix the shells of scooped oranges, which render them so hideous, that one must have seen these madmen to form a notion of their appearance; particularly while dangling the censers, they keep shaking them in derision, and letting the ashes fly about their heads and faces, one against the other. In this equipage they neither sing hymns, nor psalms, nor masses; but mumble a certain gibberish as shrill and squeaking as a herd of pigs whipped on to market. The nonsense-verses they chant are singularly barbarous:

'Hæc est clara dies, clararum clara dierum,
Hæc est festa dies, festarum festa dierum.'¹

There are scenes which equal any which the humour of the Italian burlesque poets have invented, and which might have entered with effect into the 'Malmantile racquistato' of Lippi; but that they should have been endured amidst the solemn offices of religion, and have been performed in cathedrals, while it excites our astonishment, can only be accounted for by perceiving that they were, in truth, the Saturnalia of the Romans. Mr Turner observes, without perhaps having a precise notion that they were copied from the Saturnalia, that 'It could be only by rivaling the pagan revelries, that the christian ceremonies could gain the ascendancy.' Our historian further observes, that these 'licentious festivities were called the December liberties, and seem to have begun at one of the most solemn seasons of the christian year, and to have lasted through the chief part of January.' This very term as well as the time, agrees with that of the ancient Saturnalia:

Age, libertate Decembri,
Quando ka majores voluerunt, usare: narra.
Hor. Lib. II, Sat.

The Roman Saturnalia, thus transplanted into christian churches, had for its singular principle, that of inferiors, whimsically and in mockery, personifying their superiors with a licensed licentiousness. This forms a distinct characteristic from those other popular customs and passages, which the learned have also traced to the Romans, and even more ancient nations.

Our present inquiry is, to illustrate that procession a man, of delighting to reverse the order of society, and ridiculing its decencies.

Here we had our boy-bishop, a legitimate descendant of this family of foolery. On St Nicholas's day, a saint who was the patron of children, the boy-bishop with his mitre parva and a long crosier, attended by his school-mates as his diminutive prebendaries, assumed the title and state of a bishop. The child-bishop preached a sermon, and afterwards, accompanied by his attendants, went about singing and collecting his pence: to such theatrical processions in collegiate bodies, Warton attributes the custom, still existing at Eton, of going ad montem. But this was a tame mummery, compared with the grossness elsewhere allowed in burlesquing religious ceremonies. The English, more particularly after the Reformation, seem not to have polluted the churches with such abuses. The reliqu for the Saturnalia, was not, however, less lively here than on the Continent; but it took a more innocent direction, and was allowed to turn itself into civil life: and since the people would be gratified by mock dignities, and claimed the privilege of ridiculing their masters, it was allowed them by our kings and nobles; and a troop of grotesque character, frolicsome great men, delighting in merry mischief, as recorded in our domestic annals.

The most learned Seiden, with parsimonious phrase and copious sense, has thus compressed the result of an historical dissertation: he derives our ancient Christmas sports at once from the true, though remote, source.— 'Christmas succeeds the Saturnalia; the same time, the same number of holy-days; then the master waited upon the servant like the lord of misrule.'² Such is the title of a facetious potentate, who, in this notice of Seiden's, is not further indicated, for this personage was familiar to his day, but of whom the accounts are so scattered, that his offices and his glory are now equally obscure. The race of this nobility of drollery, and this legitimate king of all hoaxing and quizz, like mightier dynasties, has ceased to exist.

In England our festivities at Christmas appear to have been more entertaining than in other countries. We were once famed for merry Christmas and their peers witness the Italian proverb, 'Ha più di fare che i farsi di Natale in Inghil-terra.' 'He has more business than English ovens at Christmas.' Wherever the king resided there was created for that merry season a Christmas prince, usually called 'the Lord of Misrule;' and when the Scotch once knew under the significant title of 'the Abbot of Unreason.' His office, according to Stowe, was 'to make the rarest pastimes to delight the beholder.' Every nobleman, and every great family surrendered their houses, during this season, to the Christmas prince, who found rivals or usurpers in almost every parish; and most particularly, as we shall see, among the grave students in our inn of court.

The Italian Polydore Vergil, who, residing here, had clearer notions of this facetious personage, considered the Christmas Prince as peculiar to our country. Without venturing to ascend in his genealogy, we must admit his relationship to that ancient family of foolery we have noticed, whether he be legitimate or not. If this whimsical personage, at his creation, was designed to regulate 'misrule,' his lordship, invested with plenary power, cast himself, at length, to delight too much in his 'merry sports.' Stubbes, a morose puritan in the reign of Elizabeth, denominates him 'a great captain of mischiefs,' and has preserved a minute description of all his wild doings in the country; but as Strutt has anticipated me in this amusing extract, I must refer to his 'Sports and Pastimes of the People of England,' p. 264. I prepare another scene of unparalleled Saturnalia, among the grave judges and sergeants of the law, where the Lord of Misrule viewed amidst his frolicsome courtiers, with the humors of hunting the fox and the cat with ten couples of hounds round their great hall, among the other merry sports of those joyous days when sages could play like boys.

For those who can throw themselves back amidst the grotesque humours and clumsy pastimes of our ancestors who, without what we think to be taste, had when of merriment—there has been fortunately preserved a curious history of the manner in which 'A grand Christmas' was kept at our Inn of Court, by the grave and learned Judges.

his, in his 'Origines Juridicales': it is a complete festival of foolery, acted by the students and law officers.—They held for that season every thing in mockery; they had a mock parliament, a Prince of Sophie, or Wisdom, in honourable order of Pegasus, a high constable, marshal, master of the game, a ranger of the forest, lieutenant of the tower, which was a temporary prison for Christmas miscreants, all the paraphernalia of a court burlesqued by these youthful sages before the boyish judges.

The characters personified were in the costume of their assumed offices. On Christmas day, the constable marshal, accoutred with a complete gilded 'harness,' showed that every thing was to be chivalrously ordered; while the lieutenant of the Tower, in 'a fair white armour,' attended with his troop of halberdiers; and the Tower was then placed beneath the fire. After this opening followed by costly feasting; and then nothing less than a hunt with a pack of hounds in their hall!

The master of the game dressed in green velvet, and the ranger of the forest in green satin, bearing a green bow and arrows, each with a hunting horn about their necks, blowing together three blasts of ventry (or hunting), they ran round about the fire three times. The master of the game kneels to be admitted into the service of the high-constable. A huntsman comes into the hall, with nine or ten couple of hounds, bearing on the end of his staff a pursue-mat, which holds, a fox and a cat: these were let loose and mated by the hounds, and killed beneath the fire.

These extraordinary amusements took place after their feast; for these grotesque Saturnalia appeared after that part of their grand Christmas. Supper ended, the constable marshal presented himself with drums playing, mounted on a stage borne by four men, and carried round; he then cries out 'a lord! a lord!' &c. and then calls in mock court every one by name.

Mr Francis Flatlerer, of Fowlshurt.
Mr Randall Rackabite, of Rascal hall, in the county of Rake-hell.

Mr Morgan Munchance, of Much Monkery, in the county of Mad Mopery.

Mr Bartholomew Bald-breech of Buttock-bury, in the county of Break-neck.*

They had also their mock arraignments. The king's servant, after dinner or supper, 'orator-like,' complained that the constable-marshal had suffered great disorders to prevail; the complaint was answered by the common-sergeant, who was to show his talent at defending the cause. The king's-sergeant replies; they rejoin, &c: till one at length is committed to the Tower, for being found most mischievous. If any offender contrives to escape from the precinct of the Tower into the buttery, and brought into the hall a manchet (or small loaf) upon the point of a knife, he was pardoned; for the buttery in this jovial season was considered as a sanctuary. Then began the revels. The French derives this term from the French reveller, to wake from sleep. These were sports of dancing, masking, comedies, &c. (for some were called solemn revels,) and in great houses, and were so denominated because they were performed by night; and these various pastimes were regulated by a master of the revels.

Amongst 'the grand Christmases,' a personage of no small importance was 'the Lord of Misrule.' His lordship was abroad early in the morning, and if he lacked any of his officers, he entered their chamber, to drag forth his officers; but after breakfast his lordship's power failed; and it was in suspense till night, when his personal presence was paramount, or as Dugdale expresses it, 'and his power is most potent.'

Such once were the pastimes of the whole learned bench; and when once it happened that the under-barristers did justice on Candlemas-day, according to the ancient order of the society, when the judges were present, the whole

A rare quarto tract seems to give an authentic narrative of these grand Christmas-keepings, exhibiting all their peculiarity and burlesque humour: it is entitled 'Gesta Princeps; or the History of the high and mighty Prince of Purpoole, Archduke of Stapulia and Berne (Naples and Bernard's Inns), Duke of High and Noble Marquess of St. Giles and Tottenham, Count of Bloomsbury and Clerkenwell, Great Lord of the County of Hologion, Kentish Town, &c. Knight and Sovereign of the most heretical order of the Helmslet, who reigned A.D. 1804.' It is full of burlesque speeches and adventures. As it was printed in 1698, I suppose it was from a manuscript of the times; the preface gives no information put out of commons, for example sake; and if the same omission were repeated, they were to be fined or disbarred; for these dancings were thought necessary, 'as much conducing to the making of gentlemen more fit for their books at other times.' I cannot furnish a detailed notice of these pastimes; for Dugdale, whenever he indicates them, spares his gravity from recording the evanescent frolics, by a provoking &c, &c, &c.

The dance 'round about the coal-fire' is taken off in the 'Rehearsal.' These revels have also been ridiculed by Donne in his Satires, Prior in his Alma, and Pope in his Dunciad. 'The judge to dance, his brother sergeants call.'

'The Lord of Misrule,' in the inns of court, latterly did not conduct himself with any recollection of 'Mechinissimus ibis,' being unreasonable; but the 'sparks of the Temple,' as a contemporary calls them, had gradually, in the early part of Charles I's reign, yielded themselves up to excessive disorders. Sir Symonds D'Ewes, in his ms. diary in 1620, has noticed their choice of a lieutenant, or lord of misrule, who seems to have practised all the mischief he invented; and the festival days, when 'a standing table was kept,' were accompanied by dicing, and much gaming, oaths, execrations, and quarrels; being of a serious turn of mind, he regrets this, for he adds, 'the sport, of itself, I conceive to be lawful.'

I suspect that the last memorable act of a Lord of Misrule of the inns of court occurred in 1627, when the Christmas game became serious. The Lord of Misrule then issued an edict to his officers to go out at Twelfth-night to collect his rents, in the neighbourhood of the Temple, at the rate of five shillings a house; and on those who were in their beds, or would not pay, he levied a distress. An unexpected resistance at length occurred in a memorable battle with the Lord Mayor in person:—and how the Lord of Misrule for some time stood victor, with his gunner, and his trumpeter, and his martial array: and how heavily and fearfully stood my Lord Mayor amidst his 'watch and ward;' and how their lordships agreed to meet half way, each to preserve his independent dignity, till one knocked down the other: and how the long halberds clashed with the short swords: how the Lord Mayor valorously took the Lord Misrule prisoner with his own civic hand: and how the Christmas prince was immured in the Counter: and how the learned Templars insisted on their privilege, and the unlearned of Ram-alley and Fleet-street asserted their right of saving their crown-pieces: and finally how this combat of mockery and earnestness was settled, not without the introduction of 'a God,' as Horace allows on great occasions, in the interposition of the king and the attorney-general—altogether the tale had been well told in some comic epic; but the wits of that day let it pass out of their hands.

I find this event, which seems to record the last desperate effort of a 'Lord of Misrule,' in a manuscript letter of the learned Mede to Sir Martin Stuteville; and some particulars are collected from Hammond L'Estrange's Life of Charles I.

'Jan. 12, 1627-8.

'On Saturday the Templars chose one Mr Palmer their Lord of Misrule, who on Twelfth-eve, late in the night, sent out to gather up his rents at five shillings a house, in Ram-alley and Fleet-street. At every door they came they winded the Temple horn, and if at the second blast or summons they within opened not the door, then the Lord of Misrule cried out, 'Give fire, gunner!' His gunner was as a robustus Vulcan, and the gun or petard itself was a huge overgrown smith's hammer. This being complained of to my Lord Mayor, he said he would be with them about eleven o'clock on Sunday night last; willing that all that ward should attend him with their halberds, and that himself, besides those that came out of his house should bring the Watches along with him. His lordship, thus attended, advanced as high as Ram-alley in martial equipage; when forth came the Lord of Misrule, attended by his gallants out of the Temple-gate, with their swords, all armed in cuirasse. A halberdier had the Lord of Misrule come to my Lord Mayor. He answered, No! let the Lord Mayor come to me! At length they agreed to meet halfway; and, as the interview of rival princes is never without danger of some ill accident, so it happened in this; for first, Mr Palmer being quarrelled with, for not pulling off his hat to my Lord Mayor, and giving cross answers, the halberds began to fly about his ears, and he and his company to brandish their swords. At last being beaten to the ground, and the Lord of Misrule sore wounded, they were fain to yield to the longer and more numerous weapon. My Lord Mayor taking Mr Falmer by the shoulder, led him to the Comptrol, and thrust him in at the prison-gate with a kind of indignation; and so notwithstanding his hurts, he was forced to lie among the common prisoners for two nights. On Tuesday the king's attorney became a suitor to my Lord Mayor for their liberty; which his lordship granted upon condition they should repay the gathered rents, and do reparations upon broken doors. Thus the game ended. Mr Attorney-General, being of the same house, fetched them in his own coach, and carried them to the court, where the King himself reconciled my Lord Mayor and them together with joining all hands; the gentlemen of the Temple being this Shrove-tide to present a Mask, to their Majesties, over and besides the King's own great Mask, to be performed at the Banqueting-house by an hundred actors.*

Thus it appears, that although the grave citizens did well and rightly protect themselves, yet, by the attorney-general taking the Lord of Misrule in his coach, and the king giving his royal interference between the parties, that they considered that this Lord of Foolery had certain ancient privileges; and it was, perhaps, a doubt with them, whether this interference of the Lord Mayor might not be considered as severe and unseasonable. It is probable, however, that the arm of the civil power brought all future Lords of Misrule to their senses. Perhaps this dynasty in the empire of foolery closed with this Christmas prince, who fell a victim to the arbitrary taxation he levied. I find after this, orders made for the Inner Temple, for 'preventing of that general scandal and obloquy, which the House hath heretofore incurred in time of Christmas'; and that 'there be not any going abroad out of the gates of this House, by any lord or others, to break open any house, or take any thing in the name of rent or a distress.'

These 'Lords of Misrule,' and their mock court and royalty, appear to have been only extinguished with the English sovereignty itself, at the time of our republican government. Edmund Gayton tells a story, to show the strange impressions of strong fancies: as his work is of great rarity, I shall transcribe the story in his own words, both to give a conclusion to this inquiry, and a specimen of his style of narrating this sort of little things. 'A gentleman importuned, at a fire-night in the public hall, to accept the high and mighty place of a mock-emperor, which was duly conferred upon him by seven mock-electors. At the same time, with much wit and ceremony, the emperor accepted his chair of state, which was placed in the highest table in the hall; and at his instalment all pomp, reverence, and signs of homage were used by the whole company; inasmuch that our emperor, having a spice of self-conceit before, was soundly peppered now, for he was instantly metamorphosed into the statelest, gravest, and commanding soul, that ever eye beheld. Taylor acting Arbaces, or Swanston D'Ambrose, were shadows to him: his pace, his look, his voice, and all his garb, was altered. Alexander upon his elephant, nay, upon the castle upon that elephant, was not so high; and so close did this imaginary honour stick to his fancy, that for many years he could not shake off this one night's assumed deportments, until the times came that drove all monarchical imaginations out, not only of his head, but every one's.* 'This mock 'emperor' was unquestionably one of these 'Lords of Misrule,' or 'a Christmas Prince.' The 'public hall' was that of the Temple, or Lincoln's Inn, or Gray's Inn. And it was natural enough, when the levelling equality of our theatrical and practical commonwealths were come into vogue, that even the shadowy regality of mockery startled them, by reviving the recollections of ceremonies and titles, which some might incline, as they afterwards did, seriously to restore. The 'Prince of Christmas' did not, however, attend the Restoration of Charles II.

The Saturnalian spirit has not been extinct even in our days. The Mayor of Garrat, with the mock addresses and burlesque election, was an image of such satirical exhibitions of their superiors, so delightful to the people. France, at the close of Louis XIV's reign, first saw her imaginary 'Regiment de la Calotte,' which was the terror of the sinners of the day, and the blockheads of all times. This 'movement of the scull-caps' originated in an officer and a soldier, who, suffering from violent head aches, was recommended the use of a scull cap of lead; and his companions, great wits, formed themselves into a regiment, to be composed only of persons distinguished by their extravagance in words or in deeds. They elected a general, they bought their arms blazoned, and struck medals, and issued 'brevets,' and 'lettres patentes,' and granted pensions to certain individuals, stating their claims to be enrolled in the regiment for some egregious extravagance. They diversified these army commissions; and the idlers, the pioneers, were busied in clearing their way, by picking out the omissions and commissions of the most noted characters. Those who were favoured with its 'brevets' were tried against the regiment; but at length they found it easier to wear their 'calotte,' and say nothing. The society began in raillery and playfulness, seasoned by a spice of malice. It produced a great number of ingenious and satirical little things. That the privileges of the 'calotte' were afterwards abused, and calumny too often took the place of poignant satire, is the history of human nature as well as of 'the calottes.'

Another society in the same spirit has been discovered in one of the lordships of Poland. It was called 'The Republic of Baboonery.' The society was a burlesque model of their own government: a king, chancellor, counsellors, archbishops, judges, &c. If a member would engross the conversation, he was immediately appointed orator of the republic. If he spoke with impropriety, the absurdity of his conversation usually led to some estate office created to perpetuate his folly. A man talking of much of dogs, would be made a master of the best hounds; or vaunting his courage, perhaps a field marshal; and if bigoted on disputable matters and speculative opinions in religion, he was considered to be nothing less than an inquisitor. This was a pleasant and useful project to reform the manners of the Polish youth; and one of the Polish kings good-humouredly observed, that he considered himself 'as much King of Baboonery, as King of Poland.' We have had in our own country some attempts at similar Saturnalia; but their success has been so equivocal, that they hardly afford materials for our domestic history.

RELIQUIE GETHINIÆ.

In the south aisle of Westminster Abbey stands a monument erected to the memory of Lady Grace Gethin. A statue of her ladyship represents her kneeling, holding a book in her right hand. This accomplished lady was considered as a prodigy in her day, and appears to have excited a feeling of enthusiasm for her character. She died early, having scarcely attained to womanhood, although wife; for 'all this goodness and all this excellence was bounded within the compass of twenty years.'

But it is her book commemorated in marble, and not her character, which may have inherited the marble that cherishes it, which has excited my curiosity and my suspicion. After her death a number of loose papers were found in her hand-writing, which could not fail to attract, and perhaps, astonish their readers, with the maturity of thought and the vast capacity which had composed them. These relics of genius were collected together, methodized under heads, and appeared with the title of 'Reliquiæ Gethinæ; or some remains of Grace Lady Gethin, lately deceased: being a collection of choice discourses, pleasant apophthegms, and witty sentences; written by her for the most part by way of Essay and at spare hours; published by her nearest relations to preserve her memory. Second Edition, 1700.'

Of this book, considering that comparatively it is modest and the copy before me is called a second edition, it is somewhat extraordinary that it seems always to have been a very scarce one. Even Ballard, in his Memoirs of Learned Ladies, 1750, mentions that these remains are 'very difficult to be procured'; and Sir William Murray, in a manuscript note observed, that 'this book was very scarce.' It bears now a high price. A hint is given in the preface that the work was chiefly printed for the use of her friends; yet, by a second edition, we must infer that the public at large were so. There is a poem prefixed with the signature W. C. which no one will hesitate to pronounce is by Congreve; he wrote indeed another poem to celebrate this astonishing book, for, considered as the production of a young lady, it is a miraculous, rather than a human production. The last lines in this poem we might expect from Congreve in his happier vein, who strives to preserve his panegyric amidst that caustic wit, with which he keenly touched the age.

A POEM IN PRAISE OF THE AUTHOR.

I that hate books, such as come daily out
By public licence to the reading rout,
A due religion yet observe to this;
And here assert, if any thing's amiss,
It can be only the compiler's fault,
Who has ill-drest the charming author's thought—
That was all right: her beautiful looks were join'd
To a no less admired excellent mind.
But oh! this glory of frail Nature's dead,
As I shall be that write, and you that read.*
Once, to be out of fashion, I'll conclude
With something that may tend to public good:
I wish that piety, from which in heaven
The fair is placed—to the laws sleeves were given;
Her justice—to the knot of men whose care
From the raised millions is to take their share.

W. C.*

The book claimed all the praise the finest genius could bestow on it. But let us hear the editor.—He tells us, not 'It is a vast disadvantage to authors to publish their most unguarded thoughts, and first notions hastily set down, and designed only as materials for a future structure.' And he adds, 'That the work may not come short of that great and just expectation which the world had of her while she was alive, and still has of every thing that is the genuine product of her pen, they must be told that this was written for the most part in haste, were her first conceptions and overflowings of her luxuriant fancy, noted with her pencil at spare hours, or as she was dressing, as her Ilapepyov said, and set down just as they came into her mind.'

All this will serve as a memorable example of the cant and mendacity of an editor! and that total absence of critical judgment that could assert such matured reflection, so exquisite a style, could ever have been 'first conceptions, just as they came into the mind of Lady Gethin, as she was dressing.'

The truth is, that Lady Gethin may have had little concern in all these 'Reliquiæ Gethinianæ.' They indeed might well have delighted their readers; but those who had read Lord Bacon's Essays, and other writers, such as John Feiltham, and Osborne, from whom these relics are chiefly extracted, might have wondered that Bacon should have been so little known to the families of the Nortons and the Gethins, to whom her ladyship was allied; to Langreve and to the editor; and still more particularly to subsequent compilers, as Ballard in his Memoirs, and only the Rev. Mark Noble in his Continuation of Granger, do both, with all the innocence of criticism, give specimens of these 'Relicks,' without a suspicion that they are transcribing literally from Lord Bacon's Essays! Unquestionably Lady Gethin herself intended no imposition: her mind had all the delicacy of her sex; she noted such from the book she seems most to have delighted in; nothing less than the most undiscerning friends could have imagined that every thing written by the hand of this young lady was her 'first conceptions,' and apologies for some of the finest thoughts, in the most vigorous style which the English language can produce. It seems, however, to prove that Lord Bacon's essays were not much read at the time this volume appeared.

The marble book in Westminster Abbey must, therefore, lose most of its leaves; but it was necessary to discover the origin of this miraculous production of a young lady. What is Lady Gethin's, or what is not hers, in this miscellany of plagiarisms, it is not material to examine. Those passages in which her ladyship speaks in her own name probably are of original growth: of this kind many passages great vivacity of thought, drawn from actual observation on what was passing around her; but even among these are intermixed the splendid passages of Bacon and other writers.

It shall not crowd my pages with specimens of a very bad example, as this thought, that strikes with a sudden effect, in the case of Hawkesworth, when he so pathetically concluded his paper?

suspicious author. One of her subjects has attracted my attention; for it shows the corrupt manners of persons of fashion who lived between 1680 and 1700. To find a mind so pure and elevated as Lady Gethin's unquestionably was discussing whether it were most advisable to have for a husband a general lover, or one attached to a mistress, and deciding by the force of reasoning in favour of the dissipated man (for a woman, she seems, had only the alternative,) evinces a public deprivation of morals. These manners were the wretched remains of the Court of Charles II, when Wycherley, Dryden, and Congreve seem to have written with much less invention, in their indecent plots and language, than is imagined.

'I know not which is worse, to be wife to a man that is continually changing his loves, or to an husband that hath but one mistress whom he loves with a constant passion. And if you keep some measure of civility to her, he will at least esteem you; but he of the roving humour plays an hundred frolics that divert the town and perplex his wife. She often meets with her husband's mistress, and is at a loss how to carry herself towards her. 'Tis true the constant man is ready to sacrifice, every moment, his whole family to his love; he hates any place where she is not, is prodigal in what concerns his love, covetous in other respects; expects you should be blind to all he doth, and though you can't but see, yet must not dare to complain. And tho' both he who lends his heart to whosoever pleases it, and he that gives it entirely to one, do both of them require the exactest devoir from their wives, yet I know not if it be not better to be wife to an unconstant husband (provided he be something discreet) than to a constant fellow who is always perplexing her with his inconstant humour. For the unconstant lovers are commonly the best humoured; but let them be what they will, women ought not to be unfaithful for Virtue's sake and their own, nor to offend by example. It is one of the best bonds of charity and obedience in the wife if she think her husband wise, which she will never do if she find him jealous.'

'Wives are young men's mistresses, companions for middle age, and old men's nurses.'

The last degrading sentence is found in some writer, whose name I cannot recollect. Lady Gethin, with an intellect so superior to that of the women of that day, had no conception of the dignity of the female character, the claims of virtue, and the duties of honour. A wife was only to know obedience and silence: however, she hints that such a husband should not be jealous! There was a sweetness in revenge reserved for some of these married women.

ROBINSON CRUSOE.

Robinson Crusoe, the favourite of the learned and the unlearned, of the youth and the adult; the book that was to constitute the library of Rousseau's Emelius, owes its secret charm to its being a new representation of human nature, yet drawn from an existing state; this picture of self-education, self-inquiry, self-happiness, is scarcely a fiction, although it includes all the magic of romance; and is not a mere narrative of truth, since it displays all the forcible genius of one of the most original minds our literature can boast. The history of the work is therefore interesting. It was treated in the author's time as a mere idle romance, for the philosophy was not discovered in the story; after his death it was considered to have been pilaged from the papers of Alexander Selkirk, confided to the author, and the honour, as well as the genius, of De Foe were alike questioned.

The entire history of this work of genius may now be traced, from the first hints to the mature state, to which only the genius of De Foe could have wrought it.

The adventures of Selkirk are well known; he was found on the desert island of Juan Fernandez, where he had formerly been left, by Woodes Rogers and Edward Cooke, who in 1712 published their voyages, and told the extraordinary history of Crusoe's prototype, with all those curious and minute particulars which Selkirk had freely communicated to them. This narrative of itself is extremely interesting; and has been given entire by Captain Horney; it may also be found in the Biographia Britannica.

In this artless narrative we may discover more than the embryo of Robinson Crusoe. The first appearance of Selkirk, 'a man clothed in goats skins, who looked more wild than the first owners of them.' The two huts he had built, the one to dress his victuals, the other to sleep in; his contrivance to get fire, by rubbing two pieces of pimento wood together; his distress for the want of bread and salt, till he came to relish his meat without either; his wearing out his shoes, till he grew so accustomed to be without them, that he could not for a long time afterwards, on his return home, use them without inconvenience; his bedstead of his own carving, and his bed of goat skins; when his gunpowder failed, his teaching himself by continual exercise to run as swiftly as the goats; his falling from a precipice in catching hold of a goat, stunned and bruised, till coming to his senses he found the goat dead under him; his taming kids to divert himself by dancing with them and his cats; his converting a nail into a needle; his sewing his goat skins with little thongs of the same; and when his knife was worn to the back, contriving to make blades out of some iron hoops. His solacing himself in this solitude by singing psalms, and preserving a social feeling in his fervent prayers. And the habitation which Selkirk had raised, to reach which, they followed him 'with difficulty, climbing up and creeping down many rocks, till they came at last to a pleasant spot of ground full of grass and of trees, where stood his two huts, and his numerous tame goats showed his solitary retreat;' and finally, his indifference to return to a world, from which his feelings had been so perfectly weaned. Such were the first rude materials of a new situation in human nature: an European in a primeval state, with the habits or mind of a savage.

The year after this account was published, Selkirk and his adventures attracted the notice of Steele; who was not likely to pass unobserved a man and a story so strange and so new. In his paper of 'The Englishman,' Dec. 1713, he communicates further particulars of Selkirk. Steele became acquainted with him; he says, that 'he could discern that he had been much separated from company from his aspect and gesture. There was a strong but cheerful seriousness in his looks, and a certain disregard to the ordinary things about him, as if he had been sunk in thought. The man frequently bewailed his return to the world, which could not, he said, with all its enjoyments, restore him to the tranquillity of his solitude.' Steele adds another very curious change in this wild man, which occurred some time after he had seen him. 'Though I frequently conversed with him, after a few months' absence, he met me in the street, and though he spoke to me, I could not recollect that I had seen him. Familiar converse in this town had taken off the loneliness of his aspect, and quite altered the air of his face.' De Foe could not fail of being struck by these interesting particulars of the character of Selkirk; but probably it was another observation of Steele which threw the germ of Robinson Crusoe into the mind of De Foe. 'It was matter of great curiosity to hear him, as he was a man of sense, give an account of the different revolutions in his own mind in that long solitude.'

The work of De Foe, however, was no sudden ebullition; long engaged in political warfare, condemned to suffer imprisonment, and at length struck by a fit of apoplexy, this unhappy and unprosperous man of genius on his recovery was reduced to a comparative state of solitude. To his injured feelings and lonely contemplations, Selkirk in his desert tale, and Steele's vivifying hint, often occurred; and to all these we perhaps owe the instructive and delightful tale, which shows man what he can do for himself, and what the fortitude of piety does for man. Even the personage of Friday is not a mere coinage of his brain; a Mosquito Indian, described by Dampier, was the prototype. Robinson Crusoe was not given to the world till 1719; seven years after the publication of Selkirk's adventures. Selkirk could have no claims on De Foe; for he had only supplied the man of genius with that which lies open to all; and which no one had, or perhaps could have converted into the wonderful story we possess but De Foe himself. Had De Foe not written Robinson Crusoe, the name and story of Selkirk had been passed over like others of the same sort; yet Selkirk has the merit of having detailed his own history, in a manner so interesting, as to have attracted the notice of Steele, and to have inspired the genius of De Foe.

After this, the originality of Robinson Crusoe will no longer be suspected; and the idle tale which Dr Beattie has repeated of Selkirk having supplied the materials of his story to De Foe, from which our author borrowed his work, and published for his own profit, will be finally put to rest.

This is due to the injured honour and the genius of De Foe.

CATHOLIC AND PROTESTANT DRAMAS.

Literature, and the arts connected with it, in this free country, have been involved with its political state, and have sometimes flourished or declined with the fortunes, or been made instrumental to the purposes of the parties which had espoused them. Thus in our dramatic history, in the early period of the Reformation, the Catholics were secretly working on the stage; and long afterwards the royalist party, under Charles I., possessed it till they provoked their own ruin. The Catholics, in their expiring cause, took refuge in the theatre, and disguised the invectives they would have vented in sermons, under the more popular forms of the drama, where they freely ridiculed the chiefs of the new religion, as they termed the Reformation, and 'the new Gospellers,' or those who quoted their Testament as an authority for their proceedings. Fuller notices this circumstance. 'The popish priests, though unseen, stood behind the hangings, or lurked in the tiring house.*' These found supporters among the elder part of their auditors, who were tenacious of their old habits and doctrines: and opposers in the younger, who eagerly adopted the term reformation in its full sense.

This conduct of the Catholics called down a proclamation from Edward VI, when we find that the government was most anxious, that these pieces should not be performed in 'the English tongue'; so that we may infer that the government was not alarmed at treason in Latin. This proclamation states, 'that a great number of those that be common players of interludes or plays, as well within the city of London as elsewhere, who for the most part play such interludes as contain matter tending to sedition, &c, &c, whereupon are grown, and daily are like to grow, much division, tumult, and uproars in this realm. The king charges his subjects that they should not openly or secretly play in the English tongue, any kind of Interlude, Play, Dialogue, or other matter set forth in form of Play, on pain of imprisonment, &c.'

This was, however, but a temporary prohibition; it cleared the stage for a time of these Catholic dramatists; but reformed Interludes, as they were termed, were afterwards permitted.

These Catholic dramas would afford some speculation to historical inquirers: we know they made very free strictures on the first heads of the Reformation, on Cromwell, Cranmer, and their party; but they were probably over come in their struggles with their prevailing rivals. Some may yet possibly lurk in their manuscript state. We have printed, one of these Moralities, or moral plays, or allegorical dramatic pieces, which succeeded the Mysteries in the reign of Henry VIII, entitled 'Every Man'; it is the character of that hero, the writer not unaptly designates Human Nature herself.† This comes from the Catholic school, to recall the auditors back to the former ceremonies of that church; but it levels no strokes of personal satire on the Reformers. Percy observed that from the solemnity of the subjects, the summoning of men out of the world by death, and by the gravity of its conduct, not without some attempts, however rude, to excite terror and pity, this morality may not improperly be referred to the class of tragedy. Such ancient simplicity is not worthless to the poetical antiquary: although the modern reader would soon feel weary at such inartificial productions, yet the invention which may be discovered in these rude pieces would be sublime, warm with the colours of a Gray or a Collins.

On the side of the reformed we have no deficiency of attacks on the superstitions and idolatries of the Romish church; and Satan, and his old son Hypocrisy, are very busy at their intrigues with another hero called 'Last Juvenius,' and the seductive mistress they introduce him to, 'Abominable Living': this was printed in the reign of Edward VI. It is odd enough to see quoted in a dramatic performance chapter and verse, as formally as if sermon were to be performed. There we find such rail learning as this:—

'Read the V, to the Galatians, and there you shall see That the flesh rebelleth against the spirit'— or in homely rhymes like these,

'I will show you what St Paul doth declare
In his epistle to the Hebrews, and the X chapter.

* Eccl. Hist. Book VII, 380.

† It has been preserved by Hawkins in his 'Origin of the English Drama,' Vol. I.

In point of historical information respecting the pending struggle between the Catholics and the 'new Gospellers,' I do not glean much secret history from these pieces: they curiously exemplify that regular progress in the story of man, which has shown itself in the more recent revolutions of Europe: the old people still clinging, from habit and affection, to what is obsolete, and the younger men in establishing what is new; while the balance of man's happiness trembles between both.

Thus 'Lusty Juventus' conveys to us in his rude simplicity the feeling of that day. Satan, in lamenting the small of superstition, declares that 'The old people would believe still in my laws,

But the younger sort lead them the contrary way—
They will live as the Scripture teacheth them.'

poetry when informed by his old master, the Devil, the change that 'Lusty Juventus' has undergone, proves his surprise; attaching that usual odium of madness on the early reformers, in the spirit that the leaders were nick-named at their first revolution by the lords the Spaniards, 'Les Gueux,' or the Beggars.

'What, is Juventus become so tame
To be a new Gospeller?'

It is in his address to the young reformer, who asserts if he is not bound to obey his parents but 'in all things just and lawful,' Hypocrisy thus vents his feeling;

Lawful, quoth he? Ah! fool! fool!
Wilt thou set men to school
When they be old?
I may say to you secretly,
The world was never merry
Since children were so bold;

Now every boy will be a teacher,
The father a fool, the child a preacher,
This is pretty gear!
The foul presumption of youth
Will shortly turn to great ruth,
I fear, I fear, I fear!

In these rude and simple lines there is something like the sacrifice of composition: the repetition of words in the first and the last lines, was doubtless intended as a grace to the poetry. That the ear of the poet was not unmusical, amidst the inartificial construction of his verse, will appear in this curious catalogue of holy things, which Hypocrisy has drawn up, not without humour, in asserting services he had performed for the Devil.

'And I brought up such superstition
Under the name of holiness and religion,
That deceived almost all.

As—holy cardinals, holy popes
Holy vestments, holy copes,
Holy hermits, and friars,
Holy priests, holy bishops,
Holy monks, holy abbots,
Yea, and all obstinate liars.
Holy pardons, holy beads
Holy saints, holy images,
Wah holy holy blood.
Holy stocks, holy stones
Holy clouts, holy bones,
Yea, and holy holy wood.

Holy skins, holy bulles,
Holy rochetts, and cowls,
Holy crutches and staves,
Holy hoods, holy caps,
Holy mikree, holy hats,
And good holy holy knaves.
Holy days, holy fastings,
Holy twatching, holy tastings,
Holy visions and sights,
Holy wax, holy lead,
Holy water, holy bread,
To drive away the spirits.

Holy fire, holy palmes,
Holy oil, holy cream,
And holy ashes also;
Holy brooches, holy rings,
Holy kneeling, holy censings,
And a hundred trim-trams mo.

Holy crosses, holy bells,
Holy reliques, holy Jouels,
Of mine own invention;
Holy candles, holy tapers,
Holy parchments, holy papers;—
Had not you a holy son?

Some of these Catholic dramas were long afterwards performed among Catholic families. In an unpublished letter of the times, I find a cause in the star-chamber respecting a play being acted at Christmas 1614, at the house of Sir John Yorke; the consequences of which were heavy fines and imprisonment. The letter writer describes it, as containing 'many foul passages to the vilifying of our religion and exacting of popery, for which he and his lady, as principal procurers, were fined one thousand pounds apiece, and imprisoned in the Tower for a year; two or three of his brothers at five hundred pounds apiece, and others in other sums.'

THE HISTORY OF THE THEATRE DURING ITS SUPPRESSION.

A period in our dramatic annals has been passed over during the progress of the civil wars, which indeed was one of silence, but not of repose in the theatre. It lasted beyond the death of Charles I, when the fine arts seemed also to have suffered with the monarch. The theatre, for the first time in any nation, was abolished by a public ordinance, and the actors, and consequently all that family of genius who by their labours or their tastes are connected with the drama, were reduced to silence. The actors were forcibly dispersed and became even some of the most persecuted objects of the new government.

It may excite our curiosity to trace the hidden footsteps of this numerous fraternity of genius. Hypocrisy and Fanaticism had, at length, triumphed over Wit and Satire. A single blow could not, however, annihilate those never dying powers; nor is suppression always extinction.—Reduced to a state which did not allow of uniting in a body, still their habits and their affections could not desert them: actors would attempt to resume their functions, and the genius of the authors, and the taste of the people would occasionally break out, though scattered and concealed.

Mr Gifford has noticed, in his introduction to Massinger, the noble contrast between our actors at that time, with those of revolutionary France, when, to use his own emphatic expression, 'One wretched actor only deserted his sovereign; while of the vast multitude fostered by the nobility and the royal family of France, not one individual adhered to their cause: all rushed madly forward to plunder and assassinate their benefactors.'

The contrast is striking, but the result must be traced to a different principle; for the cases are not parallel as they appear. The French actors did not occupy the same ground as ours. Here the fanatics shut up the theatre, and extirpated the art and the artists; there, the fanatics enthusiastically converted the theatre into an instrument of their own revolution, and the French actors therefore found an increased national patronage. It was natural enough that actors would not desert a flourishing profession. 'The plunder and assassinations,' indeed, were quite peculiar to themselves as Frenchmen, not as actors.

The destruction of the theatre here was the result of an ancient quarrel between the puritanic party and the whole corps dramatique. In this little history of plays and players, like more important history, we perceive how all human events form but a series of consequences, linked together; and we must go back to the reign of Elizabeth to comprehend an event which occurred in that of Charles the First. It has been perhaps peculiar to this land of contending opinions, and of happy and unhappy liberty, that a gloomy sect was early formed, who, drawing, as they fancied, the principles of their conduct from the literal precepts of the Gospel, formed those views of human nature which were more practicable in a desert than a city, and which were rather suited to a monastic order than a polished people. These were our Puritans, who at first, perhaps from utter simplicity, among other extravagant reforms, imagined that of the extinction of the theatre.—Numerous works from that time fatigued their own pens and their readers' heads, founded on literal interpretations of the Scriptures, which were applied to our drama, though written ere our drama existed; voluminous quotations from the Fathers, who had only witnessed farcical interludes and licentious pantomimes; they even quoted classical authority to prove that 'a stage player' was considered infamous among the Romans; among whom, however, Roscius, the admiration of Rome, received the princely remuneration of a thousand denarii per diem; the tragedian Esopus bequeathed about 150,000*l* to his son;—remembrances, which show the high regard in which the great actors were held among the Roman people.

A series of writers might be collected of these antient a Red Bull playhouse, which was a large one, with such abundance that as many went back for want of room as were. The dramatic contrivance consisted of a combination of the richest comic scenes into one piece, from Shakespeare, Marston, Shirley, &c. concealed under some king title; and these pieces of plays were called 'Humours' or 'Drolleries.' These have been collected by LAMBE, and reprinted by KIRKMAN, as put together by Cox, for the use of theatrical booths at the fairs.* An argument prefixed to each piece serves as its plot; and now as most are from some of our dramas, these 'Drolleries' may still be read with great amusement, and offer, altogether, an extraordinary specimen of our natural humour. The price this collection obtains among book-shops is excessive. In 'The bouncing Knight or the Merry robb'd' we recognize our old friend Falstaff, and his celebrated adventure: 'The Equal Match' is made of 'Rule a Wife and have a Wife'; and thus most are, however, some original pieces by Cox himself, which were the most popular favourites; being characters made by himself, for himself, from ancient farces: such are, 'The Humours of John Swabber, Simpleton the smith, &c. These remind us of the extempore comedy of the pantomimical characters of Italy, invented by actors of genius. This Cox was the delight of the city, the metropolis, and the universities: assisted by the greatest actors of the time, expelled from the theatre, it was he who still perched alive, as if it were by stealth, the suppressed wit of the drama. That he merited the distinctive epithet of the incomparable Robert Cox, as Kirkman calls him, we can only judge by the memorial of our mimetic genius which will be best given in Kirkman's words. 'As meanly you may now think of these Drolls, they were then acted by the best comedians; and I may say, by some that exceeded all now living; the incomparable Robert Cox, who was not only the principal actor, but also the writer and author of most of these farces. How have I and his cried up for his John Swabber, and Simpleton the smith; in which he being to appear with a large piece of bread and butter, I have frequently known several of the noble spectators and auditors to long for it; and once that a famous natural Jack Adams of Clerkenwell, seeing him knead bread and butter on the stage, and knowing him, cried 'Cuz! Cuz! give me some!' to the great pleasure of the audience. And so naturally did he act the Smith's part, that being at a fair in a country town, and that farce being presented, the only master-smith of the town came forward, saying, 'Well, although your father speaks so ill of you, yet when the fair is done, if you will come and work with me, I will give you twelve pence a week more than I pay any other journeyman.' Thus was he taken for a smith at that time, indeed, as much of any trade.'

To this low state the gloomy and exasperated fanatics, who so often smarted under the satirical whips of the dramatists, had reduced the drama itself; without, however, extinguishing the talents of the players, or the finer feelings of those who once derived their fame from that noble art of genius, the English stage. At the first suspension of the theatre by the Long Parliament in 1642, they went to their feelings in an admirable satire. About the year 1640, 'petitions' to the parliament from various classes were put into vogue; multitudes were presented to the house from all parts of the country and from the city of London; and some of these were extraordinary. The Duke of York, said to have been 15,000 in number, declaimed with great eloquence on the blood-sucking malignants for taking the privileges of parliament, and threatened to go to extremities, and make good the saying 'necessity knows no law'; there was one from the beggars, who declared that by means of the bishops and popish lords they were starved. The title of this collection is 'The Wits, or Sport upon the stage, in select pieces of Drollery, digested into scenes by way of dialogue. Together with variety of Humours of several sorts, fitted for the pleasure and content of all persons, either at Court, City, Country, or Camp. The like never before published, printed for H. Marsh, 1662,' again printed for F. Kirkman, 1672. To Kirkman's edition is prefixed a curious print representing the inside of a Bartholomew-fair theatre. Several scenes are introduced. In the middle of the stage, a clown in a fool's cap peeps out of the curtain with a lable from his mouth. 'Tu quoque,' which perhaps was a cant expression for clowns or fools. Then a changeling, a simpleton, a dancing master, Clause the beggar, Sir John Falstaff the booby. Our notion of Falstaff by this print seems very different from that of our ancestors; their Falstaff is no extraneous obesity, and he seems not to have required, to be stuffed, so much 'stuffing' as ours does.

knew not where to get bread; and we are told of a third from the tradesmen's wives, in London, headed by a brewer's wife: all these were encouraged by their party, and were alike 'most thankfully accepted.'

The satirists soon turned this new political trick of 'petitions,' into an instrument for their own purpose: we have 'Petitions of the Poets,'—of the House of Commons to the King,—Remonstrances to the Porters' Petition, &c.; spirited political satires. One of these, the 'Players' Petition to the Parliament,' after being so long silenced, that they might play again, is replete with sarcastic allusions. It may be found in that rare collection entitled 'Rump Songs, 1662,' but with the usual incorrectness of the press in that day. The following extract I have corrected by a manuscript copy:

'Now while you reign, our low petition craves
That we, the king's true subjects and your slaves,
May in our comic mirth and tragic rage
Set up the theatre, and show the stage;
This shop of truth and fancy, where we vow
Not to act any thing you disallow:
We will not dare at your strange votes to jeer,
Or personate King Pym* with his state-floor;
Aspiring Cataline best be forgot,
Bloody Sejanus, or whoever could plot
Confusion 'gainst a state; the war betwixt
The parliament and just Harry the Sixth
Shall have no thought or mention, 'cause their power
Not only placed, but lost him in the Tower;
Nor will we parallel, with least suspicion,
Your synod with the Spanish inquisition.

All these, and such like maxims as may mar
Your soaring plots, or show you what you are,
We shall omit, lest our inventions shake them:
Why should the men be wiser than you make them?

We think there should not such a difference be 'Twixt our profession and your quality;
You meet, plot, act, talk high with minds immense;
The like with us, but only we speak sense Inferior unto yours; we can tell how
To depose kings, there we know more than you,
Although not more than what we would; then we Likewise in our vast privilege agree;
But that yours is the larger; and controls
Not only lives and fortunes, but men's souls,
Declaring by an enigmatic sense
A privilege on each man's conscience,
As if the trinity could not consent
To save a soul but by the parliament.
We make the people laugh at some strange show,
And as they laugh at us, they do at you;
Only if the contrary we disagree,
For you can make them cry faster than we.
Your tragedies more real are express'd,
You murder men in earnest, we in jest;
There we come short! but if you follow thus,
Some wise men fear you will come short of us.

As humbly as we did begin, we pray,
Dear schoolmasters, you'll give us leave to play Quickly before the king comes; for we would Be glad to say you've done a little good
Since ye have sat; your play is almost done
As well as ours—would it had ne'er begun!
But we shall find, ere the last act be spent,
Enter the King, exclaim the Parliament.
And Heigh then up we go! who by the frown
Of guilty members have been voted down,
Until a legal trial show us how
You used the king, and Heigh then up go you!
So pray your humble slaves with all their powers,
That when they have their due, you may have yours.

Such was the petition of the suppressed players in 1642; but, in 1653, their secret exultation appears although the stage was not yet restored to them in some verses prefixed to RICHARD BROME's Plays, by ALEXANDER BROME, which may close our little history. Alluding to the theatrical people, he moralizes on the fate of players;

'See the strange twirl of times! when such poor things
Outlive the dates of parliaments or kings!
This revolution makes exploded wit

* Pym was then at the head of the commons, and was usually deputed to address personally the motley petitioners. We have a curious speech he made to the tradesmen's wives in Echard's History of England, vol. II, 290.

Now see the fall of those that ruin'd it;
And the condemned Stage hath now obtain'd
To see her executioners arraign'd.
There's nothing permanent : those high great men
That rose from dust, to dust may fall again;
And fate so orders things, that the same hour
Sees the same man both in contempt and power;
For the multitude, in whom the power doth lie,
Do in one breath cry Hail! and Crucify.

At this period, though deprived of a Theatre, the taste for the drama was, perhaps, the more lively among its lovers; for, besides the performances already noticed, sometimes contrived at, and sometimes protected by bribery, in Oliver's time they stole into a practice of privately acting at noblemen's houses, particularly at Holland house, at Kensington; and 'Alexander Goffe, the woman-actor, was the jackall, to give notice of time and place to the lovers of the drama,' according to the writer of 'Historia Histrionica.' The players, urged by their necessities, published several excellent manuscript plays, which they had boarded in their dramatic exchequers, as the sole property of their respective companies. In one year appeared fifty of these new plays. Of these dramas many have, no doubt, perished; for numerous titles are recorded, but the plays are not known: yet some may still remain in their manuscript state, in hands not capable of valuing them. All our old plays were the property of the actors, who bought them for their own companies. The immortal works of Shakespeare had not descended to us, had not Hemings and Condell felt no sympathy for the fame of their friend. They had been scattered and lost, and, perhaps, had not been discriminated among the numerous manuscript plays of that age. One more effort, during this suspension of the drama, was made in 1655, to recall the public attention to its productions. This was a very curious collection by John Cotgrave, entitled 'The English Treasury of Wit and Language, collected out of the most, and best, of our English Dramatic Poems.' It appears by Cotgrave's Preface, that 'The Dramatic Poem,' as he calls our tragedies and comedies, 'had been of late too much slighted.' He tells us how some, not wanting in wit themselves, but 'through a stiff and obstinate prejudice, have, in this neglect, lost the benefit of many rich and useful observations; not duly considering, or believing, that the framers of them were the most fluent and redundant wits that this age, or I think any other, ever knew.' He enters further into this just panegyric of our old dramatic writers, whose acquired knowledge in ancient and modern languages, and whose luxuriant fancies, which they derived from no other sources but their own native growth, are viewed to great advantage in Cotgrave's common places; and, perhaps, still more in Hayward's 'British Muse,' which collection was made under the supervision, and by the valuable aid of Oldys, an experienced eater of these relishing morsels.

DRINKING CUSTOMS IN ENGLAND.

The ancient Bacchus, as represented in gems and statues, was a youthful and graceful divinity; he is so described by Ovid, and was so painted by Barry. He has the epithet of Pallas, or Wings, to express the light spirits which give wings to the soul. His voluptuousness was joyous and tender: and he was never viewed reeling with intoxication. According to Virgil:

Et quocunque deus circum caput egit honestum.

Georg. II. 302.

which Dryden, contemplating on the red faced boorish boy astride on a barrel on our sign posts, tastelessly sinks into gross vulgarity:

'On whate'er side he turns his honest face.'

This latinity of honestum, even the literal inelegance of Davidson had spirit enough to translate, 'Where'er the god hath mov'd around his graceful head.' The hideous figure of ebriety, in its most disgusting stage, the ancients exposed in the bestial Silenus and his crew; and with these rather than with the Ovidian and Virgilian deity, our own convivial customs have assimilated.

We shall, probably, outlive that custom of hard drinking, which was so long one of our national vices. The Frenchman, the Italian, and the Spaniard, only taste the luxury of the grape, but seem never to have indulged in set convivial parties, or drinking matches, as some of the northern people. Of this folly of ours, which was, however, a borrowed one, and which lasted for two centuries, the history is curious: the variety of its modes and customs; its freaks and extravagances; the technical language introduced to raise it into an art; and the inventions contrived to ammate the progress of the thirsty souls of votaries.

Nations, like individuals, in their intercourse are great imitators; and we have the authority of Camden, who lived at the time, for asserting that 'the English in its long wars in the Netherlands first learnt to drown the selves with immoderate drinking, and by drinking out the healths to impair their own. Of all the northern nations they had been before this most commended for their sobriety.' And the historian adds, 'that the vice had diffused itself over the nation, that in our days it was restrained by severe laws.'

Here we have the authority of a grave and judicious historian for ascertaining the first period and even origin of this custom; and that the nation had not, heretofore disgraced itself by such prevalent ebriety is also confirm by one of those curious contemporary pamphlets of popular writer, so invaluable to the philosophical antiquary.

Tom Nash, a town wit of the reign of Elizabeth, before Camden wrote her history, in his 'Pierce Penlesse,' had detected the same origin.—'Superfluity drink,' says this spirited writer, 'is a sin that ever since we have mixed ourselves with the Low Countries, counted honourable; but before we knew their finger wars, was held in that highest degree of hatred that might be. Then if we had seen a man go wallowing in the streets, or lain sleeping under the board, we should have spat at him, and warned all our friends out of his company.'

Such was the fit source of this vile custom, which further confirmed by the barbarous dialect it introduced into our language; all the terms of drinking which abound with us, are, without exception, of a base northern origin.† But the best account I can find of all the refinements of this new science of potation, when it seems to have reached its height, is in our Tom Nash, who bet himself one of these deep experimental philosophers, likely to disclose all the mysteries of the craft.

* Camden's History of Queen Elizabeth, Book III. His statues against drunkenness, by way of prevention, passed the reign of James I. Our law looks on this vice as an aggravation of any offence committed, not as an excuse for criminal misbehaviour. See Blackstone, Book IV, c. 2, Sect. III. Mr. Gifford's Massinger, vol. II, 456, is a note, to show that when we were young scholars, we soon equalled, if we did not surpass, our masters. Mr. Gilchrist there furnishes an extract from Sir Richard Baker's Chronicle, which traces the origin of this exotic custom to the source mentioned; but the whole passage from Baker is literally transcribed in Camden.

† Nash's Pierce Penlesse, 1593, Sig. F 2.

‡ These barbarous phrases are Dutch, Danish, or German. The term skinker, a filler of wine, a butler or cup-bearer, according to Phillips; and in taverns, as appears by our dramatic poets, a drawer is Dutch; or according to Dr Nott, pan Danish, from skenker.

Half-seas over, or nearly drunk, is likely to have been proverbial phrase from the Dutch, applied to that state of ebriety by an idea familiar with those water-rats. Thus, zee, Dutch, means literally over-sea. Mr Gifford has recently told us in his Jonson, that it was a name given to a singing beer introduced into England from the low-countries; but op-zee or over-sea; and freeze in German, signifies to freeze greedily: from this vile alliance they compounded the term, often used in our old plays. Thus Jonson:

'I do not like the dulness of your eye,
It hath a heavy cast, 'tis upsee Dutch.'

Alchemist, A. 4, S. 3.

And Fletcher has 'upsee-freeze;' which Dr Nott explains his edition of Decker's Gull's Hornbook, as 'a tipsey drunk or swallowing liquor till drunk.' Mr Gifford says, it was name of Friens and beer; the meaning, however, was not swinishly like a Dutchman.

We are indebted to the Danes for many of our terms of idleness; such as a rouse and a carouse. Mr Gifford has given only a new, but a very distinct explanation of these terms in his Massinger. 'A rouse was a large glass, in which a health was given, the drinking of which by the rest of the company formed a carouse. Barnaby Rich notices the rouse as an invention for which the first founder merited being. It is necessary to add, that there could be no real carouse, unless the glasses were emptied.' Although we lost the terms, we have not lost the practice, as they have the honour of dining in public parties are still given by the animating cry of 'gentlemen, charge your glasses.'

According to Blount's Glossographia, carouse is a collection of two old German words, gar signifying all, and

He says, 'Now, he is nobody that cannot drink super-nagulum; carouses the hunter's hoop; quaff uppes freze erose; with healths, gloves, mumps, frolickes, and a thousand such domineering inventions.'²

Drinking super-nagulum, that is on the nail, is a device, which Nash says is new come out of France; but it had probably a northern origin, for far northward it still exists. This new device consisted in this, that after a man, says Nash, hath turned up the bottom of the cup to drop it on his nail, and make a pearl with what is left, which if it abed, and cannot make it stand on, by reason there is too much, he must drink again for his penance.

The custom is also alluded to by Bishop Hall, in his satirical romance of 'Mundus alter et idem,' 'A Discovery of a New World'; a work which probably Swift read, and did not forget. The Duke of Tenterbilly in his oration, when he drinks off his large goblet of twelve quarts on his election, exclaims, should he be false to their laws, 'Let never this goodly-formed goblet of wine go jovially through me; and then he set it to his mouth, stole it off every drop, save a little remainder, which he was by custom to set upon his thumb's nail, and lick it off as he did.'

The phrase is in Fletcher:

I am thine ad unguem—that is, he would drink with his friend to the last. In a manuscript letter of the times, I find an account of Columbo the Spanish ambassador being at Oxford, and drinking healths to the Infanta. The writer adds, 'I shall not tell you how our doctors pledged healths to the Infanta and the archduchess; and if any left too big a snuff, Columbo would cry, supernaculum! supernaculum!'

This Bacchic freak seems still preserved; for a recent traveller, Sir George Mackenzie, has noticed the custom in his travels through Iceland. 'His host having filled a silver cup to the brim, and put on the cover, then held it towards the person who sat next to him, and desired him to take off the cover, and look into the cup; a ceremony intended to secure fair play in filling it. He drank our health, desiring to be excused from emptying the cup, on account of the indifferent state of his health; but we were informed at the same time that if any one of us should neglect any part of the ceremony, or fail to invert the cup, placing the edge on one of the thumbs as a proof that we had swallowed every drop, the defaulter would be obliged by the laws of drinking to fill the cup again, and drink it off a second time. In spite of their utmost exertions, the penalty of a second draught was incurred by two of the company; we were dreading the consequences of having swallowed so much wine, and in terror lest the cup should be sent round again.'

Carouse the hunter's hoop—'Carouse' has been already explained: the hunter's hoop alludes to the custom of hoops being marked on a drinking-top, by which every man was to measure his draught. Shakespeare makes the Jacobin Jack Cade, among his furious reformations, promise his friends that 'there shall be in England seven half-penny leaves sold for a penny; the three hooped-top shall have ten hoops, and I will make it felony to drink small beer.' I have elsewhere observed that our modern Bacchanalians, whose feats are recorded by the bottle, and who insist on an equality in their rival combats, may discover some ingenuity in that invention among our ancestors of their peg-tankards, of which a few may yet occasionally be found in Derbyshire; the invention of an age less refined than ours: so that to drink garauz is to drink all out: hence carouse.

² Pierce Penniless, Sig. F 2, 1593.

{These inventions for keeping every thirsty soul within bounds are alluded to by Tom Nash: I do not know that his authority will be great as an antiquary, but the things themselves he describes he had seen. He tells us that 'King Edgar because his subjects should not offend in swilling and bibbing as they did, caused certain iron cups to be chained to every basin and well-side; and at every vintner's door with iron pins in them, to mint every man how much he should drink, and he who went beyond one of those pins forfeited a penny for every draught.'

Fege, in his Anonymiana, has minutely described these peg-tankards, which confirms this account of Nash, and nearly to the antiquity of the custom. 'They have in the inside a row of six pins one above another, from top to bottom: the tankard held two quarts, so that there between each pin and the next was a gill of ale, i. e. half a pint of Winchester measure, between each pin. The first peg was that drank was to empty the tankard to the first peg or pin; the second was to empty to the next pin, &c. by which means the pins were so many measures to the computator, making them all drink alike, or the same quantity; and as the present, when we have heard of globular glasses and bottles, which by their shape cannot stand, but roll about the table; thus compelling the unfortunate Bacchanalian to drain the last drop, or expose his recreant sobriety.

We must have recourse again to our old friend Tom Nash, who acquaints us with some of 'the general rules and inventions for drinking, as good as printed precepts or statutes by act of parliament, that go from drunkard to drunkard; as, still to keep your first man; not to leave any storks in the bottom of the cup; to knock the glass on your thumb when you have done; to have some shoeing-horn to pull on your wine, as a rasher on the coals or a red herring.'

Shoeing-horns, sometimes called gloves, are also described by Bishop Hall in his 'Mundus alter et idem.' 'Then, sir, comes me up a service of shoeing-horns of all sorts; salt cakes, red herrings, anchovies, and gammon of bacon, and abundance of such pullers on.' That famous surfeit of Rhenish and pickled herrings, which banquet proved so fatal to Robert Green, a congenial wit and associate of our Nash, was occasioned by these shoeing-horns.

Massinger has given a curious list of 'a service of shoeing-horns':

— I usher

Such an unexpected dainty bit for breakfast
As yet I never cook'd; 'tis not Botargo,
Fried frogs, potatoes marrow'd, caviar,
Carps' tongues, the pith of an English chine of beef,
For our Italian delicate oil'd mushrooms,
And yet a drawer-on too; * and if you show not
An appetite, and a strong one, I'll not say
To eat it, but devour it, without grace too,
(For it will not stay a preface) I am ashamed,
And all my past provocatives will be jeer'd at.

Massinger, the Guardian A. 2, S. 3.

To knock the glass on the thumb, was to show they had performed their duty. Barnaby Rich describes this custom; after having drank, the president 'turned the bottom of the cup upwards, and in ostentation of his dexterity, gave it a fillip, to make it cry ting.'

They had among these 'domineering inventions' some which we may imagine never took place, till they were told by 'the hollow cask,'

'How the waning night grew old.'

Such were flap-dragons, which were small combustible bodies fired at one end and floated in a glass of liquor, which an experienced toper swallowed unharmed, while yet blazing. Such is Dr Johnson's accurate description, who seems to have witnessed what he so well describes.*

The distance of the pins was such as to contain a large draught of liquor, the company would be very liable by this method to get drunk, especially when, if they drank short of the pin or beyond it, they were obliged to drink again. In archbishop Anselm's Canons, made in the council at London in 1102, priests are enjoined not to go to drinking-bouts, nor to drink to pegs. The words are 'Ut Presbyteri non eant ad potationes, nec ad Pinas bibant.' (Wilkins, vol. 1, p. 382.) This shows the antiquity of this invention, which at least was as old as the Conquest.

* And yet a drawer-on too; [i. e. an incitement to appetite: the phrase is yet in use. This drawer-on was also technically termed a puller-on, and a shoeing-horn in drink.]

On 'the Italian delicate oil'd mushrooms,' still a favourite dish with the Italians, I have to communicate some curious knowledge. In an original manuscript letter dated Hereford, 15 Nov. 1659, the name of the writer wanting, but evidently the composition of a physician who had travelled, I find that the dressing of Mushrooms was then a novelty. The learned writer laments his error that he 'disdained to learn the cookery that occurred in my travels, by a sullen principle of mistaken devotion, and thus declined the great helps I had to enlarge and improve human diet.' This was an age of medicine, when it was imagined that the health of mankind essentially depended on diet; and Moffet had written his curious book on this principle. Our writer, in noticing the passion of the Romans for mushrooms, which was called 'an imperial dish,' says, 'he had eaten it often at Sir Henry Wotton's table (our resident ambassador at Venice,) always dressed by the inspection of his Dutch-Venetian Johann, or of Nic. Oudart, and truly it did deserve the old applause as I found it at his table; it was far beyond our English food. Neither did any of us find it of hard digestion; for we did not eat like Adamites, but as modest men would eat of mud-melons.' If it were now lawful to hold any kind of intelligence with Nic. Oudart, I would only ask him Sir Henry Wotton's art of dressing mushrooms, and I hope that is not high treason.' Sloane MSS. 4392.

When Falstaff says of Poin's acts of dexterity to ingratiate himself with the prince, that 'he drinks off candle-ends for flap-dragns,' it seems that this was likewise one of these 'frolics,' for Nash notices that the liquor was 'to be stirred about with a candle's end to make it taste better, and not to hold your peace while the pot is stirring,' no doubt to mark the intrepidity of the miserable 'skinker.' The most illustrious feat of all is one, however, described by Bishop Hall. If the drinker 'could put his finger into the flame of the candle without playing hit-I-miss-I! he is held a sober man, however otherwise drunk he might be.' This was considered as a trial of victory among these 'canary birds,' or bibbers of canary wine.*

We have a very common expression to describe a man in a state of ebriety, that 'he is as drunk as a beast,' or that 'he is beastly drunk.' This is a libel on the brutes, for the vice of ebriety is perfectly human. I think the phrase is peculiar to ourselves; and I imagine I have discovered its origin. When ebriety became first prevalent in our nation, during the reign of Elizabeth, it was a favourite notion among the writers of the time, and on which they have exhausted their fancy, that a man in the different stages of ebriety showed the most vicious quality of different animals; or that a company of drunkards exhibited a collection of brutes, with their different characteristics.

'All drunkards are beasts,' says George Gascoigne in a curious treatise on them,* and he proceeds in illustrating his proposition; but the satirist Nash has classified eight kinds of 'drunkards'; a fanciful sketch from the hand of a master in humour, and which could only have been composed by a close spectator of thier manners and habits.

'The first is ape-drunk, and he leaps and sings and hollows and danceth for the heavens; the second is lion-drunk, and he flings the pots about the house, calls the hostess w—e, breaks the glass-windows with his dagger, and is apt to quarrel with any man that speaks to him; the third is swine-drunk, heavy, lumpish, and sleepy, and cries for a little more drink and a few more clothes; the fourth is sheep-drunk, wise in his own conceit when he cannot bring forth a right word; the fifth is maudlin-drunk, when a fellow will weep for kindness in the midst of his drink, and kiss you, saying, 'By God! captain, I love thee, go thy ways, thou dost not think so often of me, as I do of thee: I would (if it pleased God) I could not love thee so well as I do,' and then he puts his finger in his eye and cries. The sixth is martin-drunk, when a man is drunk, and drinks himself sober ere he stir; the seventh is goat-drunk, when in his drunkenness he hath no mind but on lechery. The eighth is fox-drunk, when he is crafty-drunk, as many of the Dutchmen be, which will never bargain but when they are drunk. All these species, and more, I have seen practised in one company at one sitting: when I have been permitted to remain sober amongst them only to note their several humours.' These beast-drunkards are characterised in a frontispiece to a curious tract on Drunkenness where the men are represented with heads of apes, swine, &c. &c.

A new era in this history of our drinking-parties occurred about the time of the Restoration, when politics heated their wine, and drunkenness and loyalty became more closely connected. As the puritanic coldness wore off, the people were perpetually, in 1650, warmed in drinking the king's health on their knees; and among various kinds of ranting cavalierism, the cavaliers during Cromwell's usurpation usually put a crumb of bread into their glass, and before they drank it off, with cautious ambiguity exclaimed, 'God send this crum well down!' which by the way preserves the orthoepy of that extraordinary man's name, and may be added to the instances adduced in the present volume. On the orthography of proper names. We have a curious account of a drunken bout by some royalists, told by Whitelocke in his Memorials. It bore some resemblance to the drinking-party of Catiline: they ancient domestic manners than, perhaps, any single individual in the country.

mingled their own blood with their wine.* After the Restoration, Burnet complains of the excess of convivial loyalty. 'Drinking the king's health was set up by too many as a distinguished mark of loyalty, and drew many into great excess after his majesty's restoration.†

LITERARY ANECDOTES.

A writer of penetration sees connexions in literary anecdotes which are not immediately perceived by others; in his hands anecdotes, even should they be familiar to us, are susceptible of deductions and inferences, which become novel and important truths. Facts of themselves are barren; it is when these facts pass through our reflections, and become interwoven with our feelings, or our reasonings, that they are the finest illustrations; that they assume the dignity of 'philosophy teaching by example;' that, in the moral world, they are what the wise system of Bacon inculcated in the natural knowledge deduced from experiments; the study of Nature in her operations. 'When examples are pointed out to us,' says Lord Bolingbroke, 'There is a kind of appeal, with which we are flattered, made to our senses, as well as to our understandings. The instruction comes then from our authority; we yield in fact, when we resist speculation.'

For this reason, writers and artists should, among their recreations, be forming a constant acquaintance with the history of their departed kindred. In literary biography a man of genius always finds something which relates to himself. The studies of artists have a great uniformity, and their habits of life are monotonous. They have all the same difficulties to encounter, although they do not all meet with the same glory. How many secrets may the man of genius learn from literary anecdotes! important secrets, which his friends will not convey to him. He traces the effects of similar studies; warned sometimes by failures, and often animated by watching the incipient and shadowy attempts which closed in a great work. From one he learns in what manner he planned and corrected; from another he may overcome those obstacles which, perhaps, at that very moment make him rise in despair from his own unfinished labour. What perhaps he had in vain desired to know for half his life is revealed to him by a literary anecdote; and thus the amusements of idolent hours may impart the vigour of study; as we find sometimes in the fruit we have taken for pleasure the medicine which restores our health. How superficial is that cry of some impertinent pretended geniuses of these times, who affect to exclaim, 'Give me no anecdotes of an author, but give me his works!' I have often found the anecdotes more interesting than the works.

Dr Johnson devoted one of his periodical papers to a defence of anecdotes, and expresses himself thus on certain collectors of anecdotes: 'They are not always so happy as to select the most important. I know not well what advantage posterity can receive from the only circumstance by which Tickell has distinguished Addison from the rest of mankind,—the irregularity of his pulse; nor can I think myself overpaid for the time spent in reading the life of Malherbe, by being enabled to relate, after the learned biographer, that Malherbe had two predominant opinions; one, that the looseness of a single woman might destroy all her boast of ancient descent; the other, that the French beggars made use, very improperly and barbarously, of the phrase noble gentlemen, because either word included the sense of both.'

These just observations may, perhaps, be further illustrated by the following notices. Dr J. Warton has formed the world, that many of our poets have been handsome. This, certainly, neither concerns the world, or the class of poets. It is trifling to tell us that Dr Johnson was accustomed 'to cut his nails to the quick.' I am not much gratified by being informed, that Ménage wrote a greater number of stockings than any other person, except—

* I shall preserve the story in the words of Whitelocke: 'It was something ludicrous, as well as terrific.'

From Berkshire (in May 1650) five drunkards agreed to drink the king's health in their blood, and that each of them should cut off a piece of his buttock, and fry it upon the grid-iron, which was done by four of them, of whom one cut his so exceedingly, that they were fain to send for a chirurgeon, and so were discovered. The wife of one of them hearing that her husband was amongst them, came to the room, and taking up a pair of tongs laid about her, and so saved the coming of her husband's flesh.† Whitelocke's Memorials, p. 455, second edition.

one, whose name I have really forgotten. The biographer of Coqas, a celebrated lawyer, says, that two things are remarkable of this scholar. The first, that he studied the floor, lying prostrate on a carpet, with his books out him; and secondly, that his perspiration exhaled an agreeable smell, which he used to inform his friends he had in common with Alexander the Great! This admirable biographer should have told us whether he frequently meditated from his very uneasy attitude. Somebody informs us that Guy Patin resembled Cicero, whose statue is served at Rome; on which he enters into a comparison Patin with Cicero; but a man may resemble a statue, Cicero, and yet not Cicero. Baillet loads his life of anecdotes with a thousand minutiae, which less disgrace a philosopher than the biographer. Was it worth informing the public, that Descartes was very particular about his wig: that he had them manufactured at Paris; and that he always kept four? That he wore green taffety in France: but that in Holland he quitted taffety for silk; and that he was fond of omelets of eggs?

It is an odd observation of Clarendon in his own life, that Mr Chillingworth was of a stature little superior to Sir Hales; and it was an age in which there were many not and wonderful men of THAT SIZE.* Lord Falkland, merely Sir Lucius Carey, was of low stature and smaller than most men; and of Sidney Godolphin, 'There is never so great a mind and spirit contained in so little room; so that Lord Falkland used to say merrily, that he thought it was a great ingredient in his friendship for Mr Godolphin, that he was pleased to be found in his company where he was the properer man.' This irrelevant observation of Lord Clarendon is an instance where a great mind will sometimes draw inferences from accidental coincidences, and establish them into a general principle; as the small size of the men had even the remotest connection with their genius and their virtues. Perhaps, too, there was in this a tincture of the superstitions of the times: whatever it was, the fact ought not to have degraded the truth and dignity of historical narrative. We have writers who cannot discover the particulars which characterize THE MAN,—their souls, like damp gun-powder, must ignite with the spark when it falls on them.

Yet of anecdotes which appear trifling, something may be alleged in their defence. It is certainly safer for some writers, to give us all they know, than to try their discernment for rejection. Let us sometimes recollect, that the age now which we toll will probably furnish materials for memoirs of happier talents. I would rather have a Birch, or a Hawkins, appear heavy, cold, and prolix, than any living material which concerns a Tillotson or a Johnson should be lost. It must also be confessed, that an anecdote, or a circumstance, which may appear inconsequential to a reader, may bear some remote or latent connexion; a biographer who has long contemplated the character he treats, sees many connections which escape an ordinary reader. Kippis, in closing the life of the diligent Dr Birch, has, from his own experience no doubt, formed an apology for that minute research, which some have thought this age carried to excess. 'It may be alleged in our author's favour, that a man who has a deep and extensive acquaintance with a subject, often sees a connection and a distance in some smaller circumstances, which may not immediately be discerned by others; and on that account, my have reasons for inserting them, that will escape the notice of superficial minds.'

CONDEMNED POETS.

I flatter myself that those readers who have taken any interest in my works have not conceived me to have been deficient in the elevated feeling which, from early life, I was preserved for the great Literary character: if time takes our enthusiasm, it is the coldness of age which keeps us on us, but the principle is unalterable which inspired the sympathy. Who will not venerate those Masaniello's whose published labours advance the good of mankind, and those books which are 'the precious lifeblood of a Master-spirit, imbalanced and treasured up on ignorance to a life beyond life?' But it has happened that I have more than once incurred the censure of the inconsiderate and the tasteless, for attempting to separate those writers who exist in a state of perpetual illusion; who live on delusively, which is an evil for themselves, and to no purpose of life, which is an evil to others. I have been accused for exemplifying 'the illusions of writers in verso,'*

by the remarkable case of Percival Stockdale,* who, after a condemned silence of nearly half a century, like a vivacious spectre throwing aside his shroud in gaiety, came forward a venerable man in his eightieth year, to assure us of the immortality of one of the worst poets of his age; and for this, wrote his own memoirs, which only proved, that when authors are troubled with a literary hallucination, and possess the unhappy talents of reasoning in their madness, a little rillery, if it cannot cure, may serve at least as a salutary regimen.

I shall illustrate the case of condemned authors who will still be pleading after their trials, by a foreign dramatic writer. Among those incorrigible murmurers at public justice, not the least extraordinary was a Mr Peyraud de Beaussoil, who, in 1775, had a tragedy, 'Les Arsacides,' in six acts, printed, not as it was acted, as Fielding says, on the title-page of one of his comedies, but as it was damned.

In a preface, this 'Sir Fretful,' more inimitable than that original, with all the gravity of a historical narrative, details the public conspiracy; and with all the pathetic touches of a shipwrecked mariner—the agonies of his literary egotism.

He declares, that it is absurd for the town to condemn a piece which they can only know by the title, for heard it had never been! And yet he observes, with infinite naïvete, 'My piece is as generally condemned as if the world had lit it all by heart.'

One of the great objections against this tragedy was its monstrous plan of six acts; this innovation did not lean towards improvement in the minds of those who had endured the long sufferings of tragedies of the accepted size. But the author offers some solemn reasons to induce us to believe that six acts were so far from being too many, that the piece had been more perfect with a seventh! Mr de Beaussoil had perhaps, been happy to have known, that other dramatists have considered, that the usual restrictions are detrimental to a grand genius. Nat. Lee, when too often drunk, and sometimes in Bedlam, wrote a play in twenty-five acts.

Our philosophical dramatist, from the constituent principles of the human mind, and the physical powers of man, and the French nation more particularly, deduces the origin of the Sublime, and the faculty of attention. The plan of his tragedy is agreeable to these principles: Monarchs, Queens, and Rivals, and every class of men;—it is therefore grand! and the acts can be listened to, and therefore it is not too long! It was the high opinion that he had formed of human nature and the French people, which at once terrified and excited him to finish a tragedy, which, he modestly adds, 'may not have the merit of any single one; but which one day will be discovered to include the labour bestowed on fifty!'

No great work was ever produced without a grand plan. 'Some critics,' says our author, 'have ventured to assert that my six acts may easily be reduced to five, without injury to the conduct.' To reply to this required a complete analysis of the tragedy, which, having been found more voluminous than the tragedy itself, he considerably published separately.† It would be curious to ascertain whether a single copy of the analysis of a condemned tragedy was ever sold. And yet this critical analysis was such an admirable and demonstrative criticism, that the author assures us that it proved the absolute impossibility, 'and the most absolute too,' that his piece could not suffer the slightest curtailment. It demonstrated more—that 'the gradation and the development of interest required necessarily seven Acts! but, from dread of carrying this innovation too far, the author omitted one Act which passed behind the scenes!‡ but which ought to have come in between the fifth and sixth! Another point is proved, that the attention of an audience, the physical powers of man, can be kept up with interest much longer than has been calculated: that his piece only takes up two hours and three quarters, or three hours at most, if some of the most impassioned parts were but declaimed rapidly.‡

* It first appeared in a Review of his 'Memoirs.'

† The words are 'Un derriere la scene.' I am not sure of the meaning, but an act behind the scenes would be perfectly in character with this dramatic bard.

‡ The exact reasoning of Sir Fretful, in the Critic, when Mrs Dangle thought his piece 'rather too long,' while he proves his play was 'a remarkably short play.'—The first evening you can spare me three hours and a half, I'll undertake to read

Now we come to the history of all the disasters which happened at the acting of this tragedy. 'How can people complain that my piece is tedious, when, after the first act, they would never listen ten minutes to it? Why did they attend to the first scenes, and even applaud one? Let me not be told, because these were sublime, and commanded the respect of the cabal raised against it; because there are other scenes far more sublime in the piece, which they perpetually interrupted. Will it be believed, that they pitched upon the scene of the sacrifice of Volgesie, as one of the most tedious?—the scene of Volgesie which is the finest in my piece; not a verse, not a word in it, can be omitted!* Every thing tends towards the catastrophe; and it reads in the closet as well as it would affect us on the stage. I was not, however, astonished at this: what men hear, and do not understand, is always tedious; and it was recited in so shocking a tone by the actress, who, not having entirely recovered from a fit of illness, was hurried by the tumult of the audience. She declaimed in a twanging tone, like psalm-singing; so that the audience could not hear, among these fatiguing discordances (he means their own hissing,) nor separate the thoughts and words from the full chant which accompanied them. They objected perpetually to the use of the word Madame, between two female rivals, as too comic; one of the pit, when an actress said Madame, cried out, 'Say Princesse.' This disconcerted the actress. They also objected to the words a propos and mal a propos. Yet, after all, how are there too many Madames in the piece, since they do not amount to forty-six in the course of forty-four scenes? Of these, however, I have erased half.'

This historian of his own wrongheadedness proceeds, with all the simplicity of this narrative, to describe the hubbub.

'Thus it was impossible to connect what they were hearing with what they had heard. In the short intervals of silence, the actors, who during the tumult, forgot their characters, tried with difficulty to recover their conception. The conspirators were prepared to a man; not only in their head, but some with written notes had their watch words to set their party agoing. They seemed to act with the most extraordinary concert; they seemed to know the exact moment when they were to give the word, and down, in their hurly-burly, the voice of the actor, who had a passionate part to declaim, and thus break the connection between the speakers. All this produced so complete an effect that it seemed as if the actors themselves had been of the conspiracy, so wilful and so active was the execution of the plot. It was particularly during the fifth and sixth acts that the cabal was most outrageous; they knew these were the most beautiful, and deserved particular attention. Such a humming arose, that the actors seemed to have had their heads turned; some lost their voice, some declaimed at random, the prompter in vain cried out, nothing was heard and every thing was said; the actor who could not hear the catch-word, remained disconcerted and silent; the whole was broken, wrong and right; it was all Hebrew. Nor was this all; the actors behind the scene were terrified, and they either come forwards trembling, and only watching the signs of their brother actors, or would not venture to show themselves. The machinist only, with his scene shifters, who felt so deep an interest in the fate of my piece, was tranquil and attentive to his duty, to produce a fine effect. After the hurly-burly was over, he left the actors mute with their arms crossed. He opened the scenery! and not an actor could enter on it! The pit, more clamorous than ever, would not suffer the denouement! Such was the conduct, and such the intrepidity, of the army employed to besiege the Arsacides! Such the cause of that accusation of tediousness made against a drama, which has most evidently the contrary defect!'

Such is the history of a damned dramatist, written by himself, with a truth and simplicity worthy of a happier fate. It is admirable to see a man, who was himself so deeply involved in the event, preserve the observing calmness which could discover the minutest occurrence; and, you the whole, from beginning to end, with the prologue and epilogue, and allow time for the music between the acts. The watch here, you know, is the critic.'

* Again Sir Prefail; when Dangle 'ventures to suggest that the interest rather falls off in the fifth act!—'Rises, I believe you mean, sir!—'No, I don't, upon my word.'—'Yes, yes, do, upon my soul; it certainly don't fall off; no, no, it can't fall off.'

allowing for his particular conception of the cause, detailing them with the most rigid veracity. This author was unquestionably a man of the most honourable probity, as not destitute of intellectual ability; but he must serve as a useful example of that wrongheaded nature in some men, which has produced so many 'Abbots of Unreason in society, whom it is in vain to convince by a recitation of arguments; who, assuming false principles, a rightly according to themselves; a sort of rational lame, which, when it discovers itself in politics and religion, as in the more common affairs of life, has produced the most unhappy effects; but this fanaticism, when confined to poetry, only amuses us with the ludicrous; and, in it persons of Monsieur De Beausset, and of Percival Stoddale, may offer some very fortunate self-recollections of that calamity of authors, which I have called 'The Illusions of Writers in Verse.'

ACAJOU AND ZIRPHILE.

As a literary curiosity, and as a supplemental anecdote to the article of PREFACES,* I cannot pass over the my pressed preface to the 'Acajou et Zirphile,' of Du Clos which of itself is almost a singular instance of hardy genuity, in an address to the public.

This single volume is one of the most whimsical of fairy tales, and an amusing satire, originating in an odd circumstance. Count Tessin, the Swedish Ambassador at the Court of France, had a number of grotesque designs made by Boucher, the king's painter, and engraved by the artists. The last plate had just been finished when it was recalled, and appointed Prime Minister as Governor to the Crown Prince, a place he filled with great honour; and in emulation of Fenelon, composed letters to the Education of a Prince, which have been translated. He left behind him in France all the plates in the hands of Boucher, who having shown them to Du Clos for the singular invention, regretted that he had bestowed so much fancy on a fairy tale, which was not to be had; Du Clos to relieve his regrets, offered to invent a tale to correspond with these grotesque subjects. This seemed not a hard difficulty. In the first plate, the author appears in his morning gown, writing in his study, surrounded by apes, rat butterflies, and smoke. In another, a Prince is dressed in French costume of 1740, strolling full of thought in 'a shady walk of ideas.' In a third plate, the Prince conversing with a fairy who rises out of a gooseberry which he had plucked: two dwarfs discovered in an old gooseberry, give a sharp fluff to the Prince, who seems much embarrassed by their tiny maliciousness. In another walk he eats an apricot, which opens with it most beautiful of faces, a little melancholy, and leaning on one side. In another print, he finds the body of this lost face and the hands, and he adroitly joins them together. Such was the set of these incomprehensible and capricious inventions, which the lighter fancy and ingenious Du Clos converted into a fairy story, full of pleasant satire.†

Among the novelties of this small volume, not the most remarkable is the dedication of this fairy romance to the public, which excited great attention, and charmed and provoked our author's fickle patron. Du Clos here opens a hazardous attack was successful, and the author soon acquired the reputation which he afterwards maintained, being a writer who little respected the common prejudices of the world. Freron replied by a long criticism, called 'Réponse du Public à l'Auteur d'Acajou; but its severity was not discovered in its length; so that the Public, who had been so keenly ridiculed, and so hardily braved in light and sparkling page of the haughty Du Clos, professed the caustic truths and the pleasant insult.

In this 'Epistle to the Public,' the author informs that, 'excited by example, and encouraged by the success he had often witnessed, he designed to write a piece of nonsense. He was only embarrassed by the choice of subject. Politics, Morals, and Literature, were equally new to me; but I found, strange to say, all these more pre-occupied by persons who seem to have laboured at the same view. I found silly things in all kinds, and saw myself under the necessity of adopting the reasons ness to become singular; so that I do not yet despair that we may one day discover truth, when we shall have exhausted all our errors.

'I first proposed to write down all erudition, to show the freedom and independence of genius, whose fertility is such as not to require borrowing any thing from foreign sources; but I observed that this had sunk into a mere common place, trite and trivial, invented by indolence, adopted by ignorance, and which adds nothing to genius.

'Mathematics, which has succeeded to erudition, begins to be unfashionable; we know at present indeed that he may be as great a dizzard in resolving a problem as in entering a reading. Every thing is compatible with genius, but nothing can give it!

'For the bel esprit, so much envied, so much sought after, it is almost as ridiculous to pretend to it, as it is difficult to attain. Thus the scholar is contemned, the mathematician tires, the man of wit and genius is hissed. What is to be done?

Having told the whimsical origin of this tale, Du Clos continues: 'I do not know, my dear Public, if you will approve of my design; however, it appears to me ridiculous enough to deserve your favour; for, to speak to you like a friend, you appear to unite all the stages of human life, only to experience all their cross accidents. You are a child to run after trifles; a youth when driven by your passions; and in mature age, you conclude you are wise, because your follies are of a more solemn nature, for you grow old only to dote; to talk at random, to act without design, and to believe you judge, because you pronounce sentences.

'I respect you greatly; I esteem you but little; you are not worthy of being loved. These are my sentiments respecting you; if you insist on others from me in that case

'I am,

'Your most humble and obedient servant.'

The caustic pleasantry of this 'Epistle dedicatory' was considered by some mawkish critics so offensive, that when the editor of the 'Cabinet de Fées,' a vast collection of fairy tales, republished this little playful satire and whimsical fancy piece, he thought proper to cancel the 'Epistle,' concluding that it was entirely wanting in that respect with which the public ought to be addressed! This editor, of course was a Frenchman: we view him in the ridiculous attitude of making his profound bow, and expressing all this 'high consideration' for this same 'Public,' while, with his opera hat in his hand, he is sweeping away the most pungent and delectable page of Acajou and Zirphile.

TOM O' BEDLAM.

The history of a race of singular mendicants, known by the name of Tom o' Bedlams, connects itself with that of our poetry. Not only will they live with our language, since Shakespeare, has perpetuated their existence, but they themselves appear to have been the occasion of creating a species of wild fantastic poetry, peculiar to our nation.

Bethlem Hospital formed, in its original institution, a contracted and penurious charity; its governors soon discovered that the metropolis furnished them with more lunatics than they had calculated on; they also required from the friends of the patients a weekly stipend, besides clothing. It is a melancholy fact to record in the history of human nature, that when one of their original regulations prescribed that persons who put in patients should provide their clothes, it was soon observed that the poor lunatics were frequently perishing by the omission of this slight duty from those former friends; so soon forgotten were they whom none found an interest to recollect.—They were obliged to open contributions to provide a wardrobe.*

In consequence of the limited resources of the Hospital, they relieved the establishment by frequently discharging patients whose cure might be very equivocal. Harmless lunatics thrown thus into the world, often without a single friend, wandered about the country, chanting wild ditties, and wearing a fantastical dress to attract the notice of the charitable, on whose alms they lived. They had a kind of prominence, which I find described by Randle Holme in a curious and extraordinary work.†

* Stowe's Survey of London, Book I.

† The Academy of Armory, Book II, c. 3, p. 161. This is a singular work, where the writer has contrived to turn the various subjects of Heraldry into an entertaining Encyclopedia,

'The Bedlam has a long staff, and a cow or ox horn by his side; his clothing fantastic and ridiculous; for being a madman, he is madly decked and dressed all over with rubins (ribands,) feathers, cuttings of cloth, and what not, to make him seem a madman, or one distracted, when he is no other than a wandering and dissembling knave.' This writer here points out one of the grievances resulting from licensing even harmless lunatics to roam about the country; for a set of pretended madmen, called 'Abram men,' a cant term for certain sturdy rogues, concealed themselves in their costume, covered the country, and pleaded the privileged denomination when detected in their depredations.*

Sir Walter Scott first obligingly suggested to me that these roving lunatics were out door pensioners of Bedlam, sent about to live as well as they could with the pittance granted by the hospital.

The fullest account that I have obtained of these singular persons is drawn from the manuscript note transcribed from some of Aubrey's papers, which I have not seen printed.

'Till the breaking out of the civil wars, Tom o' Bedlams did travel about the country; they had been poor distracted men, that had been put into Bedlam, where, recovering some sobriety, they were licenced to go a begging; i. e. they had on their left arm an armilla, an iron ring for the arm, about four inches long as printed in some works.† They could not get it off; they wore about their necks a great horn of an ox in a string or bawdry, which, when they came to a house, they did wind, and they put the drink given to them into this horn, whereto they put a stopple. Since the wars I do not remember to have seen any containing much curious knowledge on almost every subject but this. It is more particularly exhibits the most copious vocabulary of old English terms. It has been said that there are not more than twelve copies extant of this very rare work, which is probably not true.

* In that curious source of our domestic history, the 'English Villanies' of Decker, we find a lively description of the 'Abram Cove,' or Abram man, the impostor who personated a Tom o' Bedlam. He was terribly disguised with his grotesque rage, his staff, his knotted hair, and with the more disgusting contrivances to excite pity, still practised among a class of our mendicants, who, in their cant language, are still said 'to sham Abraham.' This impostor was, therefore, as suited his purpose and the place, capable of working on the sympathy, by uttering a silly maunding, or demanding of charity, or terrifying the easy fears of women, children, and domestics as he wandered up and down the country: they refused nothing to a being who was as terrific to them as 'Robin Good-fellow,' or 'Raw-head and bloody-bones.' Thus, as Edgar expresses it, 'sometimes with lunatic bane, sometimes with prayers, the gestures of this impostor were a counterfeit puppet-play: they came with a hollow noise, whooping, leaping, gambolling, wildly dancing, with a fierce or distracted look.' These sturdy mendicants were called 'Tom of Bedlam's band of mail-cars,' or 'Poor Tom's flock of wild geese.' Decker has preserved their 'Maund,' or begging—'Good worship master, bestow your reward on a poor man that hath been in Bedlam without Bishopsgate, three years, four months, and nine days, and bestow one piece of small silver towards his fees, which he is indebted there of 34, 12s, 7 1-2d,' (or to such effect.)

Or, 'Now dame, well and wisely, what will you give poor Tom? One pound of your sheep's leathers to make poor Tom a blanket? or one cutting of your sow's side, no bigger than my arm; or one piece of your ank meat to make poor Tom a sharing horn; or one cross of your small silver, towards a pair of shoes; well and wisely, give poor Tom an old sheet to keep him from the cold; or an old doublet and jerkin of my master's; well and wisely, God save the king and his council.' Such is a history drawn from the very archives of mendicity and imposture; and written perhaps as far back as the reign of James I; but which prevailed in that of Elizabeth, as Shakespeare has so finely shown in his Edgar. This maund, and these assumed manners and costume, I should not have preserved from their utter penury, but such was the rule material which Shakespeare has worked up into that most fanciful and richest vein of native poetry, which pervades the character of the wandering Edgar, tormented by 'the foul fiend,' when he

—bethought
To take the basest and most poorest shape
That ever penury, in contempt of man,
Brought near to beast.

And the poet proceeds with a minute picture of 'Bedlam beggars.' See Lear, A. II, S. 3.

† Aubrey's information is perfectly correct; for those impostors who assumed the character of Tom o' Bedlams for their own nefarious purposes used to have a mark burnt in their arms, which they showed as the mark of Bedlam. (The English Villanies of Decker, C. 17. 1648.

one of them.' The civil wars, probably, cleared the country of all sorts of vagabonds; but among the royalists or the parliamentarians, we did not know that in their rank and file they had so many Tom o' Bedlams.

I have now to explain something in the character of Edgar in Lear, on which the commentators seem to have ingeniously blundered, from an imperfect knowledge of the character which Edgar personates.

Edgar, in wandering about the country for a safe disguise, assumes the character of these Tom o' Bedlams; he thus closes one of his distracted speeches, 'Poor Tom, Thy horn is dry.' On this Johnson is content to inform us, that men that begged under pretence of lunacy used formerly to carry a horn and blow it through the streets.* This is no explanation of Edgar's allusion to the dryness of his horn. Stevens adds a fanciful note, that Edgar alludes to a proverbial expression Thy horn is dry, designed to express that a man had said all he could say; and further Stevens supposes that Edgar speaks these words aside; as if he had been quite weary of Tom o' Bedlam's part, and could not keep it up any longer. The reasons of all this conjectural criticism are a curious illustration of perverse ingenuity. Aubrey's manuscript note has shown us that the Bedlam's horn was also a drinking horn, and Edgar closes his speech in the perfection of the assumed character, and not as one who has grown weary of it, by making the mendicant lunatic desirous of departing from a booth, to march, as he cries 'to wakes, and fairs and market towns—Poor Tom! thy horn is dry!' as more likely places to solicit alms; and he is thinking of his drink money, when he cries that 'his horn is dry.'

An itinerant lunatic, chanting wild ditties, fancifully attired, gay with the simplicity of childhood, yet often moaning with the sorrows of a troubled man, a mixture of character at once grotesque and plaintive, became an interesting object to poetical minds. It is probable that the character of Edgar, in the Lear of Shakespeare, first introduced the hazardous conception into the poetical world. Poems composed in the character of a Tom o' Bedlam appear to have formed a fashionable class of poetry among the wits; they seem to have held together poetical contests, and some of these writers became celebrated for their successful efforts, for old Isaac Walton mentions a 'Mr. William Bass as one who has made the choice songs of the "Hunter in his career," and of "Tom o' Bedlam," and many others of note.' Bishop Percy, in his 'Reliques of ancient English Poetry,' has preserved six of what he calls 'Mad Songs,' expressing his surprise that the English should have 'more songs and ballads on the subject of madness than any of their neighbours,' for such are not found in the collections of songs of the French, Italian, &c. and nearly insinuates, for their cause, that we are perhaps more liable to the calamity of madness than other nations. This superfluous criticism had been spared had that elegant collector been aware of the circumstance which had produced this class of poems, and recollected the more ancient original in the Edgar of Shakespeare. Some of the 'Mad Songs,' the Bishop has preserved, are of too modern a date to suit the title of his work; being written by Tom D'Urfey, for his comedies of Don Quixote. I shall preserve one of more ancient date, fraught with all the wild spirit of this peculiar character.*

This poem must not be read without a perpetual reference to the personated character. Delirious and fantastic, strokes of sublime imagination are mixed with familiar comic humour, and even degraded by the cant language; for the gipsy habits of life of these 'Tom o' Bedlams' had confounded them with 'the proggng Abram men.' These luckless beings are described by Decker as sometimes exceeding merry, and could do nothing but sing songs fashioned out of their own brain; now they danced, now they would do nothing but laugh and weep, or were dogged and sullen both in look and speech. All they did, all they sung, was alike unconnected; indicative of the desultory and rambling wits of the chanter.

A TOM-A-BEDLAM SONG.

From the hag and hungry goblin
That into rags would rend ye,
All the spirits that stand
By the naked man,
In the book of moons defend ye!

* I discovered the present in a very scarce collection, entitled 'Wit and Drollery,' 1691: an edition, however, which is not the earliest of this once fashionable miscellany.

That of your five sound senses
You never be forsaken;
Nor travel from Yourselves with Tom
Abroad, to beg your bacon.

CHORUS.

Nor never sing any food and feeding,
Money, drink, or clatching;
Come dame or maid,
Be not afraid,
For Tom will injure nothing.

Of thirty bare years have I
Twice twenty been enraged;
And of forty been
Three times fifteen
In durance soundly caged.

In the lovely lofts of Bedlam,
In stubble soft and dainty,
Brave bracelets strong,
Sweet whips ding, dong,
And a wholesome hunger plenty.

With a thought I took for Maudlin,
And a cruise of cockle pottage,
And a thing thus—tall,
Sky bless you all,
I fell into this dotage.

I slept not till the Conquest;
Till then I never waked;
Till the roguish boy
Of love where I lay,
Me found, and stript me naked.

When short I have shorn my sow's face,
And swigg'd my horned barrel;
In an oaken Inn

Do I pawn my skin,
As a suit of gilt apparel:
The morn's my constant mistress,
And the lovely owl my morrow;

The flaming drake,
And the night-crow, make
Me music, to my sorrow.

The palsie plague these pouncers,
When I prig your pigs or pullen;
Your culvers take
Or mateless make
Your chanciclar and sullen;

When I want provant with Husphrey I sup,
And when benighted,
To repose in Paul's
With waking souls
I never am affrighted.

I know more than Apollo,
For, oft when he lies sleeping,
I behold the stars

At mortal wars,
And the rounded welkin weeping;
The moon embraces her shepherd,
And the Queen of Love her warrior;
While the first does horn
The stars of the morn,
And the next the heavenly farrier.

With a heart of furious fancies,
Whereof I am commander:
With a burning spear,
And a horse of air,
To the wilderness I wander;
With a knight of ghosts and shadows,
I summoned am to Tourney:
Ten leagues beyond
The wide world's end;
Methinks it is no journey!

The last stanza of this Bedlam song contains the seeds of exquisite romance; a stanza worth many an admired poem.

INTRODUCTION OF TEA, COFFEE, AND CHOCOLATE.

It is said that the frozen Norwegians, on the first sight of roses dared not touch what they conceived were frost budding with fire; and the natives of Virginia, the first time they seized on a quantity of gunpowder, which belonged to the English colony, sowed it for grain, expecting to reap a plentiful crop of combustion by the next harvest, to blow away the whole colony.

In our own recollection, strange imaginations impeded the first period of Vaccination; when some families, terrified by the warning of a physician, conceived their race would end in a species of Minotours:

Semibovæque virum, semivirumque bovem.

We smile at the simplicity of the men of nature, for their mistaken notions at the first introduction among them of exotic novelties; and yet, even in civilized Europe, how long a time those whose profession, or whose reputation, regulate public opinion, are influenced by vulgar prejudices, often disguised under the imposing form of science! and when their ludicrous absurdities and obstinate prejudices enter into the matters of history, it is then we discover that they were only imposing on themselves and on others.

It is hardly credible that on the first introduction of the Chinese leaf, which now affords our daily refreshment; or the American leaf, whose sedative fumes made it so long a universal favourite; or the Arabian berry, whose aroma exhilarates its European votaries; that the use of these harmless novelties should have spread consternation in the nations of Europe, and have been anathematized by the terrors and the fictions of some of the learned. Yet this seems to have happened. Patin, who wrote so furiously against the introduction of antimony, spread the same alarm at the use of tea, which he calls 'l'impertinente nouveauté du siècle.' In Germany, Hanneman considered tea-dealers as immoral members of society, lying in wait for men's purses and lives; and Dr Duncan, in his treatise on hot liquors, suspected that the virtues attributed to tea were merely to encourage the importation.

Many virulent pamphlets were published against the use of this shrub, from various motives. In 1670 a Dutch writer says it was ridiculed in Holland under the name of hay-water. 'The progress of this famous plant,' says an ingenious writer, 'has been something like the progress of truth; suspected at first, though very palatable to those who had courage to taste it; resisted as it encroached; abused as its popularity seemed to spread; and establishing its triumph at last, in cheering the whole land from the palace to the cottage, only by the slow and relentless efforts of time and its own virtues.'⁸

The history of the Tea-shrub, written by Dr Lettsom, is usually referred to on this subject; I consider it little more than a plagiarism on Dr Short's learned and curious dissertation on Tea, 1730, 4to. Lettsom has superseded the solemn trifling of his moral and medical advice.

These now common beverages are all of recent origin in Europe; neither the ancients nor those of the middle ages tasted of this luxury. The first accounts we find of the use of this shrub are the casual notices of travellers, who seem to have tasted it, and sometimes not to have liked it: a Russian Ambassador, in 1639, who resided at the Court of the Mogul, declined accepting a large present of tea for the Czar, 'as it would only incur him with a commodity for which he had no use. The appearance of 'a black water' and an acrid taste seems not to have recommended it to the German Olearius in 1633. Dr Short has recorded an anecdote of a stratagem of the Dutch in their second voyage to China, by which they at first obtained their tea without disbursing money; they carried from home great stores of dried sage, and bartered it with the Chinese for tea; and received three or four pounds of tea for one of sage; but at length the Dutch could not export sufficient quantity of sage to supply their demand. This fact, however, proves how deeply the imagination is concerned with our palate, for the Chinese, affected by the exotic novelty, considered our sage to be more precious than their tea.

The first introduction of tea into Europe is not ascertained; according to the common accounts, it came into England from Holland, in 1666, when Lord Arlington and Lord Ossory brought over a small quantity; the custom of drinking tea became fashionable, and a pound weight sold then for sixty shillings. This account, however, is by no means satisfactory. I have heard of Oliver Cromwell's tea-pot in the possession of a collector, and this will debase the chronology of those writers who are perpetually copying the researches of others, without confirming or correcting them.

Amidst the rival contests of the Dutch and the English East-India Companies, the honour of introducing its use into Europe may be claimed by both. Dr Short conjectures that tea might have been known in England as far back as the reign of James I, for the first fleet set out in 1600; but, had the use of this shrub been known, the novelty had been chronicled among our dramatic writers, whose works are the annals of our prevalent tastes and humours. It is rather extraordinary that our East-India Company should not have discovered the use of this shrub in their early adventures; yet it certainly was not known in England so late as in 1641, for in a scarce 'Treatise of Warm Beer,' where the title indicates the author's design to recommend hot in preference to cold drinks, he refers to tea only by quoting the Jesuit Maffei's account, that 'they of China do for the most part drink the strained liquor of an herb called Chia, hot.' The word Chia is the Portuguese term for tea retained to this day, which they borrowed from the Japanese; while our intercourse with the Chinese made us no doubt adopt their term Thea, now prevalent throughout Europe, with the exception of the Portuguese. The Chinese origin is still preserved in the term Bohea, tea which comes from the country of Youki; and that of Hyson was the name of the most considerable Chinese then concerned in the trade.

The best account of the early use, and the prices of tea in England, appears in the hand-bill of one who may be called our first Tea-maker. This curious hand-bill bears no date, but as Hanway ascertained that the price was sixty shillings in 1680, this bill must have been dispersed about that period.

Thomas Garway in Exchange-alley, tobacconist and coffee-man, was the first who sold and retailed tea, recommending it for the cure of all disorders. The following shop-bill is more curious than any historical account we have.

'Tea in England hath been sold in the leaf for a s x pounds, and sometimes for ten pounds the pound weight, and in respect of its former scarceness and dearness it hath been only used as a regalia in high treatments and entertainments, and presents made thereof to princes and grantees till the year 1657. The said Garway did purchase a quantity thereof, and first publicly sold the said tea in leaf or drink, made according to the directions of the most knowing merchants into those Eastern countries. On the knowledge of the said Garway's continued care and industry in obtaining the best tea, and making drink thereof, very many noblemen, physicians, merchants, &c, have ever since sent to him for the said leaf, and daily resort to his house to drink the drink thereof. He sells tea from 16s to 50s a pound.'

Probably, tea was not in general use domestically so late as in 1667; for in the diary of Henry, Earl of Clarendon, he registers that 'Pere Couplet supped with me, and after supper we had tea, which he said was really as good as any he had drank in China.' Had his lordship been in the general habit of drinking tea, he had not, probably, made it a subject for his diary.

While the honour of introducing tea may be disputed between the English and the Dutch, that of coffee remains between the English and the French. Yet an Italian intended to have occupied the place of honour; that admirable traveller Pietro della Valle, writing from Constantinople, 1615, to a Roman, his fellow-countryman, informing him, that he should teach Europe in what manner the Turks took what he calls 'Cahud,' or as the word is written in an Arabic and English pamphlet, printed at Oxford 1569, on 'the nature of the drink Kawki or Coffee.' As this celebrated traveller lived in 1652, it may excite surprise that the first cup of coffee was not drank at Rome; this remains for the discovery of some member of the 'Arcadian Society.' Our own Purchas, at the time that Valle wrote, was also 'a Pilgrim,' and well knew what was 'Coffa,' which 'they drank as hot as they can endure it; it is as black as soot, and tastes not much unlike it, good they say for digestion and mirth.'

It appears by Le Grand's 'Vie privée des Francois,' that the celebrated Thevenot, in 1658, gave coffee after dinner: but it was considered as the whim of a traveller; neither the thing itself, nor its appearance, was inviting: it was probably attributed by the gay to the humour of a vain philosophical traveller. But ten years afterwards a Turkish ambassador at Paris made the beverage highly fashionable. The elegance of the equipage recommended it to the eye and charmed the women: the brilliant porcelain cups, in which it was poured; the napkins fringed with gold, and the Turkish slaves on their knees presenting it to the ladies, seated on the ground on cushions turned the heads of the Parisian dames. This elegant introduction made the exotic beverage a subject of conversation, and in 1672, an Armenian at Paris at the fair-time opened a coffee-house. But the custom still prevailed to sell beer and wine, and to smoke and mix with indifferent company in their first imperfect coffee-houses. A Florentine, one Procope, celebrated in his day as the arbiter of taste in this department, instructed by the error of the Armenian, invented a superior establishment, and introduced ices: he embellished his apartment, and those who had avoided the offensive coffee-houses, repaired to Procope's; where literary men, artists, and well resorted, to inhale the fresh and fragrant steam. Le Grand says, that this establishment holds a distinguished place in the literary history of the times. It was at the coffee-house of Du Laurent that Saurin, La Motte, Danchet, Boinin, Rousseau, &c, met; but the mild steams of the aromatic berry could not mollify the acerbity of so many rivals, and the witty malignity of Rousseau gave birth to those famous couplets on all the coffee-drinkers, which occasioned his misfortune and his banishment.

Such is the history of the first use of coffee and its houses at Paris. We, however, had the use before even the time of Thevenot; for an English Turkish merchant brought a Greek servant in 1652, who, knowing how to roast and make it, opened a house to sell it publicly. I have also discovered his hand-bill, in which he sets forth,

'The vertue of the coffee-drink, first publicly made and sold in England, by Pasqua Rosée, in St Michael's Alley, Cornhill, at the sign of his own head.'

For about twenty years after the introduction of coffee in this kingdom, we find a continued series of invectives against its adoption, both in medicinal and domestic views. The use of coffee, indeed seems to have excited more notice, and to have had a greater influence on the manners of the people, than that of tea. It seems at first to have been more universally used, as it still is on the Continent; and its use is connected with a resort for the idle and the curious: the history of coffee-houses is often that of the manners, the morals, and the politics, of a people. Even in its native country, the government discovered that extraordinary fact, and the use of the Arabian berry was more than once forbidden where it grows: for Ellis, in his 'History of Coffee,' 1774, refers to an Arabian ms. in the King of France's library, which shows that coffee-houses in Asia were sometimes suppressed. The same fate happened on its introduction into England.

Among a number of poetical satires against the use of coffee, I find a curious exhibition, according to the exaggerated notions of that day, in 'A Cup of Coffee, or Coffee in its colours,' 1663. The writer, like others of his contemporaries, wonders at the odd taste which could make Coffee a substitute for Canary.

'For men and Christians to turn Turks, and think
To excuse the crime, because 'tis in their drink!
Pure English apes! ye may, for ought I know,
Would it but mode—learn to eat spiders too.*
Should any of your grandsires' ghosts appear
In your wax-candle circles, and but hear
The name of coffee so much called upon;
Then see it drank like scalding Phlegmation,
Would they not startle, think ye, all agreed
'Twas conjuration both in word and deed;
Or Cataline's conspirators, as they stood
Sealing their oaths in draughts of blackest blood?
The merriest ghost of all your sires would say,
Your wine's much worse since his last yesterday.
He'd wonder how the club had given a hop
O'er tavern-bars into a farrier's shop,
Where he'd suppose, both by the smoke and stench,
Each man a horse, and each horse at his drench.
Sure you're no poets, nor their friends, for now,
Should Jonson's strenuous spirit, or the rare
Beaumont and Fletcher's in your rounds appear,
They would not find the air perfumed with one
Castilian drop, nor dew of Helicon;
When they but men would speak as the Gods do,

* This witty poet was not without a degree of prescience; the luxury of eating spiders has never indeed become 'modish,' but Mons. Lalande, the French astronomer, and one or two humble imitators of the modern philosopher, have shown this triumph over vulgar prejudices, and were Epicures of this stamp.

They drank pure nectar as the Gods drink tea,
Sublim'd with rich Canary—say shall then
These less than coffee's self, these coffee-men,
These sons of nothing, that can hardly make
Their broth, for laughing how the jest does take;
Yet grin, and give ye for the vine's pure blood
A loathsome potion, not yet understood,
Syrup of soot, or essence of old shoes,
Daubt with diurnals and the books of news.'

Other complaints arose from the mixture of the company in the first coffee-houses. In 'A broad-side against Coffee, or the marriage of the Turk,' 1672, the writer indicates the growth of the fashion:

'Confusion huddles all into one scene,
Like Noah's ark, the clean and the unclean;
For now, alas! the drench has credit got,
And he's no gentleman who drinks it not.
That such a dwarf should rise to such a stature!
But custom is but a remove from nature.'

In 'The Women's petition against Coffee,' 1684, they complained that 'it made men as unfruitful as the deserts whence that unhappy berry is said to be brought: that the offspring of our mighty ancestors would dwindle into a succession of apes and pigmies; and on a domestic message, a husband would stop by the way to drink a couple of cups of coffee.' It was now sold in convenient penny-worths; for in another poem in praise of a coffee-house, for the variety of information obtained there, it is called 'a penny university!'

Amidst these contests of popular prejudices, between the lovers of forsaken Canary, and the terrors of our females at the barrenness of an Arabian desert, which lasted for twenty years, at length the custom was universally established; nor were there wanting some reflecting minds desirous of introducing the use of this liquid among the labouring classes of society, to wean them from strong liquors. Howel, in noticing that curious philosophical traveller, Sir Henry Blount's 'Organon Salutis,' 1668, observed that 'this coffee-drink hath caused a great sobriety among all nations: formerly apprentices, clerks, &c, used to take their morning draughts in ale, beer, or wine, which often made them unfit for business. Now they play the good-fellows in this wakeful and civil drink. The worthy gentleman Sir James Muddiford, who introduced the practice herself first in London, deserves much respect of the whole nation.' Here it appears, what is most probable, that the use of this berry was introduced by other Turkish merchants, besides Edwards and his servant Pasqua. But the custom of drinking coffee among the labouring classes does not appear to have lasted; and when it was recently even the cheapest beverage, the popular prejudices prevailed against it, and run in favour of tea. The contrary practice prevails on the continent, where beggars are viewed making their coffee in the street. I remember seeing the large body of shipwrights at Helvoetsluis summoned by a bell, to take their regular refreshment of coffee; and the fleets of Holland were not then built by arms less robust than the fleets of Britain.

The frequenting of coffee houses is a custom which has declined within our recollection, since institutions of a higher character, and society itself, has so much improved within late years. These were, however, the common assemblies of all classes of society. The mercantile man, the man of letters, and the man of fashion, had their appropriate coffee houses. The Tatler dates from either to convey a character of his subject. In the reign of Charles II, 1676, a proclamation for some time shut them all up, having become the rendezvous of the politicians of that day. Roger North has given, in his Examen, a full account of this bold stroke; it was not done without some apparent respect to the British Constitution, the court affecting not to act against law, for the judges were summoned to a consultation, when, it seems, the five who did not agree in opinion. But a decision was contrived that 'the retailing of coffee and tea might be an immoral trade; but as it was said to nourish sedition, spread law, and scandalize great men, it might also be a common nuisance.' A general discontent, in consequence, as North acknowledges, took place, and emboldened the merchants and retailers of coffee and tea to petition; and permission was soon granted to open the houses to a certain period, under a severe admonition, that the masters should prevent all scandalous papers, books, and libels from being read in them; and hinder every person from spreading scandal.

less reports against the government. It must be confessed, all this must have frequently puzzled the coffee-house master to decide what was scandalous, what not was fit to be licensed to be read, and what political intelligence might be allowed to be communicated. The jest of the government was, probably, to intimidate, rather than to persecute, at that moment.

Chocolate the Spaniards brought from Mexico where, was denominated Chocolatl; it was a coarse mixture of ground cacao and Indian corn with rocou; but the Spaniards, liking its nourishment, improved it into a richer compound, with sugar, vanilla, and other aromatics. The moderate use of chocolate, in the seventeenth century, was considered as so violent an inflamer of the passions, that Joan. Fran. Rauch published a treatise against it, enforcing the necessity of forbidding the monks to drink it; and adds, that if such an interdiction had existed, the scandal with which that holy order had been branded might have proved more groundless. This Disputatio politico-theologica de aere et esculentis, nec-non de potu, Vienna, 1634, is a rare axis among collectors. This attack on the monks, as well as on chocolate, is said to be the cause of its scarcity; for we are told that they were so diligent in suppressing this treatise, that it is supposed not more copies exist. We had chocolate houses in London after coffee houses; they seemed to have associated something more elegant and refined in their new term than the other had become common. Roger North thus writes against them: 'The use of coffee houses seems much improved by a new invention, called chocolate houses, the benefit of rooks and culivies of quality, where gaming is added to all the rest, and the summons of W— seldom fails; as if the devil had erected a new University, of those were the colleges of its professors, as well as a school of discipline.' Roger North, a high tory, and tory general to James II, observed however, that these houses were often not entirely composed of those 'facing genry he so much dreaded;' for he says, 'This way of passing time might have been stopped at first before people had possessed themselves of some convenience to them of meeting for short despatches, and passing romps with small expenses.' And old Aubrey, the tall Boswell of his day, attributes his general acquaintance to 'the modern advantage of coffee houses in this matter, before which men knew not how to be acquainted with their own relations, and societies.' A curious statement, which proves the moral connexion with society of all sedentary recreations which induce the herding together.

CHARLES THE FIRST'S LOVE OF THE FINE ARTS.

Herbert, the faithful attendant of Charles I, during the last years of the king's life, mentions, 'a diamond seal on the king's arms engraved on it. The history of this diamond seal is remarkable; and seems to have been covered by the conjectural sagacity of Warburton, who has exercised his favourite talent with greater felicity. The curious passage I transcribe may be found in a manuscript letter to Dr Birch.

'If you have read Herbert's account of the last days of Charles the First's life, you must remember he tells a story of a diamond seal, with the arms of England cut into it. The King Charles ordered to be given, I think, to the late. I suppose you don't know what became of this seal, but would be surprised to find it afterwards in the hands of Persia. Yet there Tavernier certainly carried it and offered it to sale, as I certainly collect from these words of vol. I, p. 541. "Me souvenir de ce qui estoit un Chevalier de Reville." &c. He tells us he told the Prime Minister what was engraved on the diamond seal of the arms of a Prince of Europe, but, says he, I would be more particular, remembering the case of Reville. His case was this: he came to seek employment from the Sophy, who asked him "where he had served?" "In England under Charles I, and that he was slain in his guards."—"Why did you leave his service?" "He was murdered by cruel rebels."—"And what you the impudence," says the Sophy, "to surmise?" And so disgraced him. Now Tavernier was told if he had said the arms of England had been on the seal, that they would have occasioned the inquiry into the story. You will ask how Tavernier got this seal? I suppose, that the prince, in his necessities, sold it to the Sophy, who was at Paris when the English court was in exile. What made me recollect Herbert's account on reading this, was the singularity of an impress cut on the diamond, which Tavernier represents as a most extraordinary rarity. Charles I was a great virtuoso, and delighted particularly in sculpture and painting.'

This is an instance of conjectural evidence where a historical fact seems established on no other authority than the ingenuity of a student, exercised in his library on a private and secret event a century after it had occurred. The diamond seal of Charles I, may, probably, be yet discovered in the treasures of the Persian Sovereign.

Warburton, who had ranged with keen delight through the age of Charles I, the noblest and the most humiliating in our own history, and in that of the world perpetually instructive, has justly observed the king's passion for the fine arts. It was indeed such, that had the reign of Charles I, proved prosperous, that sovereign about 1640 would have anticipated those tastes, and even that enthusiasm, which are still almost foreign to the nation.

The mind of Charles I was moulded by the Graces. His favourite Buckingham was probably a greater favourite, for those congenial tastes, and the frequent exhibition of those splendid masks and entertainments, which combined all the picture of ballet dances, with the voice of music; the charms of the verse of Jonson, the scenic machinery of Inigo Jones, and the variety of fanciful devices of Gerbier, the duke's architect, the bosom friend of Rubens. There was a costly magnificence in the festes at York House, the residence of Buckingham, of which few but curious researchers are aware: they eclipsed the splendour of the French Court; for Basompierre, in one of his despatches, declares he had never witnessed a similar magnificence. He describes the vaulted apartments, the halllets at supper, which were proceeding between the services, with various representations, theatrical changes, and those of the tables, and the music; the duke's own contrivance, to prevent the inconvenience of pressure, by having a turning door made like that of the monasteries, which admitted only one person at a time. The following extract from a manuscript letter of the times conveys a lively account of one of these festes.

'Last Sunday at night, the duke's grace entertained their majesties and the French ambassador at York House, with great feasting and show, where all things came down in clouds; amongst which, one rare device was a representation of the French king and the two queens with their chief attendants, and so to the life, that the queens majesty could name them. It was four o'clock in the morning before they parted, and then the king and queen, together with the French ambassador, lodged there. Some estimate this entertainment at five or six thousand pounds.' At another time, 'The king and queen were entertained at supper, at Gerbier, the duke's painter's house, which could not stand him in less than a thousand pounds.' 'Sir Symonds D'Ewes mentions banquets at 8000. The fullest account I have found of one of these entertainments, which at once show the curiosity of the scenical machinery, and the fancy of the poet, the richness of the crimson habits of the gentlemen, and the white dresses with white heron's plumes and jewelled head-dresses, and ropes of pearls of the ladies, was in a manuscript letter of the times, with which I supplied the editor of Jonson, who has preserved the narrative in his memoirs of that poet.'—'Such were the magnificent entertainments,' says Mr. Gifford, in his introduction to Massinger, 'which, though modern refinement may affect to despise them, modern splendour never reached, even in thought.' That the expenditure was costly, proves that the greater encouragement was offered to artists; nor should Buckingham be censured, as some will incline to, for this lavish expense; it was not unusual with the great nobility then; for the literary Duchess of Newcastle mentions that an entertainment of this sort, which the duke gave to Charles I, cost her lord between four and five thousand pounds. The ascetic puritan would indeed abhor these scenes; but their magnificence was also designed to infuse into the national character gentler feelings and more elegant tastes. They charmed even those fiercer republican spirits in their tender youth: MILTON owes his Arcades and his delightful Comus to a mask at Ludlow Castle; and WHITLOCKE, who was himself an actor and manager, in 'a splendid royal mask of the four Inns of courts joining together' to go to court about the time that Dryden published his Histriomastix, 'to manifest the differ-once of their opinions from Mr. Prynne's new learning, — seems, even at a later day, when drawing up his 'Memoirs of the English Affairs,' and occupied by graver concerns, to have dwelt with all the fondness of reminiscence on the stately shows and masks of his more innocent age; and has devoted in a chronicle which contracts many an important event in a single paragraph, six folio columns to a minute and very curious description of 'these dreams past, and these vanished pomps.'

Charles the First, indeed, not only possessed a critical tact, but extensive knowledge in the fine arts and the relics of antiquity. In his flight in 1648, the king stopped at the abode of the religious family of the Farrars at Gidding, who had there raised a singular monastic institution among themselves. One of their favourite amusements had been to form an illustrated Bible, the wonder and the talk of the country. In turning it over, the king would tell his companion the Palgrave, whose curiosity in prints exceeded his knowledge, the various masters, and the character of their inventions. When Panzani, a secret agent of the Pope, was sent over to England to promote the Catholic cause, the subtle and elegant Cardinal Barberini, called the protector of the English at Rome, introduced Panzani to the king's favour by making him appear as agent rather for procuring him fine pictures, statues, and curiosities; and the earnest inquiries and orders given by Charles I prove his perfect knowledge of the most beautiful existing remains of ancient art. 'The statues go on prosperously,' says Cardinal Barberini in a letter to Mazarine, 'nor shall I hesitate to rob Rome of her most valuable ornaments, if in exchange we might be so happy as to have the King of England's name among those Princes who submit to the Apostolic See.' Charles I was particularly urgent to procure a statue of Adonis in the Villa Ludovisa; every effort was made by the queen's confessor, Father Philips, and the vigilant Cardinal at Rome; but the inexorable Duchess of Fiano would not suffer it to be separated from her rich collection of statues and paintings, even for the chance conversion of a whole kingdom of heretics.*

This monarch, who possessed 'four and twenty palaces, all of them elegantly and completely furnished,' and formed very considerable collections. 'The value of pictures had doubled in Europe, by the emulation between our Charles and Philip IV of Spain, who was touched with the same elegant passion.' When the rulers of fanaticism began their reign, 'all the king's furniture was put to sale; his pictures, disposed of at very low prices, enriched all the collections in Europe: the cartoons when complete were only appraised at 300*l*, though the whole collection of the king's curiosities were sold at above 50,000*l*.† Hume adds, 'the very library and medals at St James's were intended by the generals to be brought to auction, in order to pay the arrears of some regiments of cavalry; but Selden, apprehensive of this loss, engaged his friend Whitelocke, then lord-keeper of the commonwealth, to apply for the office of librarian. This contrivance saved that valuable collection.' This account is only partly correct: the love of books, which formed the passion of the two learned scholars whom Hume notices, fortunately intervened to save the royal collection from the intended scattering; but the pictures and medals were, perhaps, objects too slight in the eyes of the book-learning; they were resigned to the singular fate of appraisement. After the Restoration very many books were missing, but scarcely a third part of the medals remained: of the strange manner in which these precious remains of ancient art and history were valued and disposed of, the following account may not be read without interest.

In March 1648, the parliament ordered commissioners to be appointed to inventory the goods and personal estate of the late king, queen, and prince; and appraise them for the use of the public. And in April 1648, an act, adds Whitelocke, was committed, for inventorying the late king's goods, &c.‡

nificent folio, of near a thousand pages, of an extraordinary dimension, bound in crimson velvet, and richly gilt, written in a fair large hand, but with little knowledge of objects which the inventory writer describes. It is entitled 'An Inventory of the Goods, Jewels, Plate, &c. belonging to King Charles I, sold by order of the Council of State, in the year 1649 to 1652.' So that from the decapitation the king, a year was allowed to draw up the inventory and the sale proceeded during three years.

From this manuscript catalogue* to give long extracts were useless; it has afforded, however, some remarkable observations. Every article was appraised, nothing was under the affixed price, but a slight competition sometimes seemed to have raised the sum; and when the council state could not get the sum appraised, the gold and silver was sent to the Mint; and assuredly many fine works were valued by the ounce. The names of the purchasers appear: they are usually English, but probably many were the agents of foreign courts. The coins or medals were thrown promiscuously into drawers: one drawer, having twenty-four medals, was valued at 2*l*. 10*s*; another twenty at 1*l*; another of twenty-four at 1*l*; and one drawer, containing forty-six silver coins with the box, was valued for 5*l*. On the whole, medals seem not to have been valued at much more than a shilling a piece. The appraisal was certainly no antiquary.

The king's curiosities in the Tower Jewel-house generally fetched above the price fixed; the toys of art or please the unlettered minds that had no conception of works.

The temple of Jerusalem, made of ebony and alms fetched 25*l*.

A fountain of silver, for perfumed waters, artistically made to play of itself, sold for 30*l*.

A chess board, said to be Queen Elizabeth's, inlaid with gold, silver, and pearls, 23*l*.

A conjuring drum from Lapland, with an almanac on a piece of wood.

Several sections in silver of a Turkish gallery, a Venetian gondola, an Indian canoe, and a first rate man of war.

A Saxon king's mace used in war, with a ball of iron spikes, and the handle covered with gold plates, and encased, sold for 37*l*. 8*s*.

A gorget of massy gold, chased with the manner of battle, weighing thirty-one ounces, at 3*l*. 10*s*, per ounce, was sent to the Mint.

A Roman shield of buff leather, covered with a plain gold, finely chased with a Gorgon's head, set round with rubies, emeralds, turquoise stones, in 1671, 132*l*. 12*s*.

The pictures, taken from Whitehall, Windsor, Windon, Greenwich, Hampton Court, &c. exhibit, in sum an unparalleled collection. By what standard they are valued, it would, perhaps, be difficult to conjecture: 50*l* to 100*l*, seems to have been the limits of the appraise and imagination. Some whose price in value alone may have been thus rated, from a political respect the portrait of the person; there are, however, in this singular appraised catalogue, two pictures, were rated at, and sold for, the remarkable sums of one and of two thousand pounds. The one was a de Venus by Correggio, and the other a Madonna by Raphael. There was also a picture by Julio Romano, called 'great piece of the Nativity,' at 500*l*. 'The little donna and Christ,' by Raphael, at 800*l*. 'The great nus and Parde,' by Titian, at 600*l*. These seem to be the only pictures, in this immense collection, reached a picture's price. The inventory writer probably, been instructed by the public voice of the day, which, however, would in the present day, be counted much under a fourth. Rubens' 'Woman taken in adultery,' described as a large picture, sold for 20*l*; as 'Peace and Plenty, with many figures big as the life,' 100*l*. Titian's pictures seem generally valued at 100*l*. Venus dressed by the Graces, by Guido, reached to The Cartoons of Raphael, here called 'The Acts Apostles,' notwithstanding their subject was so common to the popular feelings, and only appraised at 300*l*, find no purchaser!

The following full lengths of celebrated personages rated at these whimsical prices:

Queen Elizabeth, in her parliament robes, valued

* Harl MS. 4000.

The Queen mother in mourning habit, valued 3*l*.

Buchanan's picture, valued 3*l*, 10*s*.

The King, when a youth in coats, valued 2*l*.

The picture of the Queen, when she was with child, sold for five shillings.

King Charles on horseback, by Sir Anthony Vandyke, was purchased by Sir Balthazar Gerbier, at the appraised price of 200*l*.

The greatest sums were produced by the tapestry and arras hangings, which were chiefly purchased for the service of the Protector. Their amount exceeds 50,000*l*. I see a few.

At Hampton Court, ten pieces of arras hangings of Abraham, containing 686 yards, at 10*s* a yard, 6860*l*.

Ten pieces of Julius Cæsar, 717, ells, at 7*l*, 5019*l*.

One of the cloth of estates is thus described :

One rich cloth of estate of purple velvet, embroidered with gold, having the arms of England within a garter, with all the furniture suitable thereunto. The state containing these stones following : two cameos or agates, twelve sardines, twelve ballases or garnets, one sapphire seated in chased of gold, one long pearl pendant, and many large and small pearls, valued at 500*l*, sold for 602*l*, 10*s*, to Mr. Ever, 4 February, 1649.

Was plain Mr Oliver, in 1649, who we see was one of the earlier purchasers, shortly after 'the Lord Protector?' (the 'cloth of estate' and 'arras hangings' were afterwards purchased for the service of the Protector : and one may venture to conjecture that when Mr Oliver purchased in 'rich cloth of estate,' it was not without a latent motive of service to the new owner.*

There is one circumstance remarkable in the feeling of Charles I for the fine arts : it was a passion without ostentation or egotism ; for although this monarch was inclined himself to participate in the pleasures of a creating artist, as king having handled the pencil and composed a poem ; yet he never suffered his private dispositions to prevail over his more majestic duties. We do not discover in history that Charles I was a painter and a poet. Accident at secret history only reveal this softening feature in his rare and king-like character. Charles sought no glory, but only indulged his love for art and the artists. Here are three manuscripts on his art, by Leonardo da Vinci, in the Ambrosian library, which bear an inscription at a King of England, in 1639, offered one thousand pieces of gold for each. Charles, too, suggested to the very great painters of his age, the subjects he considered worthy of their pencils, and had for his 'closest-companions,' those native poets, for which he was censured in his times, and even by Milton!

Charles I, therefore, if ever he practised the arts he led, it may be conjectured, was impelled by the force of his feelings ; his works or his touches, however unskilful, were at least their effusions, expressing the full language of his soul. In his imprisonment at Carisbrook castle, the author of the 'Eikon Basilike,' solaced his sad woes by composing a poem, entitled in the very style of this memorable volume, 'Majesty in Misery, or an Epitaph on the King of Kings ;' and, like that volume, contains stanzas fraught with the most tender and solemn feeling : such a subject, in the hands of such an author, is sure to produce poetry, although in the unpractised it we may want the versifier. A few stanzas will illustrate this conception of part of his character :

'The foremost furies that do daily tread
Upon my grief, my gray discrowned head,
Are those that owe my bounty for their bread.

With my own power my majesty they wound ;
To the king's name, the king 's himself uncrown'd ;
To both the dust destroy the diamond.'

How a pathetic description of his queen, 'forced in pilgrimage to seek a tomb,' and 'Great Britain's heir forced France,' where,

'Poor child ! he weeps out his inheritance !'
then continues :

'They promise to erect my royal stem ;
To make me great, to advance my diadem ;
I will first fall down, and worship them !'

Some may be curious to learn the price of gold and silver in 1649. It appears by this manuscript inventory that the gold sold at 4*l*, 11*s*, per oz ; and gold at 3*l*, 10*s* ; so that the price of these metals has little varied during the last century and half.

But for refusal they devour my thrones,
Distress my children, and destroy my bones ;
I fear they 'll force me to make bread of stones.'

And implores, with a martyr's piety, the Saviour's forgiveness for those who were more misled than criminal :

'Such as thou know'st do not know what they do.'*

As a poet and a painter, Charles is not popularly known, but this article was due, to preserve the memory of the royal votary's arduous and pure feelings for the love of the Fine Arts.†

THE SECRET HISTORY OF CHARLES I, AND HIS QUEEN HENRIETTA.

The secret history of Charles I, and his queen Henrietta of France, opens a different scene from the one exhibited in the passionate drama of our history.

The king is accused of the most spiritless uxoriousness ; and the chaste fondness of a husband is placed among his political errors. Even Hume conceives that his queen 'precipitated him into hasty and imprudent counsels,' and Bishop Kennet had alluded to 'the influence of a stately queen over an affectionate husband.' The uxoriousness of Charles is re-echoed by all the writers of a certain party. This is an odium which the king's enemies first threw out to make him contemptible ; while his apologists imagined that, in perpetuating this accusation, they had discovered, in a weakness which has at least something amiable, some palliation for his own political misconduct. The factions, too, by this aspersion, promoted the alarm they spread in the nation, of the king's inclination to popery ; yet, on the contrary, Charles was then making a determined stand, and at length triumphed over a Catholic faction, which was ruling his queen ; and this at the risk and menace of a war with France. Yet this firmness too has been denied him, even by the apologist Hume ; that historian on his preconceived system imagined, that every action of Charles I originated in the Duke of Buckingham, and that the duke pursued his personal quarrel with Richelieu, and taking advantage of these domestic quarrels, had persuaded Charles to dismiss the French attendants of the queen.‡

There are, fortunately, two letters from Charles I to Buckingham, preserved in the state-papers of Lord Hardwicke, which set this point to rest : these decisively prove, that the whole matter originated with the king himself, and that Buckingham had tried every effort to persuade him to the contrary ; for the king complains, that he had been too long overcome by his persuasions, but that he was now 'resolved it must be done, and that shortly'§.

It is remarkable, that the character of a queen, who is imagined to have performed so active a part in our history, scarcely ever appears in it ; when abroad, and when she returned to England, in the midst of a winter-storm, bringing all the aid she could to her unfortunate consort, those who witnessed this appearance of energy imagined that her character was equally powerful in the cabinet. Yet Henrietta, after all, was nothing more than a volatile woman ; one who had never studied, never reflected, and whom nature had formed to be charming and haughty, but whose vivacity could not retain even a state-secret for an hour, and whose talents were quite opposite to those of deep political intrigue.

Henrietta viewed even the characters of great men with all the sensations of a woman. Describing the Earl of Strafford to a confidential friend, and having observed that he was a great man, she dwelt with far more interest on his person : 'Though not handsome,' said she, 'he was agreeable enough, and he had the finest manners of any man

* This poem is omitted in the great edition of the king's works, published after the Restoration ; and was given by Burnet from a manuscript in his 'Memoirs of the Duke of Hamilton ;' but it had been published in Ferencelius's 'Life of Charles I.'

† This article was composed without any recollection that a part of the subject had been anticipated by Lord Orford. In the 'Anecdotes of Painting in England,' many curious particulars are noticed : the story of the king's diamond seal had reached his lordship, and Vertue had a mutilated transcript of the inventory of the king's pictures, &c. discovered in Moorfields ; for, among others, more than thirty pages at the beginning, relating to the plate and jewels, were missing. The manuscript in the Harleian collection is perfect. Lord Orford has also given an interesting anecdote to show the king's discernment in the knowledge of the hands of the painters, which confirms the little anecdote I have related from the Farrars.

in the world.' Landing at Burlington bay in Yorkshire, she lodged on the quay; the parliament's admiral barbarously pointed his cannon at the house; and several shot reaching it, her favourite, Jermyn requested her to fly; she safely reached a cavern in the fields, but, recollecting that she had left a lap dog asleep in its bed, she flew back, and, amidst the cannon-shot, returned with this other favourite. The queen related this incident of the lap dog to her friend Madame Motteville; these ladies considered it as a complete woman's victory. It is in these memoirs we find, that when Charles went down to the house, to seize on the five leading members of the opposition, the queen could not retain her lively temper, and impatiently babbled the plot; so that one of the ladies in attendance despatched a hasty note to the parties, who, as the king entered the house, had just time to leave it. Some have dated the ruin of his cause to the failure of that impolitic step, which alarmed every one zealous for that spirit of political freedom which had now grown up in the commons. Incidents like these mark the feminine dispositions of Henrietta. But when at sea, in danger of being taken by a parliamentarian, the queen commanded the captain not to strike, but to prepare at the extremity to blow up the ship, resisting the shrieks of her females and domestics; we perceive how, on every trying occasion, Henrietta never forgot that she was the daughter of Henry IV; that glorious affinity was inherited by her with all the sexual pride; and hence, at times, that energy in her actions which was so far above her intellectual capacity.

And, indeed, when the awful events she had witnessed were one by one registered in her melancholy mind, the sensibility of the woman subdued the natural haughtiness of her character; but, true woman! the feeling creature of circumstances, at the Restoration she resumed it, and when the new court of Charles II would not endure her obsolete haughtiness, the dowager-queen left it in all the full bitterness of her spirit. An habitual gloom, and the meagreness of grief, during the commonwealth had changed a countenance once the most lively, and her eyes, whose dark and dazzling lustre was even celebrated, then only shone in tears. When she told her physician, Sir Theodore Mayerne, that she found her understanding was failing her, and seemed terrified lest it was approaching to madness, the court physician, hardly courteously fallen mastery, replied, 'Madam, fear not that; for you are already mad.' Henrietta had lived to contemplate the awful changes of her reign, without comprehending them.

Waller, in the profusion of poetical decoration, makes Henrietta so beautiful, that her beauty would affect every lover 'more than his private loves.' She was 'the whole world's mistress.' A portrait in crayons of Henrietta at Hampton-court sadly reduces all his poetry, for the miraculous was only in the fancy of the court poet. But there may be some truth in what he says of the eyes of Henrietta.

Such eyes as yours, on Jove himself, had thrown
As bright and fierce a lightning as his own.'

And in another poem there is one characteristic line

— Such radiant eyes,
Such lovely motion, and such sharp replies.'

In a ms. letter of the times, the writer describes the queen as 'nimble and quick, black-eyed, brown-haired, and a brave lady.'* In the ms. journal of Sir Symonds D'Ewe, who saw the queen on her first arrival in London, cold and puritanic as was that antiquary, he notices with some warmth 'the features of her face, which were much enlivened by her radiant and sparkling black eye.'† She appears to have possessed French vivacity both in her manners and her conversation: in the history of a queen, an accurate conception of her person enters for something.

Her talents were not of that order which could influence the revolutions of a people. Her natural dispositions might have allowed her to become a politician of the toilette, and she might have practised those slighter artifices, which may be considered as so many political coquetries. But Machiavellian principles, and involved intrigues, of which she has been so freely accused, could never have entered into her character. At first she tried all the forcible inventions of a woman to persuade the king that she was his humblest creature, and the good people of England, that she was quite in love with them. Now that we know that no female was ever more deeply tainted with Catholic bigotry; and that, haughty as she was, this princess suffered the most insulting superstitions, inflicted as penances by the priests, for this very marriage with a Protestant prince, the following new facts relating to her first arrival in England, curiously contrast with the mortified feelings she must have endured by the violent suppression of her reasons.

We must bring forward a remarkable and unnoted document in the Embassies of Marshal Bassompierre. It is nothing less than a most solemn obligation contract with the Pope and her brother, the King of France, to educate her children as Catholics, and only to choose Catholics to attend them. Had this been known either to Charles or to the English nation, Henrietta could never have been permitted to ascend the English throne. The fate of her sons shows how faithfully she performed this treacherable contract. This piece of secret history opens a concealed cause of those deep impressions of that fall which both monarchs sucked in with their milk; that triumph of the cradle over the grave which most open enemies: Charles II died a Catholic, James II lived as one.

When Henrietta was on her way to England, a legat from Rome arrested her at Amiens, requiring the prison to undergo a penance, which was to last sixteen days, for marrying Charles without the papal dispensation. The queen stopped her journey, and wrote to inform the king of the occasion. Charles, who was then waiting for her at Canterbury, replied, that if Henrietta did not instantly proceed, he would return alone to London. Henrietta doubtless sighed for the Pope and the penance, but she set off the day she received the king's letter. The king, either in his wisdom or his impatience, detected the aim of the Roman pontiff, who, had he been permitted to arrest the progress of a Queen of England for sixteen days in the face of all Europe, would thus have obtained a tacit pre-eminence over a British Monarch.

When the king arrived at Canterbury, although not the moment prepared to receive him, Henrietta flew to meet him, and with all her spontaneous grace and nativity, kneeling at his feet, she kissed his hand, while the king, bending over her, wrapt her in his arms, and kissed her with many kisses. This royal and youthful pair, unusual with those of their rank, met with the eagerness of lovers, and the first words of Henrietta were those of devotion; *Sire. Je suis venue en ce pays de votre jésuité, pour être usée et commandée de vous. It had been rumoured that she was of a very short stature, but, rising to the king's shoulder, his eyes were cast down to her feet, seemingly observing whether she used art to increase her height. Anticipating his thoughts, and playfully showing her feet, she declared, that 'she stood upon her feet, for thus high I am, and neither higher or lower.' After an hour's conversation in privacy, Henrietta took dinner surrounded by the court; and the king, who had already dined, performing the office of her carver, conversed and some venison. By the side of the queen stood her ghostly confessor, solemnly reminding her that this was the eve of John the Baptist, and was to be fast, exhorting her to be cautious that she set no scandalous example on her first arrival. But Charles and his court were now to be gained over, as well as John the Baptist. She affected to eat very heartily of the forbidden meats which gave great comfort, it seems, to several of her heretical subjects then present; but we may conceive pangs of so confirmed a devotee! She carried her dilution so far, that being asked about this time what she could abide a Hugonot? she replied, 'Why not? Was not my father one?' Her ready smiles, the glad wave of her hand, the many 'good signs of hope,' a contemporary in a manuscript letter expresses it, many of the English to believe that Henrietta might become one of themselves! Sir Symonds D'Ewe appears by his manuscript diary, was struck by her deportment to her women, and her looks to her servants which were so sweet and humble.† However, this in the first days of her arrival, and these 'sweet and humble looks' were not constant ones; for a courtier at 16 bill, writing to a friend, observes, that 'the queen, however little of stature, yet is of a pleasing countenance, if she be pleased, otherwise full of spirit and vigour, and seems of more than ordinary resolution; and he adds an incident of one of her 'frowns.' The room in which the queen was at dinner being somewhat overheated with the fire and company, 'she drove us all out of the chamber. I suppose none but a queen could have cast such a spell.' We may already detect the fair waxen mask looking away on the features it covered, even in one short hour!

By the marriage contract, Henrietta was to be allowed a household establishment, composed of her own people; and this had been contrived to be not less than a small French colony, exceeding three hundred persons. It imposed, in fact, a French faction, and looks like a covert object of Richelieu's to further his intrigues here, by opening a perpetual correspondence with the discontented Catholics of England. In the instructions of Bassompierre, one of the alleged objects of the marriage is the general good of the Catholic religion, by affording some relief to those English who professed it. If however, that great statesman ever entertained this political design, the simplicity and pride of the Roman priests here completely overturned it, for in their blind zeal they dared to extend their domestic tyranny over majesty itself.

The French party had not long resided here, ere the mutual jealousies between the two nations broke out. All the English who were not Catholics were soon dismissed from their attendance on the queen, by herself; while Charles was compelled, by the popular cry, to forbid any English Catholics to serve the queen, or to be present at the celebration of her mass. The king was even obliged to employ pursuivants or king's messengers, to stand at the door of her chapel to seize on any of the English who entered there, while on these occasions the French would brand their swords to defend these concealed Catholics. The queen and hers became an odious distinction in the nation. Such were the indecent scenes exhibited in public; they were not less reserved in private. The following anecdote of saying a grace before the king, at his own table, in a most indecorous race run between the Catholic king and the king's chaplain, is given in a manuscript letter of the times.

'The King and queen dining together in the presence of Mr Hacket (chaplain to the Lord Keeper Williams) began then to say grace, the confessor would have prevented him, but that Hacket shoved him away; whereupon the confessor went to the queen's side, and was about to say grace again, but that the king pulling the dishes unto him, and the carvers falling to their business, hindered. When dinner was done, the confessor thought, standing by the queen, to have been before Mr Hacket, but Mr Hacket got the start. The confessor, nevertheless, begins to say grace as loud as Mr Hacket, with such a confusion, that the king in great passion instantly rose from the table, and, taking the queen by the hand, retired into the bed-chamber. It is with difficulty we conceive how such a race of priestly indiscretion should have been suffered at the table of an English sovereign.

Such are the domestic accounts I have gleaned from the annals of the times; but particulars of a deeper nature may be discovered in the answer of the king's council to Marshal Bassompierre, preserved in the history of his embassy; this marshal had been hastily despatched as an extraordinary ambassador when the French party were dismissed. This state document, rather a remonstrance than reply, states that the French household had formed little republic within themselves, combining with the French resident ambassador, and inciting the opposition members in parliament; a practice usual with that intriguing court, even from the days of Elizabeth, as the original piece of the French ambassador of the time, which will be found in the present volume, amply show; and those of La Boderie in James the First's time, who raised a French party about prince Henry; and the correspondence of Barillon in Charles the second's reign is fully exposed in his entire correspondence published by Fox. The French domestics of the queen were engaged in lower intrigues; they lent their names to hire houses in the suburbs of London, where, under their protection, the English Catholics found a secure retreat to hold their illegal assemblies, and where the youth of both sexes were educated and prepared to be sent abroad to Catholic seminaries. But the queen's priests, by those well known means which the Catholic religion sanctions, were drawing from the queen the minutest circumstances which passed in privacy between her and the king; indisposed her mind towards her royal consort, impressed on her a contempt of the English nation, and a disgust of our customs, and particularly, as has been usual with the French, made her neglect the English language, as if the queen of England held no common interest with the nation. They had made her residence a place of security for the persons and papers of the discontented. Yet all this was hardly more onerous than the humiliating state to which they had reduced an English queen by their monastic obedience; inflicting the most degrading penances. One of the most flagrant is alluded to in our history. This was a barefoot pilgrimage to Tyburn, where, one morning, under the gallows on which so many Jesuits had been executed as traitors to Elizabeth and James I, she knelt and prayed to them as martyrs and saints who had shed their blood in defence of the Catholic cause.* A manuscript letter of the times mentions that 'the priests had also made her dabble in the dirt in a foul morning from Somerset house to St James's, her Luciferian confessor riding along by her in his coach! They have made her to go barefoot, to spin, and to eat her meat out of dishes, to wait at the table of servants, with many other ridiculous and absurd penances. And if they dare thus insult (adds the writer) over the daughter, sister, and wife of so great kings, what slavery would they not make us, the people, to undergo!'

One of the articles in the contract of marriage was, that the queen should have a chapel at St James's to be built and consecrated by her French bishop; the priests became very importunate, declaring that without a chapel mass could not be performed with the state it ought, before the queen. The king's answer is not that of a man inclined to popery. 'If the queen's closet, where they now say mass, is not large enough, let them have it in the great chamber; and, if the great chamber is not wide enough, they might use the garden and, if the garden would not serve their turn, then was the park the fittest place.

The French priests and the whole party feeling themselves slighted, and sometimes worse treated, were breeding continual quarrels among themselves, grew weary of England, and wished themselves away; but many having purchased their places with all their fortune, would have been ruined by the breaking up of the establishment.—Bassompierre alludes to the broils and clamours of these French strangers, which exposed them to the laughter of the English court; and one cannot but smile in observing in one of the despatches of this great mediator between two kings and a queen, addressed to the minister, that one of the greatest obstacles which he had found in this difficult negotiation arose from the bedchamber women! The French king being desirous of having two additional women to attend the English queen, his sister, the ambassador declares, that 'it would be more expedient rather to diminish than to increase the number; for they all live so ill together, with such rancorous jealousies and enmities, that I have more trouble to make them agree than I shall find to accommodate the differences between the two kings. Their continual bickerings, and often their vituperative language, occasion the English to entertain the most contemptible and ridiculous opinions of our nation. I shall not, therefore, insist on this point, unless it shall please his majesty to renew it.'

The French bishop was under the age of thirty, and his authority was imagined to have been but irreverently treated by two beautiful viragos in that civil war of words which was raging; one of whom, Madame St George, was in high favour, and most intolerably hated by the English.—Yet such was English gallantry, that the king presented this lady on her dismissal with several thousand pounds and jewels. There was something inconceivably ludicrous in the notions of the English, of a bishop hardly of age, and the gravity of whose character was probably tarnished by French gesture and vivacity. This French establishment was daily growing in expense and number; a manuscript letter of the times states that it cost the king 2400 a day, and had increased from three score persons to four hundred and forty, besides children!

It was one evening that the king suddenly appeared, and, summoning the French household, commanded them to take their instant departure—the carriages were prepared for their removal. In doing this, Charles had to resist the warmest intreaties, and even the vehement anger of the queen, who is said in her rage to have broken several panes of the window of the apartment, to which the king dragged her, and confined her from them.*

The scene which took place among the French people, at the sudden announcement of the king's determination, was remarkably indecorous. They instantly flew to take possession of all the queen's wardrobe and jewels; they did not leave her, it appears, a change of linen, since it was with difficulty she procured one as a favour, according to some manuscript letters of the times. One of their extraordinary expedients was that of inventing bills, for which they pretended they had engaged themselves on account of the queen, to the amount of 10,000*l*, which the queen at first owned to, but afterwards acknowledged the debts were fictitious ones. Among these items was one of 400*l* for necessaries for her majesty; an apothecary's bill for drugs of 800*l*; and another of 150*l* for 'the bishop's unholy water,' as the writer expresses it. The young French bishop attempted by all sorts of delays to avoid this ignominious expulsion; till the king was forced to send his yeomen of the guards to turn them out from Somerset house, where the juvenile French bishop at once protesting against it, and mounting the steps of the coach, took his departure 'head and shoulders.' It appears that to pay the debts and pensions, besides sending the French troops free home, cost 50,000*l*.

In a long procession of nearly forty coaches, after four days tedious travelling they reached Dover; but the spectacle of these impatient foreigners so reluctantly quitting England, gesticulating their sorrows or their quarrels, exposed them to the derision and stirred up the prejudices of the common people. As Madame George, whose vivacity is always described extravagantly French, was stepping into the boat, one of the mob could not resist the satisfaction of flinging a stone at her French cap; an English courtier, who was conducting her, instantly quitted his charge, ran the fellow through the body, and quietly returned to the boat. The man died on the spot; but no further notice appears to have been taken of the inconsistent gallantry of this English courtier.

But Charles did not show his kingly firmness only on this occasion: it did not forsake him when the French Marshal Bassompierre was instantly sent over to awe the king; Charles sternly offered the alternative of war, rather than permit a French faction to trouble an English court. Bassompierre makes a curious observation in a letter to the French Bishop of Mende, who had been just sent away from England; and which serves as the most positive evidence of the firm refusal of Charles I.—'The French marshal, after stating the total failure of his mission, exclaims, 'See, sir, to what we are reduced! and imagine my grief, that the Queen of Great Britain has the pain of viewing my departure without being of any service to her; but if you consider that I was sent here to make a contract of marriage observed, and to maintain the Catholic Religion in a country from which they formerly banished it to break a contract of marriage, you will assist in excusing me of this failure.' The French marshal has also preserved the same distinctive feature of the nation, as well as of the monarch, who, surely to his honour as King of England, felt and acted on this occasion as a true Briton. 'I have found,' says the Gaul, 'humility among Spaniards, civility and courtesy among the Swiss, in the embassies I had the honour to perform for the king; but the English would not in the least abate of their natural pride and arrogance. The king is so resolute not to re-establish any French about the queen, his consort, and was so stern (rude) in speaking to me, that it is impossible to have been more so. In a word, the French marshal, with all his vanes of his threats, discovered that Charles I was the true representative of his subjects, and that the king had the same feelings with the people: this indeed was not always the case! this transaction took place in 1625, and when, 60 years afterwards, it was attempted again to introduce certain French persons, a bishop and a physician, about the queen, the king absolutely refused even a French physician who had come over with the intention of being seen the queen's, under the sanction of the queen mother. This little circumstance appears in a manuscript letter from Lord Dorchester to Mr De Vic, one of the king's agents at Paris. After an account of the arrival of the French physician, his lordship proceeds to notice the former determination of the king: 'yet this man,' he adds, 'hath been addressed to the ambassador to introduce him into the court, and the queen persuaded in clear and plain terms to speak to the king to admit him as domestic. His majesty expressed his dislike at this proceeding, but contented himself to let the ambassador know that this doctor may return as hee will come, with intimations that he should do it speedily; the French ambassador willing to help the matter, spoke to the king that the doctor might be admitted to kiss the queen's hand, and to carry the news into France of her safe delivery; when the king excused by a civil answer, and has since commanded me to let the ambassador understand, that he had heard him as Monsieur de Fontenay in this particular, but if he should persist and press him as ambassador, he should be forced to say that which would displease him.' Lord Dorchester adds, that he informs Mr De Vic of these particulars, that he should not want for the information should the matter be revived by the French court, otherwise he need not notice it.*

By this narrative of secret history Charles I does not appear so weak a slave to his queen, as our writers tell from each other; and those who make Henrietta so important a personage in the cabinet, appear to have been imperfectly acquainted with their real talents. Charles indeed, was deeply enamoured of the queen, for he was inclined to strong personal attachments; and 'the temperance of his youth, by which he had lived so free from personal vice,' as May the parliamentary historian expresses it, even the gay levity of Buckingham seems never, in approaching the king, to have violated. Charles admired Henrietta all those personal graces which he himself wanted; her vivacity in conversation enlivened his own seriousness, and her gay volubility, the defective utterances of his own; while the versatility of her manners relieved his own formal habits. Doubtless the queen exercised the same power over this monarch which vivacious females are privileged by nature to possess over their husbands: she was often listened to, and her suggestions were sometimes approved: but the fixed and systematic principle of the character and the government of this monarch and not be imputed to the intrigues of a more lively and volatile woman; we must trace them to a higher source; to his own inherited conceptions of the regal rights, if we would seek for truth, and read the history of human nature in the history of Charles I.

THE MINISTER—THE CARDINAL DUKE OF RICHELIEU

Richelieu was the greatest of statesmen, if he who maintains himself by the greatest power is necessarily the greatest minister. He was called 'the King of the King.' After having long tormented himself and France he left a great name and a great empire—both alike the victims of splendid ambition! Neither this great minister, nor this great nation, tasted of happiness under his mighty administration. He had, indeed, a heartlessness in his conduct which obstructed by no relenting that remorseless decisions which made him terrible. But while he trode down the princes of the blood and the nobles and drove his patroness the queen mother, into a miserable exile, and contrived that the king should fear and hate his brother, and all the cardinal-duke chose, Richelieu was grinding the face of the poor by exorbitant taxation, and converted every town in France into a garrison; it was said of him, that he never liked to be in any place where he was not the strongest. 'The commissioners of the exchequer and the commanders of the army believe them was called to a golden harvest; and in the interim the cardinal is charged with the sins of all the world, and is now afraid of his life.* Thus Grotius speaks, in one of his letters, of the miserable situation of this great minister, in his account of the court of France in 1635, when he resided there as Swedish ambassador. Yet such is the delusion of these great politicians, who consider what they term state interests as paramount to all other duties, human or divine, that while their whole life is a series of oppression, of troubles, of deceit, and of cruelty, their state necessities finds nothing to reproach itself with. Of any other conscience, it seems absolutely necessary that they should be divested. Richelieu, on his death bed, made a solemn protestation, appealing to the last judge of man, he was about to pronounce his sentence, that he never supposed any thing but for the good of religion and the state; that is, the Catholic religion and his own administration. When Louis XIII., who visited him in his last moments, took from the hand of an attendant a plate with two yolks of eggs, that the King of France might himself see his expiring minister, Richelieu died in all the self-delusion of a great minister.

The sinister means he practised, and the political deceptions he contrived, do not yield in subtlety to the dark humour of his ministerial character. It appears that, at a critical moment, when he felt the king's favour was waning, he secretly ordered a battle to be lost by the French, to determine the king at once not to give up a minister he, he knew, was the only man who could extricate him out of this new difficulty. In our great civil war, this minister pretended to Charles I. that he was attempting to win the parliament over to him while he was backing their most secret projects against Charles. When a French ambassador addressed the parliament as an independent power, after the king had broken with it, Charles, deeply affected, remonstrated with the French court; the latter disavowed the whole proceeding, and instantly recalled the ambassador, while at the very moment his secret agents were to their best embroiling the affairs of both parties.* The object of Richelieu was to weaken the English monarchy, so as to busy itself at home, and divert its fleets and its armies thwarting his projects on the continent, lest England, jealous of the greatness of France, should declare itself for Spain the moment it had recovered its own tranquillity. This is a stratagem too common with great ministers, those plagues on the earth, he, with their state reasons, are for cutting as many heads as God pleases among every other nation.†

A fragment of the secret history of this great minister by gathered from that of some of his confidential agents. One exposes an invention of this minister's to strengthen his cabinet labours, and to have at hand a screen, but that useful contrivance was requisite; the other, the terrible effects of an agent setting up to be a politician on his own account, against that of his master's.

Richelieu's confessor was one Father Joseph; but this was designed to be employed rather in state affairs, than in those which concerned his conscience. This minister, who was never a penitent, could have none. Father Joseph had a turn for political negotiation, otherwise he had not been the cardinal's confessor; but this turn was that sort, said the Nuncio Spada, which was adapted to follow up to the utmost the views and notions of the minister, rather than to draw the cardinal to his, or to induce him to change a tittle of his designs. The truth is, that Father Joseph preferred going about in his chariot on ministerial missions, rather than walking solitary to his convent, after listening to the unmeaning confessions of Cardinal Richelieu. He made himself so intimately acquainted with the plans and will of this great minister, that he could venture, at a pinch, to act without orders; and foreign affairs were particularly consigned to his management. Grotius, when Swedish ambassador, knew them both. Father Joseph, he tells us, was employed by Cardinal Richelieu to open negotiations, and put them in a way to succeed to his mind, and then the cardinal would step in, and undertake the finishing himself. Joseph took business in hand when they were green, and, after ripening them, he handed them over to the cardinal. In a conference which Grotius, held with the parties, Joseph began the treaty, and bore the brunt of the first contest. After a warm debate the cardinal interposed as arbitrator: 'A middle way will reconcile you,' said the minister, 'and as you and Joseph can never agree, I now make you friends.'‡

That this was Richelieu's practice, appears from another similar personage mentioned by Grotius, but one more careless and less cunning. When the French ambassador, Leon Brulart, assisted by Joseph, concluded at Ratisbon a treaty with the Emperor's ambassador, on its arrival the cardinal unexpectedly disapproved of it, declaring that the ambassador had exceeded his instructions. But Brulart, who was an old statesman, and Joseph, to whom the cardinal confided his most secret views, it was not supposed could have committed such a gross error; and it was rather believed that the cardinal changed his opinions with the state of affairs, wishing for peace or war as they suited the French interests, or as he conceived they tended to render his administration necessary to the crown.† When Brulart, on his return from his embassy, found this outcry raised against him, and not a murmur against Joseph, he explained the mystery; the cardinal had raised this clamour against him merely to cover the instructions which he had himself given, and which Brulart was convinced he had received, through his organ Father Joseph: a man, said he, who has nothing of the Capuchin but the frock, and nothing of the Christian but the name: a mind so practised in artifices, that he could do nothing without deception; and during the whole of the Ratisbon negotiation, Brulart discovered that Joseph would never communicate to him any business till the whole was finally arranged: the sole object of his pursuits was to find means to gratify the cardinal. Such free sentiments nearly cost Brulart his head; for once in quitting the cardinal in warmth, the minister, following him to the door, and passing his hand over the other's neck, observed that, 'Brulart was a fine man, and it would be a pity to divide the head from the body.'

One more anecdote of this good Father Joseph, the favourite instrument of the most important and covert designs of this minister, has been preserved in the Mémoires Recueillies of Vittorio Siri,‡ an Italian Abbé, the Procopius of France, but afterwards pensioned by Mazarine. Richelieu had in vain tried to gain over Colonel Ornano, a man of talents, the governor of Monsieur, the only brother of Louis XIII.; not accustomed to have his offers refused, he resolved to ruin him. Joseph was now employed to contract a particular friendship with Ornano, and to suggest to him, that it was full time that his pupil should be admitted into the council, to acquire some political knowledge. The advancement of Ornano's royal pupil was his own; and as the king had no children, the crown might descend to Monsieur. Ornano therefore took the first opportunity to open himself to the king, on the propriety of initiating his brother into affairs, either in council, or by a command of the army. This the king, as usual, immediately communicated to the Cardinal, who was well prepared to give the request the most odious turn, and to alarm his majesty with the character of Ornano, who, he said was inspiring the young prince with ambitious thoughts, that the next step would be an attempt to share the crown

There seems to have discovered in Estrades' Mémoires, the occasion of Richelieu's conduct. In 1639, the French and English proposed dividing the low-country provinces; England to stand neuter. Charles replied to D'Estrades, that his fleet and fleet should instantly sail to prevent these projected peace. From that moment the intolerant ambition of Richelieu swelled the venom of his heart, and he eagerly seized on that opportunity of supplying the Covenanters in Scotland arms and money. Hume observes, that Charles here showed his mind with an imprudent candour; but it proved and acquired a just idea of national interest. VI. 337. See also a very curious passage in the Catholic Dodd's Church History, II. 22. He apologizes for his cardinal by asserting the same line of policy was pursued here in England 'by me myself, who sent fleets and armies to assist the Hugonots, or French rebels, as he calls them; and that this was constant practice of Queen Elizabeth's ministry, to foment wars in several neighbouring kingdoms, and support rebellious subjects, as the forces she employed for that she both in France, Flanders, and Scotland, are an undoubted proof.' The recriminations of politicians are the constant of great sinners.

itself with his majesty. The cardinal foresaw how much Monsieur would be offended by the refusal, and would not fail to betray his impatience, and inflame the jealousy of the king. Yet Richelieu bore still an open face and friendly voice for Ornano, whom he was every day undermining in the king's favour, till all terminated in a pretended conspiracy, and Ornano perished in the Bastille, of a fever, at least caught there. So much for the friendship of Father Joseph! And by such men and such means, the astute minister secretly threw a seed of perpetual hatred between the royal brothers, producing conspiracies, often closing in blood, which only his own haughty tyranny had provoked.

Father Joseph died regretted by Richelieu; he was an ingenious sort of a creature, and kept his carriage to his last day, but his name is only preserved in secret histories. The fate of Father Causin, the author of the 'Cours Sainte,' a popular book among the Catholics for its curious religious stories, and whose name is better known than Father Joseph's, shows how this minister could rid himself of father-confessors who persisted, according to their own notions, to be honest men in spite of the minister. This piece of secret history is drawn from a manuscript narrative which Causin left addressed to the general of the Jesuits.*

Richelieu chose Father Causin for the king's confessor, and he had scarcely entered his office, when the cardinal informed him of the king's romantic friendship for Made-moiselle La Fayette, of whom the cardinal was extremely jealous. Desirous of getting rid altogether of this sort of tender connexion, he hinted to the new confessor that, however innocent it might be, it was attended with perpetual danger, which the lady herself acknowledged, and, 'warm with all the motions of grace,' had declared her intention to turn 'Religieuse;' and that Causin ought to dispose of the king's mind to see the wisdom of the resolution. It happened, however, that Causin considered that this lady, whose zeal for the happiness of the people was well known, might prove more serviceable at court than in a cloister, so that the good father was very inactive in the business, and the minister began to suspect that he had in hand an instrument not at all fitted to it as Father Joseph.

'The motions of grace' were however, more active than the confessor, and mademoiselle retired to a monastery. Richelieu learned that the king had paid her a visit of three hours, and he accused Causin of encouraging these secret interviews. This was not denied, but it was adroitly insinuated, that it was prudent not abruptly to oppose the violence of the king's passion, which seemed reasonable to the minister. The king continued these visits, and the lady, in concert with Causin, impressed on the king the most unfavourable sentiments of the minister, the tyranny exercised over the exiled queen-mother, and the princes of the blood;† the grinding taxes he levied on the people, his projects of alliance with the Turk against the Christian sovereigns, &c. His majesty sighed; he asked Causin if he could name any one capable of occupying the minister's place? Our simple politician had not taken such a consideration in his mind. The king asked Causin whether he would meet Richelieu face to face? The Jesuit was again embarrassed, but summoned up the resolution with equal courage and simplicity.

Causin went for the purpose: he found the king closeted with the minister; the conference was long, from which Causin argued ill. He himself tells us, that weary of waiting in the ante-chamber, he contrived to be admitted into the presence of the king, when he performed his promise. But the case was altered! Causin had lost his cause before he pleaded it, and Richelieu had completely justified himself to the king. The good father was told that the king would not perform his devotions that day, and that he might return to Paris. The next morning the whole affair was cleared up. An order from court put this voluble Jesuit either from speaking or writing any person; and farther drove him away in an inclement winter, sick in body and at heart, till he found himself exiled on the barren rocks of Quimper in Brittany, w among the savage inhabitants, he was continually men by a prison or a gallows, which the terrific minister took opportunity to place before his imagination; and occas ally despatched a Paris Gazette, which distilled the ve of Richelieu's heart, and which, like the eagle of Pre theus, could gnaw at the heart of the insulated politi chained to his rock.*

Such were the contrasted fates of Father Joseph and Father Causin! the one the ingenious creature, the o the simple oppositivist, of this great minister.

THE MINISTER—DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM, LORD AS RAL, LORD GENERAL, &c. &c. &c.

'Had the Duke of Buckingham been blessed wi faithful friend, qualified with wisdom and integrity, duke would have committed as few faults, and done transcendent worthy actions, as any man in that ag Europe.' Such was the opinion of Lord Clarendon the prime of life, when yet untouched by party feeling had no cause to plead, and no quarrel with truth.†

The portrait of Buckingham by Hume seems to character dove-tailed into a system, adjusted to his pl lightning the errors of Charles I, by participating i among others. This character conceals the more fav able parts of no ordinary man: the spirit which was fi to lead others by its own invincibility, and some quali he possessed of a better nature. All the fascination of character is lost in the general shade cast over it by niggardly commendation, that 'he possessed some ac plishments of a courtier.' Some, indeed, and the s pleasing; but not all truly, for dissimulation and hypoc were arts unpractised by this courtier. 'His sweet attractive manner, so favoured by the graces,' has b described by Sir Henry Wotton, who knew him w while Clarendon, another living witness, tells us, 'He was the most rarely accomplished the court had e beheld; while some that found inconvenience in hi w ness, intending by some affront to discountenance h perceived he had masked under this gentleness a terri courage, as could safely protect all his sweetnesses.'

The very errors and infirmities of Buckingham seem have started from qualities of a generous nature; too voted a friend, and too undistinguished an enemy, carrying loves and his hatreds on his open forehead;‡ too car of calumny,§ and too fearless of danger; he was, i

‡ The singular openness of his character was not state like. He was one of those whose ungovernable sincerity d not put all their passions in their pockets.' He told the Duke Olivarez, on quitting Spain, that 'he would always ment the friendship between the two nations, but with reg to you, sir, in particular, you must not consider me a friend, but must ever expect from me all possible enmity opposition.' The cardinal was willing enough, says he 'to accept what was proffered, and on these terms the tw hes parted.' Buckingham, desirous of accommodating parties in the nation, once tried at the favour of the par party, whose head was Dr Preston, master of Emanuel lege. The duke was his generous patron, and Dr P his most servile adulator. The most zealous puritan offended at this intimacy; and Dr Preston, in a letter to of his party, observed, that it was true that the duke v vile and profligate fellow, but that there was no othe come at him but by the lowest flattery; that it was nec for the glory of God that such instruments should be m of; and more in this strain. Some officious hand coo this letter to the duke, who, when Dr Preston came on ing, as usual, asked him whether he had ever disoblige that he should describe him to his party in such black tere. The doctor, amazed, denied the fact; on which the instantly produced the letter, then turned from him, o see him more. It is said that from this moment he aban the puritan party, and attached himself to Laud. This was told by Thomas Baker to W. Wotton, as coming fr well verified in the secret history of that time. § A well-known tract against the Duke of Buckingham

* It is quoted in the 'Remarques Critiques sur le Dictionnaire de Bayle,' Paris 1748. This anonymous folio volume was written by Le Sieur Joly, a canon of Dijon, and is full of curious researches, and many authentic discoveries. The writer is no philosopher, but he corrects and adds to the knowledge of Bayle. Here I found some original anecdotes of Hobby, from MS. sources, during that philosopher's residence at Paris, which I have given in 'Quarrels of Authors.'

† Montresor, attached to the Duke of Orleans, has left us some very curious memoirs, in two small volumes; the second preserving many historical documents of that active period. This spirited writer has not hesitated to detail his projects for the assassination of the tyrannical minister.

word, a man of sensation, acting from impulse; scorning, indeed, prudential views, but capable at all times of embracing grand and original ones; compared by the jealousy of faction to the Spenser of Edward II and even the Seneca of Tiberius; he was no enemy to the people; often serious in the best designs, but volatile in the midst; his great error sprung from a sanguine spirit. 'He was ever,' says Wotton, 'greedy of honour and hot upon the public mass, but too confident in the prosperity of beginnings.' If Buckingham was a hero, and yet neither general nor admiral; a minister, and yet no statesman; if often the creature of popular admiration, he was at length hated by the people; if long envied by his equals, and betrayed by his own creatures,* 'delighting too much in the press and attendance of dependents and suitors, who are always burrs and sometimes the briars of favourites,' as Wotton well describes them; if one of his great crimes in the eyes of the people was, that 'his enterprises succeeded not according to their impossible expectation,' and that it was still greater, that Buckingham had been the permanent associate of two monarchs, who had spoilt their child of fortune; then may the future inquirer find something of his character which remains to be opened; to instruct alike the sovereign and the people, and 'be worthy to be registered among the great examples of time and fortune.'

Contrast the fate of Buckingham with that of his great rival, Richelieu. The one winning popularity and losing it; once in the Commons saluted as 'their redeemer,' till, at length, they resolved that 'Buckingham was the cause of all the evils and dangers to the king and kingdom.' Magnificent, open, and merciful; so forbearing, even in his acts of gentle oppression, that they were easily evaded; and riots and libels were infecting the country, till, in the popular clamour, Buckingham was made a political monster, and the dagger was planted in the heart of the incautious minister. The other statesman, unrelenting in his power, and grinding in his oppression, unblest with one mother-fooling, had his dungeons filled and his scaffolds raised, and died in safety and glory—a cautious tyrant!

There exists a manuscript memoir of Sir Balthazar Barber, who was one of those ingenious men whom Buckingham delighted to assemble about him; for this was one of his characteristics, that although the duke himself was not learned, yet he never wanted for knowledge; so early in life a practical man, he had not the leisure to become a contemplative one; he supplied this deficiency by perpetually 'sifting and questioning well' the most eminent George Eglisham, physician to James I, entitled 'The forerunner of Revenge,' may be found in many of our collections. Gerbier, in his manuscript memoirs, gives a curious account of this political libeller, the model of that class of dangerous scribblers. 'The falseness of his libels,' says Gerbier, 'he hath since acknowledged, though too late.' During my residency at Bruxelles, this Englishman desired Sir William Balconer, who then was at Liege, to bear a letter to me, which I still extant: he proposed, if the king would pardon and release him into favour again, with some competent subsistence, that he would recant all that he had said or written, to the disadvantage of any in the court of England, confessing that he had been used thereto by some combustion spirits, that their malicious designs had set him on work.' Buckingham would never notice these and similar libels. Eglisham flew to Holland after he had deposited his political venom in his native country, and found a fate which every villainous factionist has offered to recant for 'a competent subsistence' does not always; he was found dead, assassinated in his walks by a assassin. Yet this political libel, with many like it, are in the hands of the authorities. 'George, Duke of Buckingham,' says Oldys, 'will not speedily outstrip Dr Eglisham's Fore-runner of Revenge.'

* The misery of prime ministers and favourites is a portion of their fate, which has not always been noticed by their biographers: one must be conversant with secret history, to discover the thorn in their pillow. Who could have imagined that Buckingham, possessing the entire affections of his sovereign, during his absence had reason to fear being supplanted? As his confidential secretary, Dr Mason, slept in the same chamber with the duke, he would give way at night to those unexpressed passions which his unaltered countenance cooled by day. In the absence of all other ears and eyes, he would break out into the most querulous and impassioned language, declaring, that 'never his despatches to divers princes, the great business of a fleet, of an army, of a siege, of a day, of war and peace both on foot together, and all of them on his head at a time, did not so much break his repose, as that some at home under his majesty, of whom he had so deserved, were now content to forget him.' So short-lived is the gratitude observed to an absent favourite, who is so likely to fall by the creatures his own hands have made.

nent for their experience and knowledge; and Lord Bacon, and the Lord Keeper Williams, as well as such as Gerbier, were admitted into this sort of intimacy. We have a curious letter by Lord Bacon, of advice to our minister, written at his own request; and I have seen a large correspondence with that subtle politician, the Lord Keeper Williams, who afterwards attempted to supplant him, to the same purpose. Gerbier was the painter and architect, and at the same time one of the confidential agents of Buckingham; the friend of Reubens the painter, with whom he was concerned in this country to open a Spanish negotiation, and became at length the master of the ceremonies to Charles II, in his exile. He was an actor in many scenes. Gerbier says of himself, that 'he was a minister who had the honour of public employment, and may therefore incur censure for declaring some passages of state more overtly than becomes such an one, but secrets are secrets but for a time; others may be wiser for them selves, but it is their silence which makes me write.'*

A mystery has always hung over that piece of knavery, the romantic journey to Madrid, where the prime minister and the heir-apparent, in disguise, confided their safety in the hands of our national enemies; which excited such popular clamour, and indeed anxiety for the prince and the protestant cause. A new light is cast over this extraordinary transaction, by a secret which the duke imparted to Gerbier. The project was Buckingham's; a bright original view, but taken far out of the line of precedence. It was one of those bold inventions which no common mind could have conceived, and none but the spirit of Buckingham could have carried on with a splendour and mastery over the persons and events, which turned out, however, as unfavourable as possible.

The restoration of the imprudent Palatine, the son-in-law of James I, to the Palatinate which that prince had lost by his own indiscretion, when he accepted the crown of Bohemia, although warned of his own incompetency, as well as of the incapacity of those princes of the empire, who might have assisted him against the power of Austria and Spain, seemed however to a great part of our nation necessary to the stability of the protestant interests.—James I, was most bitterly run down at home for his civil pacific measures, but the truth is, by Gerbier's account, that James could not depend on one single ally, who had all taken fright, although some of the Germans were willing enough to be subsidized at 30,000 a month from England; which James had not to give, and which he had been a fool had he given; for though this war for the protestant interests was popular in England, it was by no means general among the German princes: the Prince Elector of Treves, and another prince, treated Gerbier coolly; and observed, that 'God in these days did not send prophets more to the protestants than to others, to fight against nations, and to second pretences which public incendiaries propose to princes, to engage them into unnecessary wars with their neighbours.' France would not go to war, and much less the Danes, the Swedes, and the Hollanders. James was calumniated for his timidity and cowardice; yet, says Gerbier, King James merited much of his people, though ill requited, choosing rather to suffer an eclipse of his personal reputation, than to bring into such hazard the reputation and force of his kingdoms in a war of no hopes.

As a father and a king, from private and from public motives, the restoration of the Palatinate had a double tie on James, and it was always the earnest object of his negotiations. But Spain sent him an amusing and literary ambassador, who kept him in play year after year, with merry tales and bon mots.† Those negotiations had languished through all the tedium of diplomacy; the amusing promises of the courtly Gondomar were sure, on return of the courier, to bring sudden difficulties from the subtle Olivarez. Buckingham meditated by a single blow to

* Sloane MSS, 4181.

† Gerbier gives a curious specimen of Gondomar's pleasant sort of impudence. When James expressed himself with great warmth on the Spaniards under Spínola, taking the first town in the Palatinate, under the eyes of our ambassador, Gondomar, with Corvantic humour, attempted to give a new turn to the discussion; for he wished that Spínola had taken the whole Palatinate at once, for 'then the generosity of my master would be shown in all its lustre, by restoring it all again to the English ambassador, who had witnessed the whole operations.' James, however, at this moment was no longer pleased with the inexhaustible humour of his old friend, and set about trying what could be done strike at the true secret, whether the Spanish court could be induced to hasten this important object, gained over by the proffered alliance with the English crown, from the lips of the prince himself. The whole scene dazzled with politics, chivalry, and magnificence; it was caught by the high spirit of the youthful prince, whom Clarendon tells us 'loved adventures,' and it was indeed an incident which has adorned more than one Spanish romance. The panic which seized the English, fearful of the personal safety of the prince, did not prevail with the duke, who told Gerbier that the prince run no hazard from the Spaniard, who well knew that while his sister, the fugitive Queen of Bohemia, with a numerous issue, was residing in Holland, the protestant succession to our crown was perfectly secured; and it was with this conviction, says Gerbier, that when the Count Duke Olivarez had been persuaded that the Prince of Wales was meditating a flight from Spain, that Buckingham with his accustomed spirit told him, that 'if love had made the prince steal out of his own country, yet fear would never make him run out of Spain, and that he should depart with an equipage as fitted a Prince of Wales.' This was no empty vaunt. An English fleet was then waiting in a Spanish port, and the Spanish court inviting our prince to the grand Escorial, attended the departure of Charles, as Hume expresses it with 'elaborate pomp.'

This attempt of Buckingham, of which the origin has been so often inquired into, and so oppositely viewed, entirely failed with the Spaniard. The catholic league outweighed the protestant. At first the Spanish court had been as much taken by surprise as the rest of the world; all parties seemed at their first interview highly gratified. 'We may rule the world together,' said the Spanish to the English minister. They were, however, not made by nature, or state interests, to agree at a second interview. The Lord Keeper Williams, a wily courtier and subtle politician, who, in the absence of his patron, Buckingham, evidently supplanted him in the favour of his royal master, when asked by James, 'Whether he thought this knight-errant pilgrimage would be likely to win the Spanish lady; answered with much political foresight, and saw the difficulty: 'If my lord marquis will give honour to the Count Duke Olivarez, and remember he is the favourite of Spain; or, if Olivarez will show honourable civility to my lord marquis, remembering he is the favourite of England, the wooing may be prosperous; but if my lord marquis should forget where he is, and not stoop to Olivarez; or if Olivarez, forgetting what guest he hath received with the prince, bear himself like a Castilian grandee to my lord marquis, the provocation may cross your majesty's good intentions.* What Olivarez once let out, 'though somewhat in hot blood, that in the councils of the king the English match had never been taken into consideration, but from the time of the Prince of Wales's arrival at Madrid,' might have been true enough. The seven years which had passed in apparent negotiation resembled the scene of a fata morgana; an earth painted in the air—raised by the delusive arts of Gondomar and Olivarez. As they never designed to realise it, it would of course never have been brought into the councils of his Spanish majesty. Buckingham discovered, as he told Gerbier, that the Infanta by the will of her father, Philip III, was designed for the emperor's son; the catholic for the catholic, to cement the venerable system. When Buckingham and Charles had now ascertained that the Spanish cabinet could not adopt English and protestant interests, and Olivarez had convinced himself that Charles would never be a catholic, all was broken up; and thus a treaty of marriage, which had been slowly reared, during a period of seven years, when the flower seemed to take, only contained within itself the seeds of war.†

Olivarez and Richelieu were thorough-paced statesmen, in every respect the opposites of the elegant, the spirited, and the open Buckingham. The English favourite checked

† The narrative furnished by Buckingham, and vouched by the prince to the parliament, agrees in the main with what the duke told Gerbier. It is curious to observe how the narrative seems to have perplexed Hume, who, from some preconceived system, condemns Buckingham, 'for the falsity of this long narrative, as calculated entirely to mislead the parliament.' He has, however, in the note [T] of this very volume, sufficiently marked the difficulties which hung about the opinion he has given in the text. The curious may find the narrative in Frankland's Annals, p. 69, and in Rushworth's Hist. Coll. t. 119. It has many entertaining particulars.

the haughty Castilian, the favourite of Spain, and the more than king-like cardinal, the favourite of France, with the equal spirit of his Island, proud of her equality with the continent.

There is a story that the war between England and France was occasioned by the personal disrespect shown by the Cardinal Duke Richelieu to the English duke, the affronting mode of addressing his letters. Gerbier of the world are in a ridiculous mistake about this circumstance. The fact of the letters is true, since Gerbier himself the secretary on this occasion. It terminates however differently than is known. Richelieu, at least haughty as Buckingham, addressed a letter, in a moment of caprice, in which the word Monsieur was level with first line, avoiding the usual space of honour, to mark disrespect. Buckingham instantly turned on the cardinal his own invention. Gerbier, who had written the letter was also its bearer. The cardinal started at the first, never having been addressed with such familiarity, and was silent. On the following day, however, the cardinal received Gerbier civilly, and, with many rhetorical expressions respecting the duke, 'I know,' said he, 'the power and greatness of a high admiral of England; the command of his great ships make way, and prescribe law more fully than the canons of the church, of which I am a member. I acknowledge the power of the favourites of kings, and I am content to be a minister of state, and the duke's humble servant.' This was an apology made to all the politesses of a Gaul, and by a great statesman who had recovered his senses.

If ever minister of state was threatened by the prospect of a fatal termination to his life, it was Buckingham, but his own fearlessness disdained to interpret them. The following circumstances, collected from manuscript letters of the times, are of this nature. After the sudden and unhappy dissolution of the parliament, popular terror showed itself in all shapes; and those who did not join in the popular terror showed itself in all shapes; and those who did not join in the popular cry were branded with the odious nickname of the ducklins.

A short time before the assassination of Buckingham when the king, after an obstinate resistance, had conceded his assent to the 'Petition of Right,' the houses testified their satisfaction, perhaps their triumph, by their shouts of acclamation. They were propagated by the bearers of the outside, from one to the other till they reached the city, some confused account arrived before the occasion of the rejoicings was generally known: suddenly the bells began to ring, bonfires were kindled, and in an instant all was scene of public rejoicing. But ominous indeed were these rejoicings, for the greater part was occasioned by a false rumour that the duke was to be sent to the Tower; no one inquired about a news which every one wished to hear, and so sudden was the joy, that a mass letter signed, 'I hold scaffold on tower-hill was pulled down and burned to certain unhappy boys, who said they would have a new one built for the duke.' This mistake so rapidly prevailed, as to reach even the country, which blazed with bonfires to announce the fall of Buckingham.* The shouts on the acquittal of the seven bishops, in 1688, did not speak in plainer language to the son's ear, when after the verdict was given, such prodigious acclamations of joy, seemed to set the king's authority at defiance: it spread itself not only into the city, but even to Hounslow Heath, where the soldiers upon the news of it gave up a great shout, though the king was then actually at dinner in the camp. To the speculators of human nature, who find its history written in their libraries, how many plain lessons seem to have been lost on the mere politician, who is only such as the heat of action.

About a month before the duke was assassinated, occurred the murder by the populace of the man who was called 'The duke's devil.' This was a Dr Lambe, a man of infamous character; a dealer in magical arts, who lived by showing apparitions or selling the favours of the devil, and whose chambers were a convenient rendezvous for the curious of both sexes. This wretched man, who openly consulted in the infamous traffic by which he lived, when he was sober, prophesied that he should fall one day by the hands from which he received his death; and it was said he was as positive about his patron's. At the age of eighty, he was torn to pieces in the city, and the city was imprudently heavily fined 8000*l.* for not delivering up those who, in murdering this hoary culprit, were heard to say that they would handle his master worse, and would have minced his flesh, and have had every one a bit of him. This is one more instance of the political cannibalism of the mob. The fate of Dr Lambé served for a ballad, and the printer and singer were laid in Newgate.* Buckingham, it seems, for a moment contemplated his own fate in his wretched creature's, more particularly as another omen crowded itself on his attention; for on the very day of Dr Lambé's murder, his own portrait in the council-chamber was seen to have fallen out of its frame; a circumstance as awful in that age of omens, as the portrait that walked from its frame in the 'Castle of Otranto,' but perhaps more easily accounted for. On the eventful day of Dr Lambé's being torn to pieces by the mob, a circumstance occurred to Buckingham, somewhat remarkable to show the spirit of the times. The king and the duke were in the Spring-gardens looking on the bowlers; the duke put on his hat. One Wilson a Scotchman, first kissing the duke's hands, snatched it off, saying, 'Off with your hat before the king.' Buckingham, not apt to restrain his quick feelings, kicked the Scotchman, but the king interposing, said 'Let him alone, George; he is either mad or a fool.' 'No, Sir,' replied the Scotchman, 'I am a sober man, and if your majesty would give me leave, I will tell you that of this man which many know, and none dare speak.' This was as a prognostic, an anticipation of the dagger of Felton!

About this time a libel was taken down from a post in Coleman-street by a constable and carried to the lord-mayor, who ordered it to be delivered to none but his majesty. Of this libel the manuscript letter contains the following particulars:

And on the assassination of the duke, I find two lines in a MS. letter:

The shepherd's struck, the sheep are fled!
For want of Lamb the wolf is dead!

There is a scarce tract of 'A brief description of the notorious life of John Lambé, otherwise called Doctor Lambé,' &c, with a curious wood print of the mob pelting him in the street.

'Who rules the kingdom? The king
Who rules the king? The duke.
Who rules the duke? The devil.

Let the duke look to it; for they intend shortly to use him more than they did the doctor; and if things be not shortly reformed, they will work a reformation themselves.'

The only advice the offended king suggested was to set double watch every night! A watch at a post to prevent a libel being affixed to it was no prevention of libels being written, and the fact is, libels were now bundled and sent to fairs, to be read by those who would venture to read, to those who would venture to listen; both parties were often sent to prison. It was about this time, after the sudden dissolution of the parliament, that popular terror showed itself in various shapes, and the spirit which broke out in libels by night was assuredly the same, which, if these political prognostics had been rightly construed by Charles, might have saved the eventual scene of blood. But neither the king nor his favourite had yet been taught to respect popular feelings. Buckingham, for all, was guilty of no heavy political crimes; but it was his misfortune to have been a prime minister, as Clarendon says, in 'a busy, querulous, froward time, when the people were uneasy under pretences of reformation, with some petulant discourses of liberty, which their great impostors scattered among them like glasses to multiply their pain.' It was an age, which was preparing for a great contest, where both parties committed great faults. The court did not appear odious in the eyes of the king, he knew his better dispositions more intimately than the popular party, who were crying him down. And Charles attributed to individuals, and 'the great impostors,' the rumours which had been raised.

But the plurality of offices showered on Buckingham rendered him still more odious to the people: had he not created lord high admiral and general, he had never had his character amidst the opposing elements, or before impregnable forts. But something more than his own towering spirit, or the temerity of vanity, must be alleged for his assumption of those opposite military characters.*

A peace of twenty years appears to have rusted the arms of our soldiers, and their commanders were destitute of military skill. The war with Spain was clamoured for; and an expedition to Cadix, in which the duke was reproached by the people for not taking the command, as they supposed from deficient spirit, only ended in our undisciplined soldiers under bad commanders getting drunk in the Spanish cellars, inasmuch that not all had the power to run away. On this expedition, some verses were handed about, which probably are now first printed, from a manuscript letter of the times; a political pasquinade which shows the utter silliness of this, 'Ridiculus Mus.'

VERSES ON THE EXPEDITION TO CADIZ.

There was a crow sat on a stone,
He flew away—and there was none!
There was a man that run a race,
When he ran fast—he ran apace!
There was a maid that eat an apple
When she ate two—she ate a couple!
There was an ape sat on a tree,
When he fell down—then down fell he
There was a fleet that went to Spain,
When it returned—it came again!

Another expedition to Rochelle, under the Earl of Denbigh, was indeed of a more sober nature, for the earl declined to attack the enemy. The national honour, among the other grievances of the people, had been long degraded; not indeed by Buckingham himself, who personally had ever maintained, by his high spirit, an equality, if not a superiority, with France and Spain. It was to win back the public favour by a resolved and public effort, that Buckingham a second time was willing to pledge his fortune, his honour, and his life, into one daring cast, and on the dyke of Rochelle to leave his body, or to vindicate his aspersed name. The garrulous Gerbier shall tell his own story, which I transcribe from his own hand-writing, of the mighty preparations, and the duke's perfect devotion to the cause, for among other rumours, he was calumniated as ever having been faithful to his engagements with the Protestants of Rochelle.

'The duke caused me to make certain works, according to the same model as those wherewith the Prince of Parma blew up, before Antwerp, the main dyke and estacado; they were so mighty strong, and of that quantity of powder, and so closely masoned in barks, that they might have blown up the half of a town. I employed therein of powder, stone-quarries, bombs, fire-balls, chains and iron balls, a double proportion to that used by the Duke of Parma, according to the description left thereof.'

'The duke's intention to succour the Rochellers was manifest, as was his care to assure them of it. He commanded me to write and convey to them the secret advertisement thereof. The last advice I gave them from him contained these words, 'Hold out but three weeks, and God willing I will be with you, either to overcome or to die there.' The bearer of this received from my hands a hundred Jacobuses to carry it with speed and safety. The duke had disbursed three-score thousand pounds of his money upon the fleet; and lost his life ere he could get aboard. Nothing but death had hindered him or frustrated his design, of which I am confident by another very remarkable passage. 'The duke, a little before his departure from York-house, being alone with me in his garden, and giving me his last commands for my journey towards Italy and Spain, one Mr. Wignmore, a gentleman of his, coming to us, presented to his lordship a paper, said to come from the prophesying Lady Dovers; foretelling, that he should end his life that month; besides he had received a letter from a very considerable hand, persuading him to let some other person be sent on that expedition to command in his place; on which occasion the duke made this expression to me: "Gerbiere, If God please I will go, and be the first man who shall set his foot upon the dyke before Rochel to die, or do the work, whereby the world shall see the reality of our intentions for the relief of that place." He had before told me the same in his closet, after he had signed certain despatches of my letters of credence to the Duke of Lorraine and Savoy, to whom I was sent to know what diversion they could make in favour of the king, in case the peace with Spain should not take. His majesty spoke to me, on my going towards my residency at Bruxelles, "Gerbiere, I do command thee to have a continual care, to press the Infanta and the Spanish ministers there, for the restitution of the Palatinate; for I am obliged in conscience, in honour, and in maxim of state, to stir all the powers of the world, rather than to fail to try to the uttermost to compass this business."

In the week of that expedition, the king took 'George' with him in his coach to view the ships at Deptford on their departure for Rochelle, when he said to the duke 'George, there are some that wish that both these and thou mightest perish together; but care not for them; we will both perish together, if thou doest!'

A few days before the duke went on his last expedition, he gave a farewell mask and supper at Yorkhouse, to their majesties. In the mask the duke appeared followed by Envy with many open mouthed dogs, which were to represent the barkings of the people, while next came Fame and Truth; and the court allegory expressed the king's sentiment and the duke's sanguine hope.

Thus resolutely engaged in the very cause the people had so much at heart, the blood Buckingham would have sealed it with was shed by one of the people themselves; the enterprise, designed to retrieve the national honour, long tarnished, was prevented; and the Protestant cause suffered, by one who imagined himself to be, and was blest by nearly the whole nation, as a patriot! Such are the effects of the exaggerations of popular delusion.

I find the following epitaph on Buckingham, in a manuscript letter of the times. Its condensed bitterness of spirit gives the popular idea of his unfortunate attempts.

THE DUKE'S EPIGRAM.

If idle travellers ask who lieth here,
Let the duke's tomb this for inscription bear;
Paint Cales and Rhé, make French and Spanish laugh;
Mix England's shame—and there's his epitaph!

Before his last fatal expedition, among the many libels which abounded, I have discovered a manuscript satire, entitled 'Rhodomontados.' The thoughtless minister is made to exult in his power over the giddy-headed multitude. Buckingham speaks in his own person; and we have here preserved those false rumours, and those aggravated feelings, then floating among the people: a curious instance of those heaped up calumnies, which are often so heavily laid on the head of a prime minister, no favourite with the people.

'Tis not your threats shall take me from the king!

Nor questioning my counsels and commands,
How with the honour of the state it stands;
That I lost Rhé, and with such loss of men,
As scarcely time can e'er repair again;
Shall aught affright me; or else care to see
The narrow seas from Dunkirk clear and free,
Or that you can enforce the king to believe,
I from the pirates a third share receive;
Or that I correspond with foreign states
(Whether the king's foes or confederates)
To plot the ruin of the king and state;
As erst you thought of the Palatinate;
Or that five hundred thousand pound doth lie
In the Venice bank to help Spain's majesty;
Or that three hundred thousand more doth rest
In Dunkirk, for the arch-duchess to contest
With England, whenever occasion offers;
Or that by rapine I will fill my coffers;
Nor that an office in church, state, and court,
Is freely given, but they must pay me for't.
Nor shall you ever prove I had a hand
In poisoning of the monarch of this land:
Or the like hand by poisoning to intox
Southampton, Oxford, Hamilton, Lennox.

and a supposed propheteess. This Cassandra hit the time in her dark predictions, and was more persuaded than ever that she was a propheteess.

Nor shall you ever prove by magic charms,
I wrought the king's affection or his harms.
Nor fear I if ten Virgins now were here,
Since I have thrice ten Raviliacs as near.
My power shall be unbounded in each thing,
If once I use these words, 'I and my king.'

Beem wise, and cease then to perturb the realm
Or strive with him that sits and guides the helm.
I know your reading will inform you soon,
What creatures they were that barked against the moon.
I'll give you better counsel as a friend:
Cobblers their lachets ought not to transcend,
Meddle with common matters, common wrongs,
To the house of commons common things belong.
Leave him the oar that best knows how to row,
And state to him that best the state doth know.
If I by industry, deep reach, or grace,
Am now arriv'd at this or that great place,
Must I, to please your inconsiderate rage,
Throw down mine honour? Will naught else manage
Your furious wisdoms? True shall the verse be yet, There's no less wit required to keep, than get.
Though Lamb be dead, I'll stand, and you shall see
I'll smile at them that can but bark at me.

After Buckingham's death, Charles I. cherished his memory warmly as his life, advanced his friends, and designed to raise a magnificent monument to his memory; and any one accused the duke, the king always imputed the fault to himself. The king said, 'Let not the duke's enemies seek to catch at any of his offences, for they will find themselves deceived.' Charles called Buckingham 'his martyr!' and often said the world was much mistaken in the duke's character; for it was commonly thought the duke ruled his majesty; but it was much the contrary, having been his most faithful and obedient servant in all things, as the king said he would make sensibly appear to the world. Indeed after the death of Buckingham, Charles showed himself extremely active in business. Lord Deane wrote—'The death of Buckingham causes no changes; the king holds in his own hands the total direction, leaving the executive part to every man within the compass of his charge.* This is one proof, among many, that Charles I. was not the puppet-king of Buckingham, as modern historians have imagined.

FELTON THE POLITICAL ASSASSIN.

Felton, the assassin of the Duke of Buckingham, by the growing republican party, was hailed as a Brutus, rising in the style of a patriotic bard,

'Refugent from the stroke.'

AKENSIDE

Gibbon has thrown a shade of suspicion even over Brutus's 'God-like stroke,' as Pope has exulted it. In Felton, a man acting from mixed and confused motives, that political martyr is entirely lost in the contrite penitent; he was, however, considered in his own day as a being almost beyond humanity. Mrs Macanlay has called him 'a lunatic,' because the duke had not been assassinated on the right principle. His motives appeared inconceivable to his contemporaries; for Sir Henry Wotton, who has written a life of the Duke of Buckingham observed, that 'what may have been the immediate or greatest motive of that felonious conception (the duke's assassination), is even yet in the clouds.' After ascertaining that it was not private revenge, he seems to conclude that it was Dr Eggesheim's furious 'libel,' and the 'remonstrance' of the parliament, which, having made the duke 'one of the foulest monsters upon earth,' worked on the dark imagination of Felton.

From Felton's memorable example, and some similar ones, one observation occurs worth the notice of every minister of state who dares the popular odium he has raised. Such a minister will always be in present danger of a violent termination to his career; for however he may be convinced that there is not political virtue enough in a whole people to afford 'the God-like stroke,' he will always have to dread the arm of some melancholy enthusiast, whose mind, secretly agitated by the public indignation, directs itself solely on him. It was sometime after having written this reflection, that I discovered the following notice of the Duke of Buckingham in the unpublished life of Sir Symonds D'Ewes. 'Some of his friends had advised him how generally he was hated in England, and how needful it would be for his greater safety to wear some coat of mail, or some other secret defensive armour, which the duke sighing said, "It needs not: there are no Roman spirits left."^{*}

An account of the contemporary feelings which sympathized with Felton, and almost sanctioned the assassin's deed, I gather from the Mss. letters of the times. The public mind, through a long state of discontent, had been prepared for, and not without an obscure expectation of the mortal end of Buckingham. It is certain the duke received many warnings which he despised. The assassination kindled a tumult of joy throughout the nation, and a state-libel was written in strong characters in the faces of the people. The passage of Felton to London, after the assassination, seemed a triumph. Now pitied, and now blessed, mothers held up their children to behold the saviour of the country; and an old woman exclaimed, as Felton passed her, with a scriptural allusion to his short tenure, and the mightiness of Buckingham, 'God bless this little David!' Felton was nearly sainted before he reached the metropolis. His health was the reigning toast among the republicans. A character somewhat remarkable, Alexander Gill (usher under his father Dr Gill, master of St Paul's school,) who was the tutor of Milton, and his dear friend afterwards, and, perhaps, from whose impressions in early life, Milton derived his vehement hatred of Charles, was committed by the star-chamber, heavily fined, and sentenced to lose his ears, on three charges, one of which arose from drinking a health to Felton. At Trinity College, Gill said that the king was fitter to stand in a Cheap-side shop, with an apron before him, and say, What lack ye? than to govern a kingdom; that he duke was gone down to hell to see king James; and thinking a health to Felton, added he was sorry Felton had deprived him of the honour of doing that brave act.† In the taste of that day they contrived a political anagram of his name, to express the immovable self-devotion he showed after the assassination, never attempting to escape; and John Felton, for the nonce, was made to read, Noli! Noli not!

But while Felton's name was echoing through the kingdom, our new Brutus was at that moment exhibiting a glorious spectacle of remorse; so different often is the real person himself from the ideal personage of the public. The assassination with him was a sort of theoretical one, depending, as we shall show, on four propositions; so that when the king's attorney, as the attorney-general has then called, had furnished the unhappy criminal with an unexpected argument, which appeared to him to have returned him, he declared that he had been in a mistake; and lamenting that he had not been aware of it before, that instant his conscientious spirit sunk into despair. In the open court he stretched out his arm, offering it as the offending instrument to be first cut off; he requested the king's leave to wear sackcloth about his loins, to sprinkle ashes on his head, to carry a halter about his neck, in memory of repentance; and that he might sink to the lowest point of contrition, he insisted on asking pardon of only of the duchess, the duke's mother, but even of the duke's scullion-boy; and a man naturally brave was now always shedding tears, so that no one could have imagined that Felton had been 'a stout soldier.' These particulars were given by one of the divines who attended him, the writer of the Mss. letter.‡

The character of Felton must not, however, be conceived from this agonizing scene of contrition. Of melancholy and retired habits, and one of those thousand officers, he had incurred disappointments, both in promotion and arrears of pay, from the careless duke, he felt, perhaps, though he denied it, a degree of personal animosity towards him. A solitary man who conceives himself injured tends over his revenge. Felton once cut off a piece of his own finger, inclosing it in a challenge, to convince the town whom he addressed, that he valued not endanger-

^{*} Mss. MSS. 646.

† The Mss. letter giving this account observes, that the words touching his majesty were not read in open court, but only so relating to the duke and Felton.

‡ Clarendon notices that Felton was 'of a gentleman's family, Suffolk of good fortune and reputation.' I find that during his imprisonment, the Earl and Countess of Arundel, and Lord Manners their son, 'he being of their blood,' says the letter-bearer, continually visited him, gave many proofs of their respect, and brought his 'winding-sheet' for to the last they implored to save him from being hung in chains: they did succeed.

ing his whole body, provided it afforded him an opportunity of vengeance.* Yet with all this, such was his love of truth and rigid honour, that Felton obtained the nick-name of 'honest Jack,' one which, after the assassination, became extremely popular through the nation. The religious enthusiasm of the times had also deeply possessed his mind, and that enthusiasm, as is well known, was of a nature that might easily occasion its votary to be mistaken for a republican.

Clarendon mentions that in his hat he had sewed a paper, in which were written a few lines of that remonstrance of the commons, which appeared to him to sanction the act. I have seen a letter from Lord Carlton to the queen, detailing the particulars; his lordship was one of those who saved Felton from the swords of the military around him, who in their vexation for the loss of their general the duke, which they considered to be the end of the war, and their ruin, would have avenged themselves. But though Felton, in conversation with Lord Carlton, confessed that by reading the remonstrance of the parliament it came into his head, that in committing the act of killing the duke, he should do his country a great good service, yet the paper sewed in his hat, thinking he might have fallen a victim in the attempt, was different from that described by Clarendon, and is thus preserved in this letter to the queen by Lord Carlton. 'If I be slain, let no man condemn me, but rather condemn himself. Our hearts are hardened, and become senseless, or else he had not gone so long unpunished. He is unworthy the name of a gentleman or soldier, in my opinion, that is afraid to sacrifice his life for the honour of God, his king, and country. John Felton.'†

Felton's mind had however previously passed through a more evangelical process; four theological propositions struck the knife into the heart of the minister. The conscientious assassin, however accompanied the fatal blow with a prayer to Heaven, to have mercy on the soul of the victim; and never was a man murdered with more gospel than the duke. The following curious document I have discovered in the Mss. letter.

'Propositions found in Felton's trunk, at the time he slew the duke.

1. There is no alliance nearer to any one than his country.

Except his God and his own soul, said the divines.

2. The safety of the people is the chiefest law.

Next to the law of God, said these divines.

3. No law is more sacred than the safety and welfare of the commonwealth.

Only God's law is more sacred, said the divines.

4. God himself hath enacted this law, that all things that are for the good profit and benefit of the commonwealth should be lawful.

The divines said, We must not do evil that good may come thereon.'

The gradual rise in these extraordinary propositions, with the last sweeping one, which includes every thing lawless as lawful for the common weal, was at least but feebly parried by the temperate divines, who, while they were so reasonably referring every thing to God, wanted the vulgar curiosity to inquire, or the philosophical discernment to discover, that Felton's imagination was driving every thing at the duke. Could they imagine that these were but subtle cobwebs, spun by a closet-speculator on human affairs? In those troubled times did they not give a thought to the real object of these inquiries? Or did they not care what befell a minion of the state?

There is one bright passage in the history of this unhappy man, who, when broken down in spirits, firmly asserted the rights of a Briton; and even the name of John Felton may fill a date in the annals of our constitutional freedom.

Felton was menaced with torture. Rushworth has noticed the fact, and given some imperfect notes of his speech, when threatened to be racked; but the following is not only more ample, but more important in its essential particulars. When Lord Dorset told him (says the Mss. letter,) Mr Felton, it is the king's pleasure that you should be put to the torture, to make you confess your complices, and therefore prepare yourself for the rack: Felton answered, 'My lord, I do not believe that it is the king's pleasure, for he is a just and a gracious prince, and will not have his subject tortured against law. I do affirm upon my salvation that my purpose was not known to any man living; but if it be his majesty's pleasure, I am ready to suffer whatever his majesty will have inflicted upon me. Yet this I must tell you by the way, that if I be put upon the rack, I will accuse you, my Lord of Dorset, and none but yourself.* This firm and sensible speech silenced them. A council was held, the judges were consulted; and on this occasion, they came to a very unexpected decision, that 'Felton ought not to be tortured by the rack, for no such punishment is known or allowed by our law.' Thus the judges condemned what the government had constantly practised. Blackstone yields a fraternal eulogium to the honour of the judges on this occasion; but Hume more philosophically discovers the cause of this sudden tenderness. 'So much more exact reasoners with regard to law, had they become from the jealous scruples of the House of Commons.' An argument which may be strengthened from cases which are unknown to the writers of our history. Not two years before the present one, a Captain Brodeman, one who had distinguished himself among the 'bold speakers' concerning the king and the duke, had been sent to the Tower, and was reported to have expired on the rack; the death seems doubtful, but the fact of his having been racked is repeated in the ms. stories of the times. The rack has been more frequently used as a state-engine than has reached the knowledge of our historians; secret have been the deadly embraces of the Duke of Exeter's daughter.† It was only by an original journal of the transactions in the Tower that Burnet discovered the racking of Ann Askew, a narrative of horror! James the First incidentally mentions in his account of the powder-plot that this rack was shown to Guy Fawkes during his examination; and yet under this prince, mild as his temper was, it had been used in a terrific manner.‡ Elizabeth but too frequently employed this engine of arbitrary power; once she had all the servants of the Duke of Norfolk tortured. I have seen in a ms. of the times heads of charges made against some member of the House of Commons in Elizabeth's reign, among which is one for having written against torturing! Yet Coke, the most eminent of our lawyers, extols the mercy of Elizabeth in the trials of Essex and Southampton, because she had not used torture against their accomplices or witnesses. Was it for the head of law itself, as Coke was, to extol the mercy of the sovereign for not violating the laws, for not punishing the subject by an illegal act? The truth is, lawyers are rarely philosophers; the history of the heart, read only in statutes and law cases, presents the worst side of human nature: they are apt to consider men as wild beasts; and they have never spoken with any great abhorrence of what they so erroneously considered a means of obtaining confession. Long after these times, Sir George Mackenzie, a great lawyer in the reign of James II, used torture in Scotland. We have seen how the manly spirit of Felton, and the scruples of the Commons, wrenched the hidden law from judges who had hitherto been too silent; and produced that unexpected avowal, which condemned all their former practices. But it was reserved for better times, when philosophy combining with law, enabled the genius of Blackstone to quote with admiration the exquisite ridicule of torture, by Beccaria.

On a rumour that Felton was condemned to suffer torture, an effusion of poetry, the ardent breathings of a pure and youthful spirit, was addressed to the supposed political martyr, by Zouch Townley, of the ancient family of the Townleys in Lancashire, to whose last descendant the nation owes the first public collection of ancient art.§

† The rack, or brake, now in the Tower, was introduced by the Duke of Exeter in the reign of Henry VI, as an auxiliary to his project of establishing the civil law in this country; and in derision it was called his daughter. Cowel's Interpret. voc. Rack.

‡ This remarkable document is preserved by Dalrymple; it is an indorsement in the hand-writing of secretary Winmole, respecting the examination of Peacham, a record whose graduated horrors might have charmed the speculative cruelty of a Domitian or a Nero. 'Upon these interrogatories, Peacham this day was examined before torture, in torture, between torture, and after torture; notwithstanding, nothing could be drawn from him, he persisting still in his obstinate and insensible denials and former answer.' Dalrymple's Mem. and Letters of James I., p. 58.

§ Z. Townley in 1624 made the Latin oration in memory of

The poem I transcribe from a ms. copy of the times; appears only to have circulated in that secret form, for a writer being summoned to the star chamber, and not willing to have any such poem addressed to himself, escaped to the Hague.

'To his confined friend, Mr Jo. FELTON.

Enjoy thy bondage, make thy prison know
Thou hast a liberty, thou canst not owe
To those base punishments; keep entire, since
Nothing but guilt shackles the conscience.
I dare not tempt thy valiant blood to affray,
Infessling it with pity; nor dare I pray.
Thine act may mercy find, least thy great story
Lose somewhat of its miracle and glory.
I wish thy merits, laboured cruelty;
Stout vengeance best befriends thy memory.
For I would have posterity to hear,
He that can bravely do can bravely bear.
Tortures may seem great in a coward's eye;
It's no great thing to suffer, less to die.
Should all the clouds fall down, and in that strife
Lightning and thunder serve to take my life,
I would applaud the wisdom of my fate,
Which knew to value me of such a rate,
As to my fall to trouble all the sky,
Emptying upon me Jove's full armoury.
Serve in your sharpest mischiefs; use your rack,
Enlarge each joint, and make each sinew crack,
Thy soul before was straitened; thank thy doom,
To show her virtue, she hath larger room.
Yet sure if every artery were broke,
Thou wouldst find strength for such another stroke
And now I leave thee unto Death and Fame,
Which lives to shake Ambition with thy name;
And if it were not sin, the court by it
Should hourly swear before the favourite.
Farewell! for thy brave sake we shall not send Henceforth commanders, enemies to defend;
Nor will it our just monarchs henceforth please,
To keep an admiral, to lose the seas.
Farewell! undaunted stand, and joy to be
Of public service the epitome.
Let the duke's name solace and crown thy thrall;
All we for him did suffer, thou for all!
And I dare boldly write, as thou dar'st die,
Stout Felton, England's ransom, here doth lie!

This is to be a great poet. Felton, who was celebrated in such elevated strains, was, at that moment, not the patriot but the penitent. In political history it frequently occurs that the man who accidentally has effluated the purpose of a party is immediately invested by them with all their favourite virtues; but in reality, having acted from motives originally insignificant and obscure, his character may be quite the reverse they have made him; and such was that of our 'honest Jack.' Had Townley had a more intimate acquaintance with his Brutus, we might have had a noble poem on a noble subject.

JOHNSON'S HINTS FOR THE LIFE OF POPE.

I shall preserve a literary curiosity, which perhaps is the only one of its kind. It is an original memorandum of Dr Johnson's, of hints for the life of Pope written down as they were suggested to his mind in the course of his researches. The lines in italics, Johnson had scratched with red ink, probably after having made use of them. These notes should be compared with the life itself. The youthful student will find some use, and the curious be gratified in discovering the gradual labours of research and observation; and that art of seizing on those general conceptions which afterwards are developed by meditation, and illustrated by Genius. I once thought of accompanying these hints by the amplified and finished passages derived from them; but this is an amusement which the reader can contrive for himself. I have extracted the most material notes.

This fragment is a companion piece to the engraved fac-simile of a page of Pope's Homer in the present volume of this work, of which I shall now observe, that there never was a more minutely perfect copy of a manuscript.

That fac-simile was not given to show the autograph of Pope—a practice which has since so generally prevailed, but to exhibit to the eye of the student the fervour and the diligence required in every work of genius; this could only be done by showing the state of the manuscript itself, with all its erasures, and even its half formed lines; nor could

SECOND SERIES

PREFACE.

It may be useful to state the design of the present volume, which differs in its character from the preceding Series.

The form of essay-writing, were it now moulded even by the hand of the Raphael of Essayists, would fail in the attraction of novelty; Morality would now in vain repeat its counsels in a fugitive page, and Manners now offer but little variety to supply one. The progress of the human mind has been marked by the enlargement of our knowledge; and essay-writing seems to have closed with the century which it charmed and enlightened.

I have often thought that an occasional recurrence to speculations on human affairs, as they appear in private and in public history, and to other curious inquiries in literature and philosophy, would form some substitute for this mode of writing. These Researches, therefore, offer authentic knowledge for evanescent topics; they attempt to demonstrate some general principle, by induction from a variety of particulars—to develop those imperfect truths which float obscurely in the mind—and to suggest subjects, which, by their singularity, are new to inquiry, and which may lead to new trains of ideas. Such Researches will often form supplements to our previous knowledge.

In accustoming ourselves to discoveries of this nature, every research seems to yield the agreeable feeling of invention—it is a pleasure peculiar to itself—something which we ourselves have found out—and which, whenever it imparts novelty or interest to another, communicates to him the delight of the first discoverer.

CURIOSITIES OF LITERATURE.

MODERN LITERATURE, BAYLE'S CRITICAL DICTIONARY.

A new edition of Bayle in France is now in a progressive state of publication; an event in literary history which could not have been easily predicted. Every work which creates an epoch in literature is one of the great monuments of the human mind; and Bayle may be considered as the father of literary curiosity, and of Modern Literature. Much has been alleged against our author: yet let us be careful to preserve what is precious. Bayle is the inventor of a work which dignified a collection of facts constituting his text, by the argumentative powers and the copious illustrations which charm us in his diversified commentary. Conducting the humble pursuits of an Aulus Gellius and an Athenæus, with a higher spirit he showed us the philosophy of Books, and communicated to such limited researches a value which they had otherwise not possessed.

This was introducing a study perfectly distinct from what is pre-eminently distinguished as 'classical learning,' and the subjects which had usually entered into philological pursuits. Ancient literature, from century to century, had constituted the sole labours of the learned, and 'Varia lectiones' were long their pride and their reward. Latin was the literary language of Europe. The vernacular idiom in Italy was held in such contempt, that their youths were not suffered to read Italian books; their native productions; Varchi tells a curious anecdote of his father sending him to prison, where he was kept on bread and water, as a penance for his inveterate passion for reading Italian books! Dante was reproached by the swifte Italians for composing in his mother tongue, still expressed by the degrading designation of il volgare, which the 'resolute' John Florio renders 'to make common;' and to translate was contemptuously called vulgarizzare; while Petrarch reeled his fame on his Latin poetry, and called his Italian lingua vulgaris. With us, Roger Ascham was the first who boldly avowed 'To speak as the common people, to think as wise men;' yet, so late as the time of Bacon, this great man did not consider his 'Moral Essays' as likely to last in the moveable sands of a modern language, for he as anxiously had them sculptured in the marble of ancient Rome. Yet what had the great ancients themselves done, but trusted to their own volgare? The Greeks, the finest and most original writers of the ancients, observes Adam Ferguson, 'were unacquainted with every language but their own; and if they became learned, it was only by studying what they themselves had produced.'

During fourteen centuries, whatever lay out of the pale of classical learning was condemned as barbarism; in the mean while, however, amidst this barbarism, another literature was insensibly creating itself in Europe. Every people, in the gradual accessions of their vernacular genius, discovered a new sort of knowledge, one which more deeply interested their feelings and the times, reflecting the image, not of the Greeks and the Latins, but of themselves! A spirit of inquiry, originating in events which had never reached the ancient world, and the same refined taste in the arts of composition caught from the models of antiquity, at length raised up rivals, who competed with the great ancients themselves; and Modern Literature now occupies a space which looks to be immensity, compared with the narrow and the imperfect limits of the ancient. A sumptuous collection of classical works, all the bees of antiquity, may be hired in a glass case; but those we should find only the milk and honey of our youth; to obtain the substantial nourishment of European knowledge, a library of ten thousand volumes will not satisfy our inquiries, nor supply our researches even on a single topic!

Let not, however, the votaries of ancient literature dread its neglect, nor be over jealous of their younger and Gothic sister. The existence of their favourite study is secured, as well by its own imperishable claims, as by the stationary institutions of Europe. But one of those silent revolutions in the intellectual history of mankind, which are not so obvious as those in their political state, seems now fully accomplished. The very term 'classical,' so long limited to the ancient authors, is now equally applicable to the most elegant writers of every literary people; and although Latin and Greek were long characterized as 'the learned languages,' yet we cannot in truth any longer concede that those are the most learned who are 'inter Græcos Græcissimi, inter Latinos Latinissimi,' any more than we can reject from the class of 'the learned,' those great writers, whose scholarship in the ancient classics may be very indifferent. The modern languages now have also become learned ones, when he who writes in them is imbued with their respective learning. He is a 'learned' writer who has embraced most knowledge on the particular subject of his investigation, as he is a 'classical' one who composes with the greatest elegance. Sir David Dalrymple dedicates his 'Memorials relating to the History of Britain' to the Earl of Hardwicke, whom he styles with equal happiness and propriety, 'Learned in British History.' 'Scholarship' has hitherto been a term reserved for the adept in ancient literature, whatever may be the mediocrity of his intellect; but the honourable distinction must be extended to all great writers in modern literature, if we would not confound the natural sense and propriety of things.

Modern literature may, perhaps, still be discriminated from the ancient, by a term it began to be called by at the Reformation, that of 'the New Learning.' Without supplanting the ancient, the modern must grow up with it; the further we advance in society, it will more deeply occupy our interests; and it has already proved what Bacon, casting his philosophical views retrospectively and prospectively, has observed, 'that Time was the greatest of innovators.'

When Bayle projected his 'Critical Dictionary,' he probably had no idea that he was about effecting a revolution in our libraries, and founding a new province in the dominion of human knowledge; creative genius often is itself the creature of its own age: it is but that reaction of public opinion, which is generally the fore-runner of some critical change, or which calls forth some want which sooner or later will be supplied. The predisposition for the various, but neglected literature, and the curious, but the scattered knowledge, of the moderns, which had long been increasing, with the speculative turn of inquiry, prevailed in Europe, when Bayle took his pen to give the thing itself a name and an existence. But the great authors of modern Europe were not yet consecrated beings, like the ancients, and their volumes were not read from the chairs of universities; yet the new interests which had arisen in society, the new modes of human life, the new spread of knowledge, the curiosity after even the little things which concern us, the revelations of secret history, and the state papers which have sometimes escaped from national archives, the philosophical spirit which was hastening its steps and raising up new systems of thinking;

all alike required research and criticism, inquiry and discussion. Bayle had first studied his own age, before he gave the public his great work.

'If Bayle,' says Gibbon, 'wrote his dictionary to empty the various collections he had made, without any particular design, he could not have chosen a better plan. It permitted him every thing, and obliged him to nothing. By the double freedom of a dictionary and of notes, he could pitch on what articles he pleased, and say what he pleased in those articles.'

'Facts est alles!' exclaimed Bayle, on the publication of his dictionary, as yet dubious of the extraordinary enterprise: perhaps while going on with the work, he knew not at times, whither he was directing his course; but we must think, that in his own mind he counted on something, which might have been difficult even for Bayle himself to have developed. The author of the 'Critical Dictionary' had produced a voluminous labour, which, to all appearance, could only rank him among compilers and reviewers, for his work is formed of such materials as they might use. He had never studied any science; he confessed that he could never demonstrate the first problem in Euclid, and to his last day ridiculed that sort of evidence called mathematical demonstration. He had but little taste for classical learning, for he quotes the Latin writers curiously, not elegantly; and there is reason to suspect that he had entirely neglected the Greek. Even the erudition of antiquity usually reached him by the ready medium of some German Commentator. His multifarious reading was chiefly confined to the writers of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. With such deficiencies in his literary character, Bayle could not reasonably expect to obtain pre-eminence in any single pursuit. Hitherto his writings had not extricated him from the secondary ranks of literature, where he found a rival at every step; and without his great work, the name of Bayle at this moment had been buried among his controversialists, the rabid Jurien, the cloudy Jaquelot, and the envious Le Clerc; to these, indeed, he sacrificed too many of his valuable days, and was still answering them, at the hour of his death. Such was the cloudy horizon of that bright fame which was to rise over Europe! Bayle, intent on escaping from all beaten tracks, while the very materials he used promised no novelty, for all his knowledge was drawn from old books, opened an eccentric route, where at least he could encounter no parallel; Bayle felt that if he could not stand alone, he would only have been an equal by the side of another. Experience had more than once taught this mortifying lesson; but he was blest with the genius which could stamp an inimitable originality on a folio.

This originality seems to have been obtained in this manner. The exhausted topics of classical literature he resigned as a province not adapted to an ambitious genius; sciences he rarely touched on, and hardly ever without betraying superficial knowledge, and involving himself in absurdity; but in the history of men, in penetrating the motives of their conduct, in clearing up obscure circumstances, in detecting the strong and the weak parts of him who he was trying, and in the cross-examination of the numerous witnesses he summoned, he assumed at once the judge and the advocate! Books for him were pictures of men's inventions, and the histories of their thoughts; for any book, whatever be its quality, must be considered as an experiment of the human mind.

In controversies, in which he was so ambidexterous—in the progress of the human mind, in which he was so philosophical—furnished, too, by his hoarding curiosity with an immense accumulation of details,—skillful in the art of detecting falsehoods amidst truths, and weighing probability against uncertainty—holding together the chain of argument from its first principles, to its remotest consequence—Bayle stands among those masters of the human intellect who taught us to think, and also to unthink! All, indeed, is a collection of researches and reasonings: he had the art of melting down his curious quotations with his own subtle ideas. He collects every thing: if truths, they enter into history; if fictions, into discussions: he places the secret by the side of the public story: opinion is balanced against opinion: if his arguments grow tedious, a lucky anecdote or an enlivening tale relieve the folio page; and, knowing the infirmity of our nature, he picks up trivial things to amuse us, while he is grasping the most abstract and ponderous. Human nature in her shifting scenery, and the human mind in its eccentric directions, open on his view; so that an unknown person or a worthless book, are equally objects for his speculation with the most eminent—they alike curiously instruct. Such were the materials, and such the genius of the man, whose folios, which seemed destined for the retired few, he open on parlour tables. The men of genius of his age studied them for instruction, the men of the world for their amusement. Amidst the mass of facts which he has collected, and the enlarged views of human nature which his philosophical spirit has combined with his researches, Bayle may be called the Shakspeare of dictionary makers; a sort of chimerical being, whose existence was not imagined to be possible before the time of Bayle.

But his errors are voluminous as his genius! and what do apologies avail? They only account for the evil which they cannot alter!

Bayle is reproached for carrying his speculations too far into the wilds of scepticism—he wrote in a disordered time; he was witnessing the dragons and the recoactions of the Romish church; and he lived amidst the Reformed, or the French prophets, as we called them when they came over us, and in whom Sir Isaac Newton more than half believed; these testified that they heard angels singing in the air, while our philosopher was convinced that he was living among men for whom no angel would sing! Bayle had left persecutors to fly to fanatics, both equally appealing to the Gospel, but alike untouched by its blessedness! His impurities were a taste inherited from his favourite old writers, whose sautes seemed to sport with the grossness which it touched, and neither in France, nor at home, had the age then attained to our moral delicacy: Bayle himself was a man without passions! His trivial matters were an author's compliance with the bookseller's taste, which is always that of the public. His scepticism is said to have thrown every thing into disorder. Is it more positive evil to doubt, than to dogmatise? Even Aristotle often pauses with a qualifying perhaps, and the egotist Cicero with a modest it seems to me. His scepticism has been useful in history, and has often shown how facts universally believed, are doubtful and sometimes must be false. Bayle, it is said, is perpetually contradicting himself; but a sceptic must doubt his doubts; he places the antidote close to the poison, and lays the sheath by the sword. Bayle has himself described one of these self-tormenting and many headed scorpions by a very noble figure, 'He was a Hydra who was perpetually tearing himself.'

The time has now come when Bayle may instruct with our danger. We have passed the ordeals he had to go through; we must now consider him as the historian of our thoughts as well as of our actions; he dispenses the literary stores of the moderns, in that vast repository of their wisdom and their follies, which, by its originality of design, has made him an author common to all Europe. Nowhere shall we find a rival for Bayle! and hardly even an imitator! He compared himself, for his power of raising up, or dispelling objections and doubts, to 'the cloud, compelling Jove,' The great Leibnitz, who was himself a lover of his vera eruditio, applied a line of Virgil to Bayle, characterising his luminous and elevated genius—

'Sub pedibusque videt nubes et sidera Daphnia.'
Beneath his feet he views the clouds and stars.

CHARACTERISTICS OF BAYLE.

To know Bayle as a man, we must not study him in the folio Life of Des Maizeaux; whose laborious pencil, without colour, and without expression, loses in its indistinctness the individualising strokes of the portrait. Look for Bayle in his 'Letters,' those true chronicles of a literary man, when they solely record his own pursuits.

The personal character of Bayle was unblemished even by calumny—his executor, Bassege, never could mention him without tears! With simplicity which approached to an infantine nature, but with the fortitude of a Stoic, our literary philosopher, from his earliest days, dedicated himself to literature; the great sacrifice consisted of those two main objects of human pursuits—fortune and a family. Many an ascetic, who has headed an order, has not so religiously abstained from all worldly interests; yet let us not imagine that there was a sulleness in his stoicism; an icy misanthropy which shuts up the heart from its ebbs and flows. His domestic affections through life were fervid. When his mother desired to receive his portrait, he sent her a picture of his heart! Early in life the mind of Bayle was strengthening itself by a philosophical resignation to all human events!

'I am indeed of a disposition neither to fear bad fortune, nor to have very ardent desires for good. Yet I lose this steadiness and indifference when I reflect, that your love to me makes you feel for every thing that happens to me. It is, therefore, from the consideration that my misfortunes would be a torment to you, that I wish to be happy; and when I think that my happiness would be all your joy, I should lament that my bad fortune should continue to persecute me; though, as to my own particular interest, I dare promise to myself that I shall never be very much affected by it.'

An instance occurred of those social affections in which a stoic is sometimes supposed to be deficient, which might have afforded a beautiful illustration to one of our most elegant poets. The remembrance of the happy moments which Bayle spent when young on the borders of the river Auriège, a short distance from his native town of Carlat, where he had been sent to recover from a fever, occasioned by an excessive indulgence in reading, induced him many years afterwards to devote an article to it in his 'Critical Dictionary,' for the sake of quoting the poet who had celebrated this obscure river; it was a 'Pleasure of Memory'—a tender association of domestic feeling!

The first step which Bayle took in life is remarkable.—He changed his religion and became a Catholic; a year afterwards he returned to the creed of his fathers. Posterity might not have known the story had it not been recorded in his Diary. The circumstance is thus curiously stated.

BAYLE'S DIARY.

Years of the Christian Era.	Years of my age.
1699. Tuesday, March 19.	23	I changed my religion—next day I resumed the study of logic.
1700. August 20	23	I returned to the reformed religion, and made a private abjuration of the Romish religion in the hands of four ministers!

His brother was one of these ministers; while a Catholic, Bayle had attempted to convert him by a letter, long enough to evince his sincerity: but without his subscription, we should not have ascribed it to Bayle.

For this vacillation in his religion has Bayle endured bitter censure. Gibbon, who himself changed his, about the same year of his age, and for as short a period, sarcastically observes of the first entry, that Bayle should have finished his logic before he changed his religion.' It may be retorted, that when he had learnt to reason, he renounced Catholicism! The true fact is, that when Bayle had only studied a few months at college, some books of controversial divinity by the Catholics, offered many a specious argument against the reformed doctrines; a young student was easily entangled in the nets of the Jesuits. But their passive obedience, and their transubstantiation, and other stuff woven in their looms, soon enabled such a man as Bayle to recover his senses. The promises and the caresses of the wily Jesuits were rejected, and the gush of tears of the brothers, on his return to the religion of his fathers, is one of the most pathetic incidents of domestic life.

Bayle was willing to become an expatriated man; to study from the love of study, in poverty and honour! It happens sometimes that great men are criminated for their nearest deeds by both parties.

When his great work appeared, the adversaries of Bayle reproached him with haste, while the author expressed his astonishment at his slowness. At first 'the Critical Dictionary,' consisting only of two folios, was finished in little more than four years; but in the life of Bayle this was equivalent to a treble amount with men of ordinary application. Bayle even calculated the time of his head-aches; 'My megrims would have left me had it been in my power to have lived without study; by them I lose many days in every month'—the fact is, that Bayle had entirely given up every sort of recreation except that delicious inebriation of his faculties, as we may term it for those who know what it is, which he drew from his books: we have his avowal. 'Public amusements, games, country jaunts, morning visits, and other recreations necessary to many students, as they tell us, were none of my business. I wasted no time on them, nor in any domestic cares; never soliciting for preferment, nor busied in any other way. I have been happily delivered from many occupations which were not suitable to my humour; and I have enjoyed the greatest and the most charming leisure that a man of letters could desire. By such means an author makes a great progress in a few years.'

Bayle, at Rotterdam, was appointed to a professorship of philosophy and history; the salary was a competence to his frugal life, and enabled him to publish his celebrated Review, which he dedicates 'to the glory of the city,' for illa nobis hæc ætia fecit.

After this grateful acknowledgment he was unexpectedly deprived of the professorship. The secret history is curious. After a tedious war, some one amused the world by a chimerical 'Project of Peace,' which was much against the wishes and the designs of our William III.—Jurieu, the head of the Reformed party in Holland, a man of heated fancies, persuaded William's party that this book was a part of a secret cabal in Europe, raised by Louis XIV against William III; and accused Bayle as the author and promoter of this political confederacy. The magistrates, who were the creatures of William, dismissed Bayle without alleging any reason. To an ordinary philosopher it would have seemed hard to lose his salary because his antagonist was one 'Whose sword is sharper than his pen.'

Bayle only rejoiced at this emancipation, and quietly returned to his Dictionary. His feelings on this occasion he has himself perpetuated.

'The sweetness and repose I find in the studies in which I have engaged myself, and which are my delight, will induce me to remain in this city, if I am allowed to continue in it, at least till the printing of my Dictionary is finished; for my presence is absolutely necessary to the place where it is printed. I am no lover of money, nor of honours, and would not accept of any invitation, should it be made to me; nor am I fond of the disputes and cabals, and professorial snarlings, which reign in all our academies: Cæsum mihi et Musæ.' He was indeed so charmed by quiet and independence, that he was continually refusing the most magnificent offers of patronage: from Count Guiscard, the French ambassador; but particularly from our English nobility. The Earls of Shaftesbury, of Albermarle, and of Huntingdon, tried every solicitation to win him over to reside with them as their friend; and too nice a sense of honour induced Bayle to refuse the Duke of Shrewsbury's gift of two hundred guineas for the dedication of his dictionary, 'I have so often ridiculed dedications that I must not risk any,' was the reply of our philosopher.

The only complaint which escaped from Bayle was the want of books; an evil particularly felt during his writing the 'Critical Dictionary'; a work which should have been composed not distant from the shelves of a public library. Men of classical attainments, who are studying about twenty authors, and chiefly for their style, can form no conception of the state of famine to which an 'hællou librorum' is too often reduced in the new sort of study which Bayle founded. Taste when once obtained may be said to be no acquiring faculty, and must remain stationary; but Knowledge is of perpetual growth, and has infinite demands. Taste, like an artificial canal, winds through a beautiful country; but its borders are confined, and its term is limited; Knowledge navigates the ocean, and is perpetually on voyages of discovery. Bayle often grieves over the scarcity, or the want of books, by which he was compelled to leave many things uncertain, or to take them at second hand; but he lived to discover that trusting to the reports of others, was too often suffering the blind to lead the blind. It was this circumstance which induced Bayle to declare, that some works cannot be written in the country, and that the metropolis only can supply the wants of the literary man. Plutarch has made a similar confession; and the elder Pliny who had not so many volumes to turn over as a modern, was sensible to the wants of books, for he acknowledges that there was no book so bad by which we might not profit.

Bayle's peculiar vein of research and skill in discussion first appeared in his 'Pensées sur la Comète.' In December, 1680, a comet had appeared, and the public yet trembled at a portentous meteor, which they still imagined was connected with some forthcoming and terrible event! Persons as curious as they were terrified, teased Bayle by their inquiries, but resisted all his arguments.

They found many things more than arguments in his amusing volumes: 'I am not one of the authors by profession,' says Bayle, in giving an account of the method he meant to pursue, 'who follow a subject; who first project their subject, then divide it into books and chapters, and who only choose to work on the ideas they have planned. I, for my part, give up all claims to authorship, and shall chain myself to no such servitude. I cannot meditate with much regularity on one subject; I am too fond of change. I often wander from the subject, and jump into places of which it might be difficult to guess the way out; so that I shall make a learned doctor who looks for method quite impatient with me.' The work is indeed full of curiosities and anecdotes, with many critical ones concerning history.

At first it found an easy entrance into France, as a simple account of comets; but when it was discovered that Bayle's comet had a number of fiery tails concerning the French and the Austrians, it soon became as terrific as the comet itself, and was prohibited!

Bayle's 'Critique generale de l'Histoire du Calvinisme par le Pere Maimbourg,' had more pleasantry than bitterness, except to the palate of the vindictive Father, who was of too hot a constitution to relish the delicacy of our author's wit. Maimbourg stirred up all the intrigues he could rouse to get the Critique burnt by the hangman at Paris. The lieutenant of the police, De la Reynie, who was among the many who did not dislike to see the Father corrected by Bayle, delayed this execution from time to time, till there came a final order. This lieutenant of the police was a shrewd fellow, and wishing to put an odium on the bigoted Maimbourg, allowed the irascible Father to write the proclamation himself with all the violence of an enraged author. It is a curious specimen of one who evidently wished to burn his brother with his book. In this curious proclamation, which has been preserved as a literary curiosity, Bayle's 'Critique' is declared to be defamatory and calumnious, abounding with seditious forgeries, pernicious to all good subjects, and therefore is condemned to be torn to pieces, and burnt at the Place de Greve. All printers and booksellers are forbidden to print, or to sell, or disperse the said abominable book, under pain of death; and all other persons, of what quality or condition soever, are to undergo the penalty of exemplary punishment. De la Reynie must have smiled on submissively receiving this effusion from our enraged author; and to punish Maimbourg in the only way he could contrive, and to do at the same time the greatest kindness to Bayle, whom he admired, he dispersed three thousand copies of this proclamation to be posted up through Paris: the alarm and the curiosity were simultaneous; but the latter prevailed. Every book collector hastened to procure a copy so terrifically denounced, and at the same time so amusing. The author of the 'Livres condamnés au feu' might have inserted this anecdote in his collection. It may be worth adding, that Maimbourg always affected to say that he had never read Bayle's work; but he afterwards confessed to Menage, that he could not help valuing a book of such curiosity. Jurieu was so jealous of its success, that Beausart attributes his personal hatred of Bayle to our young philosopher overshadowing that veteran.

The taste for literary history we owe to Bayle; and the great interest he communicated to these researches spread in the national tastes of Europe. France has been always the richest in these stores, but our acquisitions have been rapid; and Johnson, who delighted in them, elevated their means and their end, by the ethical philosophy and the spirit of criticism which he awoke. With Bayle, indeed, his minor works were the seed-plots; but his great Dictionary opened the forest.

It is curious, however, to detect the difficulties of early attempts, and the indifferent success which sometimes attends them in their first state. Bayle, to lighten the fatigue of correcting the second edition of his Dictionary, wrote the first volume of 'Réponses aux Questions d'un Provincial,' a supposititious correspondence with a country gentleman. It was a work of mere literary curiosity, and of a better description of miscellaneous writing than that of the prevalent fashion of giving thoughts and maxims, and fanciful characters, and idle stories, which had satiated the public taste; however the book was not well received. He attributes the public caprice to his prodigality of literary anecdotes, and other minutiae literariæ, and his frequent quotations! but he defends himself with skill. 'It is against the nature of things to pretend that in a work to prove and clear up facts, an author should only make use of his own thoughts, or that he ought to quote very seldom. Thus who say, that the work does not sufficiently interest the public, are doubtless in the right; but an author cannot interest the public except he discusses moral or political subjects. All others with which men of letters fill their books are useless to the public and we ought to consider them as only a kind of frothy nourishment in themselves; but which, however, gratify the curiosity of many readers, according to the diversities of their tastes. What is there for example, less interesting to the public than the Bibliothèque Choisie of Colomies (a small bibliographical work;) yet is that work looked on as excellent in its kind. I could mention other works which are read, though containing nothing which interests the public.' Two years after, when he resumed these letters, he changed his plan; he became more argumentative, and more sparing of literary and historical articles. We have now certainly obtained more decided notions of the nature of this species of composition, and treat such investigations with more skill; still they are 'caviare to the multitude.' An accumulation of dry facts, without any exertion of taste or discussion, forms but the barren and obscure diligence of title-hunters. All things which come to the reader without having first passed through the mind, as well as the pen of the writer, will be still open to the fatal censure of insane industry raging with a depraved appetite for trash and cinders; and this is the line of demarcation which will for ever separate a Bayle from a Prosper Marchand, and a Warton from a Riton: the one must be satisfied to be useful, but the other will not fail to delight. Yet something must be alleged in favour of those who may sometimes indulge researches too minutely; perhaps there is a point beyond which nothing remains but useless curiosity; yet this too may be relative. The pleasure of these pursuits is only tasted by those who are accustomed to them, and whose employments are thus converted into amusements. A man of fine genius, Addison relates, trained up in all the polite studies of antiquity, upon being obliged to search into several rolls and records, at first found this a very dry and irksome employment; yet he assured me, that at last he took an incredible pleasure in it, and preferred it even to the reading of Virgil and Cicero.

As for our Bayle, he exhibits a perfect model of the real literary character. He, with the secret alchemy of human happiness, extracted his tranquillity out of the baser metals, at the cost of his ambition and his fortune. Throughout a voluminous work, he experienced the enjoyment of perpetual acquisition and delight; he obtained glory, and he endured persecution. He died as he had lived, in the same uninterrupted habits of composition; for with his dying hand, and nearly speechless, he sent a fresh proof to the printer!

CICERO VIEWED AS A COLLECTOR.

Mr Fuseli, in the introduction to the second part of his Lectures, has touched on the character of Cicero, respecting his knowledge and feeling of Art, in a manner which excites our curiosity. 'Though,' says that eloquent lecturer, 'Cicero seems to have had as little native taste for painting and sculpture, and even less than he had taste for poetry, he had a conception of Nature, and with his usual acumen frequently scattered useful hints and pertinent observations. For many of these he might probably be indebted to Hortensius, with whom, though his rival in eloquence, he lived on terms of familiarity, and who was a man of declared taste, and one of the first collectors of the time.' The inquiry may amuse, to trace the progress of Cicero's taste for the works of art; which was probably a late, but an ardent pursuit with this celebrated man; and their actual enjoyment seems with him rather to have been connected with some future plan of life.

Cicero, when about forty-three years of age, seems to have projected the formation of a library and a collection of antiquities, with the remote intention of secession, and one day stealing away from the noisy honours of the republic. Although that great man remained too long a victim to his political ambition, yet at all times his natural dispositions would break out; and amidst his public avocations he often anticipated a time when life would be unvalued without uninterrupted repose: but repose, destitute of the ample furniture, and even of the luxuries of a mind occupying itself in literature and art, would only for him have opened the repose of a desert! It was rather his provident wisdom than their actual enjoyment, which induced him, at a busy period of his life, to accumulate from all parts, books, and statues, and curiosities, without number; in a word, to become, according to the term, too often misapplied and misconceived among us, for it is not always understood in an honourable sense, a collector!

Like other later collectors, Cicero often appears ardent to possess what he was not able to command; sometimes he entreats, or circuitously negotiates, or is planning the future means to secure the acquisitions which he thirsted after. He is repeatedly soliciting his literary friend Atticus to keep his books for him, and not to dispose of his collections on any terms, however earnestly the bidders may crowd; and, to keep his patience in good hope (for Atticus imagined his collection would exceed the price which Cicero could afford,) he desires Atticus not to despair of his being able to make them his, for that he was saving all his rents to purchase these books for the relief of his old age.

This projected library, and collection of antiquities, it was the intention of Cicero to have placed in his favourite villa in the neighbourhood of Rome, whose name, consecrated by time, now proverbially describes the retirement of a man of elegant tastes. To adorn his villa at Tuscanum formed the day-dreams of this man of genius; and his passion broke out in all the enthusiasm and impatience which so frequently characterize the modern collector. Not only Atticus, on whose fine taste he could depend, but every one likely to increase his acquisitions, was Cicero persecuting with entreaties, on entreaties, with the seduction of large prices, and with the expectation, that if the orator and consul would submit to accept any bribe, it would hardly be refused in the shape of a manuscript or a statue. 'In the name of our friendship,' says Cicero, addressing Atticus, 'suffer nothing to escape you of whatever you find curious or rare.' When Atticus informed him that he should send him a fine statue, in which the heads of Mercury and Minerva were united together, Cicero, with the enthusiasm of a maniacal lover of the present day, finds every object which is uncommon the very thing for which he has a proper place. 'Your discovery is admirable, and the statue you mention seems to have been made purposely for my cabinet.' Then follows an explanation of the mystery of this allegorical statue, which expressed the happy union of exercise and study. 'Continue,' he adds, 'to collect for me, as you have promised, in as great a quantity as possible, morsels of this kind.' Cicero, like other collectors, may be suspected not to have been very difficult in his choice, and for him the curious was not less valued than the beautiful. The mind and temper of Cicero were of a robust and philosophical cast, not too subject to the tortures of those whose morbid imagination and delicacy of taste touch on infirmity. It is, however, amusing to observe this great man, actuated by all the fervour and joy of collecting. 'I have paid your agent—as you ordered, for the Megarian statues—send me as many of them as you can, and as soon as possible, with any others which you think proper for the place, and to my taste, and good enough to please yours. You cannot imagine how greatly my passion increases for this sort of things; it is such that it may appear ridiculous in the eyes of many; but you are my friend, and will only think of satisfying my wishes.' Again—'Purchase for me, without thinking further, all that you discover of rarity. My friend, do not spare my purse.' And, indeed, in another place he loves Atticus both for his promptitude and cheap purchases: Te multum amamus, quod es ab te diligenter, superque curatus es.

Our collectors may not be displeased to discover at their head so venerable a personage as Cicero; nor to sanction their own feverish thirst and panting impatience with all the raptures on the day of possession, and the 'saving of cents' to afford commanding prices—by the authority of the greatest philosopher of antiquity.

A fact is noticed in this article which requires elucidation. In the life of a true collector, the selling of his books is a singular incident. The truth is, that the elegant friend of Cicero, residing in the literary city of Athens, appears to have enjoyed but a moderate income, and may be said to have traded not only in books, but in gladiators, whom he let out, and also charged interest for the use of his money; circumstances which Cornelius Nepos, who gives an account of his landed property, has omitted, as, perhaps, not well adapted to heighten the interesting picture which is given of Atticus, but which the Abbé Mongault has detected in his curious notes on Cicero's letters to Atticus. It is certain that he employed his slaves, who, 'to the foot-boy,' as Middleton expresses himself, were all literary and skilful scribes, in copying the works of the best authors for his own use; but the duplicates were sold, to the common profit of the master and the slave. The state of literature among the ancients may be paralleled with that of the age of our first restorers of learning, when printing was not yet established; then Boccaccio, and Petrarch, and such men, were collectors, and zealously occupied in the manual labour of transcription; immeasurable was the delight of that avariciousness of manuscript, by which, in a certain given time, the possessor, with an unwearied pen, could enrich himself by his copy; and this copy an estate would not always purchase! Besides that a manuscript selected by Atticus, or copied by the hand of Boccaccio and Petrarch, must have risen in value, associating it with the known taste and judgment of the collector.

THE HISTORY OF THE CARACCIS.

The congenial histories of literature and of art are accompanied by the same periodical revolutions; and none is more interesting than that one which occurs in the decline and corruption of arts, when a single mind returning to right principles, amidst the degenerated race who had forsaken them, seems to create a new epoch, and teaches a servile race once more how to invent! These epochs are few, but are easily distinguished. The human mind is never stationary; it advances or it retrogrades; having reached its meridian point, when the hour of perfection has gone by, it must verge to its decline. In all Art, perfection lapses into that weakened state too often dignified as classical imitation; but it sinks into mannerism, and wanders into affectation, till it shoots out into fantastic novelties. When all languishes in a state of mediocrity, or is deformed by false tastes, then is reserved for a fortunate genius the glory of restoring another golden age of invention. The history of the Caracci family serves as an admirable illustration of such an epoch, while the personal characters of the three Caraccis throw an additional interest over this curious incident in the history of the works of genius.

The establishment of the famous accademia, or school of painting, at Bologna, which restored the art in the last stage of degeneracy, originated in the profound meditations of Lodovico. There was a happy boldness in the idea; but its great singularity was that of discovering those men of genius, who alone could realize his ideal conception, amidst his own family circle; and yet these were men whose opposite dispositions and acquirements could hardly have given any hope of mutual assistance; and much less of melting together their minds and their work in such unity of conception and execution, that even to our days they leave the critics undetermined which of the Caracci to prefer; each excelling the other in some pictorial quality. Often combining together in the same picture, the mingled labour of three painters seemed to proceed from one pallet, as their works exhibit which adorn the churches of Bologna. They still disputed about a picture, to ascertain which of the Caraccis painted it; and still one prefers Lodovico for his grandiœta, another Agostino for his invention, and others Annibale for his vigour or his grace.*

What has been told of others, happened to Lodovico Caracci in his youth; he struggled with a mind tardy in its conceptions, so that he gave no indications of talent; and was apparently so inept as to have been advised by two masters to be satisfied to grind the colours he ought not otherwise to meddle with. Tintoretto, from friendship, exhorted him to change his trade. 'This sluggishness of intellect did not proceed,' observes the sagacious Lanzi, 'from any deficiency, but from the depth of his penetrating mind; early in life he dreaded the ideal as a rock on which so many of his contemporaries had been shipwrecked.' His hand was not blest with precocious facility, because his mind was unsettled about truth itself; he was still seeking for nature, which he could not discover in those wretched mannerists, who boasting of their freedom and expedition in their bewildering tastes, which they called the ideal, relied on the diplomas and honours obtained by intrigue or purchase, which sanctioned their follies in the eyes of the multitude. 'Lodovico,' says Lanzi, 'would first satisfy his own mind on every line; he would not paint till painting well became a habit, and till habit produced facility.'

Lodovico then sought in other cities for what he could not find at Bologna. He travelled to inspect the works of the elder masters; he meditated on all their details; he penetrated to the very thoughts of the great artists, and grew intimate with their modes of conception and execution. The true principles of art were collected together in his own mind,—the rich fruits of his own studies,—and these first prompted him to invent a new school of painting.*

Returning to Belogus, he found his degraded brothers in art still quarrelling about the merits of the old and the new school, and still exulting in their vague conceptions and expeditious methods. Lodovico, who had observed all, had summed up his principles in one grand maxim,—that of combining a close observation of nature with the imitation of the great masters, modifying both, however, by the disposition of the artist himself. Such was the simple idea and the happy project of Lodovico! Every perfection seemed to have been obtained: the Raffaello excelled in the ideal; the Michelangelo in the anatomical; the Venetian and the Lombard schools in brilliant vivacity or philosophic gravity. All seemed pre-occupied; but the secret of breaking the bonds of servile imitation was a new art: of mingling into one school the charms of every school, adapting them with freedom; and having been taught by all, to remain a model for all; or, as Lanzi expresses it, dopo avere appreso da te tutte insegna a tutte. To restore Art in its decline, Lodovico pressed all the sweets from all the flowers; or, melting together all his rich materials, formed one Corinthian brass. This school is described by Du Fresnoy in the character of Annibale,

—Quos sedulus Hannibal omnes
In propriam mentem aque morem mira arte coegit.

Paraphrased by Mason,

From all their charms combined, with happy toil,
Did Annibal compose his wondrous style;
O'er the fair fraud so close a veil is thrown,
That every borrow'd grace becomes his own.*

Lodovico perceived that he could not stand alone in the breach, and single-handed encounter an impetuous multitude. He thought of raising up a party among those youthful aspirants who had not yet been habitually depraved. He had a brother whose talent could never rise beyond a poor copyist's, and him he had the judgment, unswayed by undue partiality, to account as a cipher; but he found two of his cousins, men capable of becoming as extraordinary as himself.

These brothers, Agostino and Annibale, first by nature, and then by their manners and habits, were of the most opposite dispositions. Born amidst humble occupations, their father was a tailor, and Annibale was still working on the paternal board, while Agostino was occupied by the elegant works of the goldsmith, whence he acquired the fine art of engraving, in which he became the Marc Antonio of his time. Their manners, perhaps, resulted from their trades. Agostino was a man of science and literature: a philosopher and poet, of the most polished elegance, the most enchanting conversation, far removed from the vulgar, he became the companion of the learned and the noble. Annibale could scarcely write and read; an inborn ruggedness made him sullen, taciturn, or if he spoke, sarcastic; scorn and ridicule were his bitter delight. Nature had strangely made these brothers little less than enemies. Annibale despised his brother for having entered into the higher circles; he ridiculed his refined manner, and even the neat elegance of his dress. To mortify Agostino, one day, he sent him a portrait of their father threading a needle, and their mother cutting out the cloth, to remind him, as he once whispered in Agostino's ear, when he met him walking with a nobleman, 'not to forget that they were sons of a poor tailor! The same contrast existed in the habits of their mind. Agostino was slow to resolve, difficult to satisfy himself; he was for polishing and maturing every thing: Annibale was too rapid to suffer any delay, and often evading the difficulties of the art, loved to do much in a short time. Lodovico soon perceived their equal and natural aptitude for art; and placing Agostino under a master, who was celebrated for his facility of execution, he fixed Annibale in his own study, where his cousin might be taught by observation the Pontina lenis; how the best works are formed by a leisurely haste. Lodovico seems to have adopted the advice of Isocrates in his management of two pupils, of whom he said, that the one was to be pricked on by the spur, and the other kept in by the rein!

† The curious reader of taste may refer to Mr Fuselli's Second Lecture for a diatribe against what he calls 'the Eclectic School; which, by selecting the beauties, correcting the faults, supplying the defects, and avoiding the extremes of the different styles, attempted to form a perfect system.' He acknowledges the greatness of the Caracci; yet he laughs at the mere copying the manners of various painters into one picture. But perhaps, I say it with all possible deference, our animated critic forgot for a moment that it was no mechanical imitation the Caracci inculcated; nature and art were to be equally studied, and secondo il nato talento e la propria sua disposizione. Barry distinguishes with praise and warmth. 'Whether,' says he, 'we may content ourselves with adopting the main plan of art pursued by the Caracci and their school at Bologna, in unking the perfections of all the other schools; or whether, which I rather hope, we look further in the style of design upon our own studies after nature; whichever of these plans the nation might fix on,' &c. II. 518. Thus three great names, Du Fresnoy, Fuselli, and Barry, restricted their notions of the Caracci plan to a mere imitation of the great masters; but Lanzi, in unfolding Lodovico's project, lays down as his first principle the observation of nature, and, secondly, the imitation of the great masters; and all modified by the natural disposition of the artist

But a new difficulty arose in the attempt to combine together such incongruous natures; the thoughtful Lodovico intent on the great project of the reformation of the art, by his prudence long balanced their unequal tempers, and with that penetration which so strongly characterizes his genius, directed their distinct talents to his one great purpose. From the literary Agostino he obtained the philosophy of critical lectures and scientific principles; invention and designing solely occupied Annibale; while the softness of contours, lightness and grace, were his own acquisition.* But though Annibale presumptuously contemned the rare and elevated talents of Agostino, and scarcely submitted the works of Lodovico, whom he preferred to rival, yet, according to a traditional rumour which Lanzi records, it was Annibale's decision of character which enabled him, as it were, unperceived, to become the master over his cousin and his brother; Lodovico and Agostino long hesitated to oppose the predominant style, in their first Essays; Annibale hardly decided to persevere in opening their new career by opposing 'works to voices'; and to the enervate labours of their wretched rivals, their own works, warm in vigor and freshness, conducted on the principles of nature and art.

The Caracci not only resolved to point justly, but to persevere in the art itself, by perpetuating the perfect taste of the true style among their successors. In their own house they opened an Accademia, calling it degli faccendanti, 'the opening a new way,' or 'the beginners.' The academy was furnished with casts, drawings, prints, a school for anatomy, and for the living figure; receiving all comers with kindness; teaching gratuitously, and, as it is said, without jealousy; but too many facts are recorded to assent to the banishment of this infectious passion from the academy of the Caracci, who, like other congregated artists, could not live together, and escape their own academic fever.

It was here, however, that Agostino found his eminence as the director of their studies; delivering lectures on architecture and perspective, and pointing out from his store, of history and fable subjects for the designs of their pupils, who, on certain days, exhibited their works to the most skilful judges, adjusting the merits by their decisions. 'To the crowned sufficient is the prize of glory,' says Lanzi; and while the poets chanted their praises, the lyre of Agostino himself gratefully celebrated the progress of his pupils. A curious sonnet has been transmitted to us, where Agostino, like the ancient legislators, compresses his new laws into a few verses, easily to be remembered. The sonnet is now well known, since Mr. Fuselli and Barry have preserved it in their lectures. This singular production has, however, had the hard fate of being unjustly depreciated: Lanzi calls it pittoresco ornaments più de poetico; Mr. Fuselli sarcastically compares it to 'a medical prescription.' It delighted Barry, who calls it 'a beautiful poem.' Considered as a didactic and descriptive poem, no lover of art, who has ever read it, will want to repeat it till he has got it by heart. In this academy every one was free to indulge his own taste, provided he did not violate the essential principles of art; for, though the critics have usually described the character of this new school to have been an imitation of the preceding ones, it was their first principle to be guided by nature their own dispositions; and if their painter was deficient in originality, it was not the fault of this academy, so much of the academicians. In difficult doubts they had recourse to Lodovico, whom Lanzi describes in his school flourishing among the Greeks, fons ingens, profundus every painting. Even the recreations of the pupils were devised to keep their mind and hand in exercise; in their sketching landscapes from nature, or amusing themselves with what the Italians call Caricature, a term of no significance; for it includes many sorts of grotesque notions, whimsical incongruities, such as those arranged at Herculaneum, where Anchises, Æneas, Ascanius, are burlesqued by heads of apes and pigs. Arius, with a grotesque motion, is straddling a great tree; or like that ludicrous parody which came from the hand of Titian, in a playful hour, when he sketched the person whose three figures consist of apes. Annibale has a peculiar facility in these incongruous inventions, and in the severe Leonardo da Vinci considered them as idle exercises.

Such was the academy founded by the Caracci; and Lodovico lived to realize his project in the reformation of, and witnessed the school of Bologna flourishing afresh in all the others had fallen. The great masters of this epoch of Italian painting were their pupils. Such to Domenichino, who according to the expression of ieri, delineai gli animi, colorivasi la vita; he drew the soul and coloured life.* Albano, whose grace distinguishes him as the Anacreon of painting; Guido, whose touch is all beauty and delicacy, and, as Passeri delightfully expresses it, 'whose faces came from Paradise';† a scholar whom his master became jealous, while Annibale, to whom Guido, patronized Domenichino; and even the late Lodovico could not dissimulate the fear of a new competitor, a pupil, and to mortify Guido, preferred Guerici, who trod in another path. Lanfranco closes this glorious list, whose freedom and grandeur for their full display gained the ample field of some vast history.

The secret history of this Accademia forms an illustration for that chapter on 'Literary Jealousy' which I have taken in 'The Literary Character.' We have seen even a gentle Lodovico infected by it; but it raged in the breast of Annibale. Careless of fortune as they were of rough life, and freed from the bonds of matrimony, that by night wholly devote themselves to all the enthusiasm of their art, they lived together in the perpetual intercourse of their thoughts; and even at their meals laid on their table their crayons and their papers, so that any motion or pause which occurred, as worthy of picturing, was instantly sketched. Annibale caught something of the critical taste of Agostino, learned to work more slowly, and to seek with more perfection, while his inventions were excited by the elevated thoughts and erudition of Agostino. It is a circumstance which happened in the academy beyond the mordacity and envy of Annibale at the superior accomplishments of his more learned brother. While Agostino was describing with great eloquence the beauties of the Laocoon, Annibale approached the wall, and touching up his crayons, drew the marvellous figure with such perfection, that the spectators gazed on it in astonishment. Alluding to his brother's lecture, the proud artist disdainfully observed, 'Poets paint with words, but painters only with their pencils.'‡

The brothers could neither live together nor endure absence. Many years their life was one continual struggle with mortification; and Agostino often sacrificed his genius to pacify the jealousy of Annibale, by relinquishing his talent to resume those exquisite engravings, in which he traced the faulty outlines of the masters whom he copied, so that his engravings are more perfect than their originals. To this unhappy circumstance, observes Lanzi, we must attribute the loss of so many noble compositions which otherwise Agostino, equal in genius to the late Caracci, had left us. The jealousy of Annibale, at length for ever tore them asunder. Lodovico happened not to be with them when they were engaged in painting together in the Farnesian gallery at Rome. A rumour spread that their present combined labour the engraver had excelled as painter. This Annibale could not forgive; he raved at the bite of the serpent: words could not mollify, nor silence any longer appease that perturbed spirit; neither the humiliating forbearance of Agostino, the counsels of the wise, nor the mediation of the great. They separated for ever! a separation in which they both languished, till Agostino, broken hearted, sunk into an early grave, and Annibale, now brotherless, lost half his genius; his great invention no longer accompanied him—for Agostino was not by his side!§ After suffering many vexations, and preyed on by his evil temper, Annibale was deprived of his senses.

AN ENGLISH ACADEMY OF LITERATURE.†

We have Royal Societies for Philosophers, for Antiquaries, and for Artists—none for Men of Letters! The lovers of philological studies have regretted the want of an asylum since the days of Anne, when the establishment of an English Academy of Literature was designed; but political changes occurred which threw out a literary administration. France and Italy have gloried in great national academies, and even in provincial ones. With us the curious history and the fate of the societies at Spalding, Stamford, and Peterborough, whom their zealous founder lived to see sink into country clubs, is that of most of our rural attempts at literary academies! The Manchester Society has but an ambiguous existence, and that of Exeter expired in its birth. Yet that a great purpose may be obtained by an inconsiderable number, the history of the Society for the Encouragement of Arts, Manufactures, &c, may prove; for that originally consisted only of twelve persons brought together with great difficulty, and neither distinguished by their ability nor their rank.

The opponents to the establishment of an academy in this country may urge, and find Bruyere on their side, that no corporate body generates a single man of genius; no Milton, no Hume, no Adam Smith will spring out of an academical community, however they may partake of one common labour. Of the fame, too, shared among the many, the individual feels his portion too contracted, besides that he will often suffer by comparison. Literature, with us, exists independent of patronage or association.—We have done well without an academy; our dictionary and our style have been polished by individuals, and not by a society.
